You may call it arrears of pension, you may call it bounty, you may call it compensation for the money he expended in the war, or for his wasted and worn life; but I prefer, as a member of this House, to attribute it to soul-like, God-given patriotism which inspired him to act promptly for his country. I am in favor of the bill whether it is a precedent to be followed hereafter or not. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what has been said on the subject of this being a bill giving arrears of pension, I desire to say I stated at the beginning of the consideration of this case, giving a history of this matter, that the Committee on Invalid Pensions expressly refused to consider even the matter of giving arrears of pension to Mrs. Blair. That was the proposition embodied in the bill, but we refused to consider it. In the discussion of the bill it was insisted that General Blair had expended a large sum of money in the way of organizing troops at the outset of the war, and that she ought to be reimbursed therefor; that he had left her without anything, and we agreed to embody in this bill, not in the way of arrears of pensions, but simply as a proposition to compensate and to reimburse her for money which had been spent by her husband, and which probably would have gone to her if he had not spent it. There are no arrears of pension about this bill. The Committee on Invalid Pensions was determined on the proposition to treat all alike and to give no arrears of pensions.

Mr. STEELE. Will my colleague inform me if they resolved themselves into a Committee on War Claims or a Committee of Claims when they resolved to do this?

Mr. MATSON. They acted on the whole matter before them as they had the right to do. In considering the claim of Mrs. Francis P. Blair to get back the money lent the Government of the United States, or whatever you may please to call it, we only determined she should have the $5,000, and so awarded it to her.

We have heard a gentleman whose word is good, not here or in the State of Missouri alone, but all over the United States, who is known to be a man of high character, who says he knows in one single transaction General Blair paid out more money for the use of the Government and the benefit of the Union than is proposed to be given to his widow by this bill.

Mr. STEELE. I would inquire of my colleague whether he does not think the distinguished gentleman he refers to ought to have introduced a bill and let it go to the Committee on War Claims?

Mr. MATSON. I do not. I think when the whole subject-matter of relief, which is the subject-matter of this bill, is brought to the attention of any committee that committee ought to act upon it and not parcel the matter out; that the committee ought to report a bill, just as it did report a bill, that would give this lady substantial relief—a bill that would not propose merely to increase her pension, but a bill that would propose to reimburse her as far as Congress could. What is the objection of those who are not opposed to the proposition itself? The matter is before the House as well coming from the Committee on Invalid Pensions as if it had come from the Committee on War Claims or any other.

Mr. STEELE. My objection is that the bill is not called what it is. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has jurisdiction only in the case of pensions; and if this is not a pension, and if it is not arrears of pension, I object to calling it anything else.

Mr. MATSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that if it is not arrears of pension he objects to calling it anything else?

Mr. STEELE. I am going to vote for the bill, and I am to vote for it because it is arrears of pension.

Mr. MATSON. I want the gentleman to understand that it is compensation. It is a just claim. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD], who knows the facts, has stood before this House and said he knows it is just. Besides, we have the testimony of another of the colleagues of Frank Blair in those troublous times, who lived then in Southwestern Missouri, and who is now a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, Judge FYAN, who sprung to the breach as these other gentlemen did to save the Union at the outset of the war. He stated the same thing to the committee, that he knew, or was satisfied from circumstances within his knowledge, that this money was spent by General Blair.

Mr. STEELE. The bill says it is for distinguished services and for money paid out.

Mr. MATSON. "For compensation" is the language of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentlemen allow me to suggest that the gentleman on the other side of the House [Mr. STEELE] and the gentleman on this side of the House [Mr. MATSON] both agree upon supporting the bill. The only objection on the other side of the House is to the name. I would suggest to the gentleman that what we call a rose by any other name would smell as sweet. It is all right; you will vote for it any way.

Mr. MATSON. I desire the House distinctly to understand the ground upon which the bill is placed; for I do not intend it shall be said that the Committee on Invalid Pensions have reported in favor of giving arrears of pension. We have not done so in any case.

On the general subject suggested by my colleague [Mr. STEELE], I understand he is in favor of giving arrears of pension to all who have filed their claims since the 1st of July, 1880. He and I need not quarrel about that matter. That is not the issue here; and he is no more in favor of that proposition than I am, not a bit more. I have understood him to say he was objecting because objections to other bills had come from this side of the House, and that he regarded this bill as being a bill from this side of the House. Did I misunderstand him?

Mr. STEELE. I am led to believe that side of the House is particularly interested in this bill from the number of my distinguished friends I see here this evening.

Mr. MATSON. I understand, then, the gentleman is objecting for that reason. There may be some gentlemen on this side who may not support the bill, but I hope there are none on either side of the House who will not support it, for it is a just and proper bill. But I want to say to the gentleman that instead of that being his reason he must have some other reason than that he must make an objection because sometimes there are objections on this side of the House. I want to remind him that in the consideration of these pension bills on Friday nights he is the only gentleman here from the State of Indiana who has ever objected to any private pension bill; he is the only one, so far as I can recall. And there is a bill upon the Private Calendar that has stood there since the first Friday night that we began to consider pension bills, and it has stood there because of the objection of my colleague. Yet that case is recommended especially in a letter, which was read from the Clerk's desk, by General Grant, Commander of the Army of the United States in the late war.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman please to state what case he refers to?

Mr. MATSON. It is the case of William J. Lee, who was a scout. The gentleman from Indiana objected to its consideration; and it has not passed, but stands on the Calendar yet.

Mr. STEELE. That bill was a proposition to place a private citizen on the pension-roll. I want to pension soldiers before I commence to pension private citizens.

Mr. MATSON. So much in reply to what the gentleman says about making objections. I have no sort of objection myself to gentlemen criticising the reports of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I want to have their recommendations reviewed. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have tried to make these reports as carefully as they could. They have tried to lay down general rules and follow them, and we have no objection to these criticisms. If a case is brought here which it is found ought not to pass, we do not want it to pass. If it is right we want it to pass. We believe, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions have so reported unanimously, that this bill is right and ought to pass.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, having introduced the bill granting arrears of pension to the widow of General Blair, I think a brief explanation will enable the committee to appreciate the amendment.

The family of General Blair possess the same spirit which animated him during life, to never place a money value on whatever service he could render his country, or to ask reimbursement for moneys which he voluntarily expended in his country's cause. Hence no claim has ever been presented, nor would this claim be pending here to-night only for the reason that when Congress granted a pension to Mrs. Blair it was presumed that arrears of pension were included. Application for those arrears was made, and the Commissioner of Pensions found that through some technicality or defect in the law he could not allow it, while at the same time conceding its justice. The introduction of this bill followed. It seems that under the practice of this House no bill for arrears could be reported. Hence it was that Judge FYAN and others, who were familiar with the expenditure of his own money by General Blair in the service of the Union at the commencement of the war, suggested this plan of partial justice.

I only mention this as the objection has been made that this is a claim not properly belonging to the Committee on Pensions.

The amount involved is certainly less than would have been due as arrears and is but a fraction of the moneys expended by General Blair.

The country knows too well the distinguished services of General Blair to require any eulogy now. As Governor Curtin has well said, they involved the salvation of the Union, for it is the firm conviction of the people of Missouri that Frank Blair, more than any other man, living or dead, saved Missouri to the Union; with Missouri saved Kentucky also remained loyal, and principally through the action of Missouri. His gallant services in the field as the heroic commander of the Seventeenth Army Corps is part of our common history.

After the war closed and he returned home he found the men against whom he had fought in the field proscribed and disfranchised. Without a moment's hesitation he became the champion of his down-trodden fellow-citizens, and stood between them and their persecutors. His contest against the test-oaths of Missouri and his final success in overturning them will live forever in the history of that State. There never has been an opportunity equal to the present, when the brave men of both sides, the soldiers of the Union who appreciated the great and heroic services of General Blair for his country, and the confederates who had experienced the grand magnanimity of his nature, could meet on the common ground of humanity and render this slight act of justice to the widow and children of the man they had learned to love and honor.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman——

Several MEMBERS. "Vote!" "Vote!"

Mr. LAIRD. I am as ready to vote as any one, but I want to say one word before I do so.

I notice that there are on this Calendar for the consideration of this committee some one hundred and fifty bills for pensions, each as important as this, and all of them varying only in regard to the modicum of relief which they grant. I know from the temper of the House and the expressions of those who have spoken here to-night that there will not be a dissenting voice upon this measure. What, then, is the necessity for debating here an hour a proposition which it is self-evident will be passed [applause], and by this overflow of patriotism upon the ashes of Frank Blair blocking the way to relieve the one hundred and fifty people who are knocking at the doors of Congress? Now I say, "vote."

Mr. HOLMES. I desire to say a word, not in opposition to this bill, because I am in favor of it, but I wish to say a word in vindication of my position as a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. As a member of that committee I wish to occupy a position somewhat different from that stated by the honorable chairman in regard to this bill, as to whether it is or not an arrears-of-pension bill. I understand it to be a bill giving arrears of pension. I voted for it in committee with that understanding. I am not advised what the other members of that committee may have understood or may have intended to have this House understand by the position which they took. But for myself I understand this is a bill granting arrears of pension, and I voted for it with that understanding.

I do not understand that it is now an arbitrary rule of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to grant no arrears of pension, although I have understood that such formerly was the rule. I should be sorry if this House at any time should adopt any rule which would cut off arrears of pension in every case.

I am sorry that the political status of any person coming before this House should be brought in question when a simple act of justice is to be done. Be a man a Democrat, a Republican, a Greenbacker, or what not, if he served his country faithfully, if he expended his money, his time, his talents in the service of his country, I am in favor of recompensing him for what that is worth.

It is the rule in commerce and in everything else pertaining to human affairs that brains command a premium. And when a man like Frank P. Blair took hold of the domestic affairs of his State and by his action preserved that State to the Union, when he assisted to place armies in the field and led them into service, then it is proper that we should, by our action in this Congress, show that we appreciate a man of that character.

I have been expecting to-night to hear gentlemen on the other side of this House get up, as they usually do, and object to this bill. I am surprised to hear no one do so. As a rule, objections to these bills do not come from this side of the House.

Mr. BLAND. Then you are bringing politics into this discussion.

Mr. HOLMES. It is unnecessary to enter into that question as a matter of fact. I rejoice to say that I do not believe in the narrow 10-cent gauge principle, that because a man is a Democrat he should be opposed, or because he is a Republican he should be sustained in the matter of a pension. I believe in occupying a position broader than that, as a citizen of this country, and standing by men who were loyal at all times and under all circumstances irrespective of their political creeds.

I want to be understood here as supporting this bill because it gives arrears of pension, because it does justice to the memory and services of a man who spent every dollar he had in the world in the glorious cause of his country, in support of a cause which men who were on the other side and are now living under the shadow of this Capitol are glad succeeded and who are glad that such men as Frank P. Blair helped to preserve this Government. I am for this bill, and I am for it because it gives arrearages of pension.

The CHAIRMAN (having put the question on the amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions) said: The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. STEELE. I call for a division; and before the question is taken I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. If we vote down this amendment it gives Mrs. Blair arrearages of pension, I believe?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. STRUBLE. We do not understand it so here.

Mr. MATSON. I suppose the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] is right about that.

Mr. STEELE. That is my understanding—that it gives her arrears of pension.

Mr. MATSON. The original bill provides for arrears of pension. The committee has proposed an amendment to pay Mrs. Blair $5,000 for money and time expended by General Blair.

Mr. STEELE. Now, if she gets arrears of pensions will she not get more money than she would under the bill in the form proposed by the committee?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Less, I think.

Mr. STEELE. I understand that if we give her arrearages of pension she will get more money.

Mr. BROADHEAD. Yes, I believe she will receive more money as arrearages of pension.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following:

"Arrears of pension as provided by the acts of Congress known as the acts for the payment of arrears of pensions, and for other purposes, approved January 25, 1879, and March 4, 1879, so that said Apolline A. Blair shall receive a sum equal to $30 per month for every month from ——, the date when her late husband was mustered out of the service, as shown by the evidence on file in the Pension Department, till June 9, 1875, the date of his death."

And insert the following:

"The sum of $5,000, in compensation for money and time expended by General Francis P. Blair in enlisting men and organizing troops for United States armies; and that hereafter said Apolline A. Blair receive, in lieu of other pension, the sum of $50 per month."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to make one suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the committee is now dividing. The vote having been taken viva voce, a division was demanded by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], and the Chair was about to put the question again, when the gentleman rose to a parliamentary inquiry, which the Chair has had answered by the reading of the amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana——

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Indiana withdraws his demand for a division, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STEELE. I withdraw it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The original bill is in no sense a bill granting arrears of pension. It is a bill granting to the widow the pension which would have been received by her husband if he had applied for it during his life. If you give the widow arrears they date from the death of the husband. Mrs. Blair has already received a pension from the death of her husband, I suppose. I repeat that the original proposition of this bill is not to grant arrears of pension, but to give the widow the pension her husband would have drawn provided he had made application in his lifetime. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The demand for a division being withdrawn, the ayes have it, and the amendment is adopted. The question now is, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

Mr. DUNN. I desire to offer an additional amendment, which I have not yet completed, but which I will reduce to writing in a moment.

Mr. COSGROVE (after a pause). Mr. Chairman, is there anything before the Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] desires to offer an amendment, which he is reducing to writing.

Mr. COSGROVE. I think we had better vote on the bill. Let the gentleman have a vote on his amendment to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order until the gentleman from Arkansas presents his amendment.

Mr. DUNN. If the gentleman from Missouri will "possess his soul in patience," I will finish the amendment after a while.

Mr. COSGROVE. It seems to me we have something else to do than wait for the gentleman. If he wishes to offer an amendment it ought to be ready. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated that he is waiting until the gentleman from Arkansas reduces his amendment to writing. He has a right to do so. The gentleman now sends up his amendment, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That said sum of $5,000 shall be satisfaction in full and operate as a discharge of the Government from all further liability on account of expenditures made by said Francis P. Blair.

Mr. MATSON. I have no objection to that amendment, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. CLARDY. I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN (having put the question on agreeing to the amendment). In the opinion of the Chair the ayes have it.

Mr. COSGROVE. Let us have a division on this amendment.

Mr. PETERS. I ask for a division. I think this amendment is entirely unjust.

Mr. DUNN. Gentlemen had better adopt the amendment; it may save the bill.

The question being taken, the amendment was not agreed to, there being—ayes 14, noes 26.

Mr. DUNN. I move to strike out in the fifteenth line the words "the sum of $5,000, in compensation for money and time expended by General Francis P. Blair in enlisting men and organizing troops for the United States armies."

I desire to say I did not wish to participate in any debate. I have inferred from what was said here to-night that this $5,000 is a sum much less than that which General Blair expended in organizing troops. That claim has never been presented to Congress in any form and never been proved up. This does not pretend to be in satisfaction of all of what that claim may be, at all; but it is a recognition of that claim without proof, without formal investigation, without that kind of investigation which a committee of this House usually make of claims. Getting that much of recognition we may expect a claim for the balance of a vague and uncertain quantity. This decision will be quoted as a recognition of that claim and as authority under which the balance is to be paid. Therefore I desire that proviso to be adopted as a satisfaction and discharge of the Government.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I think, Mr. Chairman, it will be better to adopt the amendment suggested by the gentleman, and I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which it was voted down.

Mr. DUNN. I will withdraw the amendment if the other vote be reconsidered.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Is my motion in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to move to reconsider in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chair will suggest by unanimous consent the vote rejecting the amendment may be vacated.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent. This is all the family desire; I know that, and that they would not claim anything else.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to vacating the action rejecting the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN]?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The amendment was read again, as follows:

Provided, That said sum of $5,000 shall be satisfaction in full and operate as a discharge of the Government from all further liability on account of expenditures made by said Francis P. Blair.

Mr. FYAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to speak in relation to this matter. I am a new member. I thought I would not lift my voice in this House during this session of Congress. And I would not under any ordinary circumstances, but considering my relations to this report, considering my relations in days gone by to General Frank P. Blair, considering my relations to the State of Missouri now and in those days that tried men's souls, I wish to say a few words concerning the proposition of the gentleman now before this committee.

I do not wish to talk of the history of the State of Missouri in those days, because it has been recapitulated by my colleague in an able manner. You, Mr. Chairman, and I differed in those days, and we well understood that history, and when my friend alluded to the fact that General Harney was in command of the Federal troops there, you know the situation of affairs that existed, you know there was a treaty made by General Harney on one side and Sterling Price and Governor Jackson on the other by which Union men's hands were tied and they were proposed to be delivered on our side to the confederacy, and you know it was then that Frank P. Blair came to the front; that his voice rang out clear and loud all over the State, and that way down in my section, where we were loyal, it aroused us like a trumpet-blast. He was the man who called us to arms; he was the man who inspired us with life and vigor. We did not look to the Government for arms, nor did we receive any. We received no camp or garrison equipage. We looked to Frank P. Blair. He was our leader and our general. He was our quartermaster. He was our commissary. He was our paymaster.

And when the gentleman talks of evidence, he does not know Frank P. Blair. He never asked for a voucher or for a receipt. You know what the result was. Harney was a brave man, he was a patriotic man, he was an honest man, but he was overreached by these men.

But by Frank P. Blair's action, Mr. Chairman, when Harney was superseded, the whole theater of war was changed. Instead of the States of Iowa and Illinois and Kansas being the battle-ground of that great war, as they would have been under the policy which was being pursued if it had been allowed to continue, the tide of war was rolled back on Missouri. Saint Louis was saved. The arsenal of that city instead of being captured was saved, and gentlemen will know that I am now talking history. Camp Jackson was captured. Saint Louis was freed from the presence of the enemy, which was driven back to Jefferson, and from Jefferson to Boonville, and from Boonville outside the boundaries of the State. And then, and not until then, when his State had been freed from the presence of the enemy, did Frank P. Blair put on the uniform of his country and go forth to do battle worthy of the cause, and bare his breast in defense of his country wherever the foe was arrayed against his country's flag.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to talk about history as he made it. It is unnecessary that I should do so. His deeds are recorded in undying brightness on the pages of our country's record during that struggle. All men know them.

It was my fortune to follow Frank P. Blair during that dark period. You and I, Mr. Chairman, differed at that time. You and many of my colleagues differed. You followed the varying fortunes of one flag and I tramped after the other. But when the war was ended, when the struggle was done, when we came back home again we recognized one another, we knew each other better and we esteemed one another as perhaps we might not have done under other and less trying circumstances. We had met each other on the deadly field foot to foot and face to face. Each had stood up for what he believed to be right and his duty.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, when Frank Blair came back you know the condition of affairs existing in our State. He came back broken in health, and broken in fortune, bankrupted in all this world's goods. He came back with nothing but his great heart, and the honors he had won. Gentlemen talk about politics. I am talking history. God knows we in Missouri understood that history. We knew when it was made. When he came back, you all know the condition of affairs in that State. It was proposed to disfranchise men, to disqualify them from holding office, to debar them from the rights of citizenship, and bar them before the law. Here was a grand opportunity offered to a mean nature to gratify vindictive and malignant feelings, and if Frank Blair had been a mean man, occupying the position that he did, but entertaining the spirit and views of many other men, he would doubtless have taken advantage of the situation to gratify personal resentments.

But, Mr. Chairman, you know and I know that his was a different nature. No such vindictive feelings could find lodgment in his heart. He appealed to men as no other man could appeal to them; and when that constitution was carried, or was declared to be carried, you know how he traveled over the prairies and the hills and the valleys of our State from 1865, during the dark days in Missouri, until 1870, until by the inspiration of his presence and his persistent efforts our people rose with one accord to remove the restrictions that were imposed. We saw our State being depopulated and impoverished. But under the inspiration of his leadership and his untiring efforts all was changed. All turned again in response to his appeal and followed his leadership—the wounded man, whose arm was in a sling; all who had participated in the fight, united in a common effort. It was not politics, it was not ambition on his part—it was merely lifting the dark pall which had rested on the State. He restored peace and law and order and good government to Missouri and to its people; and we who know the history of those days know how we have prospered under the fraternal feelings which were inaugurated by him and which exist to this day.

I say here, Mr. Chairman, and I know that the declaration will be verified by every colleague from my State on this floor, that there is no man in Missouri, no true man, whether he followed the fortunes of the confederacy or whether he stood by the flag of the Union, whether he be a Republican or a Democrat, but will approve heartily of this measure. In God's name, then, grant this poor little pittance to Frank Blair's widow, to her who was far dearer to him than even his own life. We have not asked much in the way of pensions to the State of Missouri. Our people bared their breasts to the storm to the number of not less than 200,000; and yet compare our list of pensions with those of other States. We make our appeal for this poor widow and helpless orphans, and I trust no man in this House will raise his voice against this meritorious measure. [Applause.]

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield my time to the committee to vote on this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill as amended to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills to the House, some with and some without amendment.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 4856) granting a pension to Bvt. Col. C. A. Cilley, of North Carolina;

A bill (H. R. 2480) granting a pension to Margaret Kearns;

A bill (H. R. 4189) granting a pension to Caroline Van Norton;

A bill (H. R. 5088) for the relief of Magdalena Cook.

Bills of the following titles were reported from the Committee of the Whole House, with amendments. The amendments were adopted, and the bills as amended were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 2447) for the relief of Catherine Terry;

A bill (H. R. 5364) granting a pension to William H. Whitcomb; and

APOLLINE A. BLAIR.

The bill (H. R. 2984) granting arrears of pension to Apolline A. Blair, widow of the late General Francis P. Blair, was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. STEELE. I ask that this bill go over, that it may have the vote of a full House.

Mr. MORRISON. Let us have the previous question ordered on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois demands the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think we had better renew the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas and let that go over too.

Mr. CLARDY. You can not do that under the rule, the amendment not having been reported by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPRIGGS. I desire to offer an amendment which I think will meet the whole difficulty. In lieu of the words "in compensation" I desire to insert the words "in full compensation and payment." Those words cover the whole thing.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill as now proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Apolline A. Blair, widow of Francis P. Blair, late a major-general in the United States Army, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation and payment for money and time expended by General Francis P. Blair in enlisting men and organizing troops for United States armies; and that hereafter said Apolline A. Blair receive, in lieu of other pension, the sum of $50 per month.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] asks unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPRIGGS] be adopted. Is there objection?

Mr. HOUK. If I understand the reading of the bill as amended, it provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall pay a certain sum of money. Does it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the bill as proposed to be amended.

The bill as proposed to be amended was again read.

Mr. HOUK. I ask out of what fund the Secretary of the Interior is to pay that money unless a specific appropriation is made?

Mr. DUNN. I think the bill had better go back to the committee, that the necessary amendment may be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the adoption of the amendment which has been read. Is there objection?

Mr. HOUK. There is, in the shape in which the bill is now.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I suggest that the previous question is not yet pending and it does not require unanimous consent to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] having demanded the previous question, the call for the previous question, the Chair understood, was merely suspended to see if there could be an amicable adjustment.

Mr. MORRISON. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move to insert the words "Secretary of the Treasury" in lieu of the words "Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. HOLMES. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill. The amendment provides that the payment is to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury. I make the point of order that the Committee on Invalid Pensions can not report a bill for payment to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman's point of order comes too late. Objection will have to come by way of argument or vote against the proposition.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to ask what is the present stage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. STEELE. Are amendments in order now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Indiana that amendments at this stage are in order. This is the first time that amendments could be proposed since the bill was reported to the House. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH].

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I have changed my amendment and now offer what I send to the Clerk's desk.

Insert in line 18, after the word "armies," the following: "Out of moneys appropriated for pensions and gratuities."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPRIGGS].

Mr. DUNN. I would ask if the gentlemen do not think that it is necessary the bill shall specifically make the appropriation?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I think not.

The amendment offered by Mr. SPRIGGS was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEELE. I now ask that the bill go over and have the vote of a full House.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill. After the previous question is ordered I will not object to the bill going over. It will come up as unfinished business.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. STEELE. I now renew my request.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the House should now adjourn, that accomplishes the result designed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. VANCE. Pending the motion to adjourn, I move to reconsider the several votes by which bills have been passed, and I also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. MORRISON was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRENTS: Resolutions of the citizens of New Tacoma, against the forfeiture of the Northern Pacific Railroad land grant; also, the resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the people of Walla Walla County, Washington Territory, in favor of the forfeiture of the Northern Pacific Railroad land grant—severally to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. CANDLER: Petition of citizens of Fannin County, Georgia, for national aid to education—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. McCOID: Petition of Catherine McCarty, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MONEY: Two petitions of citizens of Mississippi, for national aid to education—severally to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. OATES: Petition of W. W. Woodson, U. L. Martin, and 66 others, citizens of Lee and Russell Counties, Alabama, for the passage of the Blair educational bill—to the same committee.

By Mr. PATTON: Resolutions of Grand Army of the Republic, Post No. 294, Department of Pennsylvania, relative to pensions, &c.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PIERCE: Papers relating to the claim of Penelope V. Rudd—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. RANDALL: Petition of Emma Brown, for relief—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REED: Petition of Charles E. Jose & Co. and Burbanks & Douglass, importers and dealers in earthenware and crockery, for a change in the tariff on crockery—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ROSECRANS: Petition of the Saint Helena Grape-Growers' Association, protesting against decrease in the tariff on wines and brandies, and for a restoration of the tariff on raisins to what it was before the last reduction—to the same committee.

By Mr. SENEY: Petition of Joseph Alberts, for changes in the pension laws—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SNYDER: Petition relating to the claim of Urias Buskirk—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. C. A. SUMNER: Memorial of wine-growers, &c., of California, relative to duties on wines, brandies, and raisins—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: Petition of J. J. Robinson and others, citizens of Chambers County, Alabama, favoring the passage of the Blair educational bill—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. J. S. WISE: Resolution of the State conference of superintendents of schools, &c., Virginia, relative to education—to the same committee.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 3, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EVENING SESSION DISPENSED WITH.

Mr. LAMB. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the order fixing evening sessions for debate be vacated as to this evening.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAMB] yield for this request?

Mr. LAMB. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to vacating as to this evening the order providing for evening sessions of the House for debate? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1319) to adjust the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. YORK, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence until Tuesday next, on account of sickness in his family.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAMB] calls for the regular order. The Chair will cause to be read the order of the House with reference to the business of this day.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, May 3, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1798) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882.

Mr. LAMB. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 1798, which is the special order for to-day, and that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNN. The other day, when the House agreed to close general debate on the tariff bill next Tuesday, I supposed it was done with the understanding that all special orders should be for the time superseded, and that the whole of the intervening time should be devoted to the tariff discussion.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House on that occasion was that the consideration of the Private Calendar on Friday should be dispensed with, but no other business of the House was disturbed.

Mr. DUNN. Then I think there has been a very extensive misunderstanding. The House, I believe, would not have agreed to close the tariff debate at so early a day if it had not been understood that the entire intervening time was to be devoted to that discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know anything about that. The order as made by the House at that time was stated on the floor and from the chair. Unanimous consent was given that the order be made. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAMB] that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 1798 and that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. RICE. I see no reason why the bill should not be considered in Committee of the Whole according to the rules.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suppose the House, if the question of consideration be raised upon the special order, can determine what business it will consider.

The SPEAKER. The House can refuse to go into Committee of the Whole to consider this bill, in which case of course the bill could not be considered, because it is in Committee of the Whole; and then the House would go on with its regular business.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is what I understood.

Mr. LAMB. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of House bill 1798; and pending that motion, I move that general debate in Committee of the Whole on this bill be limited to four hours.

The SPEAKER. As the bill has not yet been debated in Committee of the Whole that order can not be made without unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. FINDLAY. I object.

The motion of Mr. LAMB that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1798) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882.

The bill was read.

Mr. LAMB. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY].

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the House is the joint product of the delegations from the States of Oregon, California, and Nevada, and the Territories of Arizona and Washington, but inasmuch as I was the introducer of the measure, it has been deemed not inappropriate that I submit some observations explanatory of its general scope and purport.

At the outset I may say it is with great gratification I am able to state in reference to this measure that in the history of all antecedent legislation presented to this House there has never been, so far as I am advised, a bill presented which had received popular indorsement more full, more nearly unanimous, or more profound in its earnestness than have the principles embodied in this bill received at the hands of the people of the States of California and Nevada.

Upon this I may safely challenge contradiction. Whatever I may say in advocacy of this bill I say in obedience to the sentiment of the people of my State, irrespective of party.

We learn from the statistics of an election which took place some few years since in the State of California, having for its object the ascertainment of the wishes of the people in respect to this matter, that out of nearly 154,000 votes cast there were but a few hundred recorded against the principles embraced in this bill. In that election the issue was made clear, unmistakable, and distinct, for the purpose, as I have said, of having a correct understanding of the minds of the people upon this question. The result was, as I have stated, that out of 154,000 votes polled only a few hundred were recorded against the enacting of some such measure as this.

Therefore the Committee of the Whole will note this, and it is a matter I submit of pregnant significance to which I invite their attention, that while this and that may be alleged against the proposed enactment; while, judging from the tenor of the minority report that accompanies this bill, it may be assailed upon the ground that in some way or other it is hostile or inimical to that dearly loved doctrine which obtains in some portions of New England, and which is embodied in the phrase "the universal fatherhood of God and the universal brotherhood of man;" while the bill may be criticised by those who do not fully understand it as placing in jeopardy our relations with England in some particulars; while it may be assailed by others who are ignorant of the subject-matter as being in some of its details petty and undignified, yet there is this fact in connection with it, and I press it upon your attention, and it is a fact which in a representative Government and within constitutional limits ought to outweigh all other considerations that can be urged against the bill, and it is this: that the people, with practical unanimity, inhabiting a scope of country sufficient in population and territory for an empire in itself, come to you here and demand the enactment of this measure.

Sir, suppose that the people of the State of Massachusetts, or of Illinois, or of New Jersey, should come here and demand the passage of any measure with that unanimity which pervades my people in respect to this bill, what would we say in response to a request of that kind? Sir, it would require not boldness alone, but it would require hardihood, even audacity, to say to those people that their request should go unheeded.

The committee will note this in respect to this measure: that it contains no idea, no doctrine, that is novel or strange or dangerous, or that has not been fully and exhaustively considered in a bill heretofore passed by an antecedent Congress, and of which this is amendatory. It has simply been found, through the practical operations of the prior act, that these Chinese, with that cunning and persistence which no one will deny them, have adopted methods and means to evade its provisions; and the only function of this bill is simply to strengthen and effectuate the purpose contemplated by the original act.

The minority report, unintentionally no doubt, is calculated to mislead the casual observer in this respect, and I pray gentlemen to understand that a preceding Congress, upon the passage of the first act, has settled every principle that is touched upon in the present act. Hence the only question now presented is, Shall we make effectual a law and a policy heretofore determined upon, or shall we let that policy go for want of proper executory power?

But it is intimated in the minority report that the provisions of this measure are oppressive to a degree and unnecessarily restrictive. He who shall so conclude has studied the Chinese race and Chinese history to but little purpose. It is a history which constitutes an enigma from the solution of which even philosophy itself turns away in despair. It is a race which in all its annals and traditions has furnished to civilization nothing worthy of imitation; whose morality can not be discussed without a blush; a people with whom no other race has ever come in contact without moral deterioration; whose literature rests upon the fame and genius of a single man; whose religion is as degrading as the fetichism of Africa; a country where slavery and polygamy are institutions, female virtue is a myth, and infanticide a constant and approved practice. In their political economy they present the strange paradox of a civilization without the slighest amelioration of humanity; a civilization which has stood for forty centuries as it stands to-day, the incarnation of a dull, hopeless, inert existence of a people upon whom neither the efflux of time nor the processes of evolution has sufficed to have any effect either of progression or retrogression.

While these things are true there are certain solemn admonitory lessons which we may learn from the leaves of the history of this people, chiefest among which is that when they have predetermined to effect a lodgment in a country neither force nor law has hitherto sufficed to impede their desperate, ceaseless, and fatalistic purpose. Look to the blood-stained and lurid history of the islands of the Indian Archipelago. What do we find there? I have time only to cite one instance. Two hundred years ago the Chinese invaded the Philippine Islands, and soon made themselves offensive to the dominant race, as they have done in California. Laws were enacted demanding their deportation punitive to a brutal degree.

These laws were disregarded or evaded. They were followed by other enactments imposing fines, penalties, and assessments of every character and description possible. These in their turn were only effectual for a time, and were finally disregarded, until at last the people of these islands rose and in an hour of madness and wrath there was enacted a tragedy contributing one of the reddest pages to be found in the book of history. In one night and day, Mr. Chairman, the people rose and hunted down 30,000 men, women, and children of this race, pursued and slaughtered them like wild beasts.

Did this suffice to extirpate or drive them away or keep them away or stop their incoming? Only, sir, for a time. On they came; they had effected a lodgment and they intended to maintain it. They have done so, and there they are to-day.

Now, sir, this is a true history of all attempts at expulsion in respect to this people. And in connection with every civilized country on the earth they have always made themselves offensive, and every country in the world where they are now to be found in any considerable numbers is making an effort for their deportation or expulsion.

But, sir, it is intimated in this minority report that this measure in some way or other may result in destroying the present amicable relations which subsist between this country and England. And this idea is predicated on this state of facts: that Hong-Kong is a British dependency or island, and that within its limits are resident hundreds of thousands of these people, many of them being born there, and this bill interdicting all those people is to that extent an infraction of our treaty stipulation with Great Britain. In order to show to the committee the utter baselessness of such an apprehension as this it is only necessary for me to call your attention to the fact that England herself in Australia and British Columbia is enacting measures infinitely more oppressive and restrictive than anything to be found in this bill. It is not to be presumed, therefore, that England is going to quarrel with us for doing toward this people what she has done herself. But even if this apprehension were well grounded, I stand here and now to say, even were the apprehension imminent, so stupendous is this question in connection with the interests of the laboring masses of the country and so far-reaching will it be in its results, so highly demanded by every consideration which presses itself upon the attention of this country in reference to the laboring elements of our country, that even if the apprehension were well grounded and it might impair for a time our relations with England, I still say, let this measure pass. If amity with Great Britain is only to be purchased and obtained at the price of the degradation of the laboring people of this country, then, Mr. Chairman, I say the price is too high. [Applause.]

Sir, now and here in this House of Representatives of the American Congress and upon the passage of this bill we can do nothing higher, nothing loftier, nothing nobler than to declare that in no event shall the laboring masses of our country be subjected to debasing contact or degrading competition with the dark and yellow skinned races of Asia, and to that extent this is a white man's Government, and be it our lofty purpose to so preserve for him and his posterity forever. [Applause.] And that is precisely the condition of affairs which you will bring about unless you effectuate legislation which will stop the incoming of this people.

Sir, it will be a melancholy day for American institutions when the time shall come that the laboring masses of our country have not sufficient compensation for their toil to enable them to live in decency and to properly clothe and educate their children; because, sir, when that day shall come then this proud Republic, whose corner-stone rests and must rest on the virtue and intelligence of the people, will have sealed its doom and its lofty mission on earth is ended. Woe unto us when poverty and destitution shall sit as household gods at the fireside of American workingmen.

We are but the servants, the executors of the behests of the people. This is the most distinctly representative government on the face of the earth. I have adverted to the election which took place in California; the sentiment of the people on this subject has been expressed to about the same extent in the State of Nevada, as her distinguished Representative will inform this committee in this debate. So, sir, there comes up to you from all portions of the land this adjuration for relief. This danger, which at first was no bigger than a man's hand, has spread and amplified and has crossed the Sierra Nevadas and sped its way across this vast continent, until it is here and to-day casts its sinister and ominous shadow athwart the hearthstones of labor among the marts of commerce and manufacture in the North and West.

Sir, it has been said that prejudice urges on this legislation. I declare in no vainglorious spirit that on no part of this broad land that lies between the swelling waves of the two oceans can you find a more intelligent people, more alive and abreast of the progressive spirit of the age, or freer from the domination of any such feeling as race prejudice, than the people of the State of California.

Over 1,000,000 people on the Pacific Slope lift their voices to you for the enactment of this measure; and, sir, do not tell us that our fears are prematurely aroused. From the great Burke we learn that "early and provident fear is the mother of safety." We know whereof we speak with reference to this subject. We have studied the question in all of its bearings, because, Mr. Chairman, we have been obliged to study it.

And this election that I speak of was no mere momentary ebullition of an excited populace, but it voiced the fervent conviction of a people who for thirty long years have been confronted by and students of this great question; we have agonized over, and we have felt the damned barb and thorn of this tribulation. Therefore I ask this House, I ask this committee, to give heed to this appeal. It pervades the entire land, as I have stated; and those who doubt this statement, I ask you to go to-day to your petition-boxes, bursting with memorials from people from all sections of the country demanding, praying, hoping, for this simple measure of relief. Heed that prayer, Representatives, I beseech you. Heed it, else you belie, you mock at the representative feature of our political system. Heed it, else you sow the seeds of distrust of their political agents among the people. Heed it, as you would strengthen the cohesive power of your Government.

Mr. Chairman, that this great Republic may pursue its radiant career, that it may live on and on and on until it shall have reached the loftiest fruition of its majestic destiny, is the prayer of every true American whenever he makes his genuflection to his God; but if the broken column, the deserted temple, are ever to mark the premature decadence of American institutions, I pray that the future historian who is called upon to record that sad event may not be enabled truthfully to say that it was brought about because of a disregard on the part of the representatives of the people in Congress assembled of the wishes of those who sent them here. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take up the time of the committee to-day with the discussion of this bill upon the main question of the restriction of Chinese importation into this country. Two years ago, while a member of this House, I fully expressed myself in regard to the merits of this subject. I endeavored at length to explain why it was that we of the Pacific coast were opposed to the importation of a class of people provided for in the bill which in that Congress became a law, and am ready here to-day, if necessary, to reiterate my former expressions in all their force and import. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not consider that this is a time when the House will expect an argument on the merits of the main question. Congress has passed upon that matter and enacted a bill that has been in operation for nearly two years. To-day we of the Pacific coast come before the Forty-eighth Congress and point to a number of defects which time and experience have brought out through the operation of that law, and ask you for remedial legislation.

The defects in the present act have been made manifest more particularly in the territorial limits of California upon one side, of Oregon and Washington Territory upon the other. The members of the California delegation have devoted much time and care in the examination of these matters. They are fully conversant with the successful adroitness exhibited by the Chinese and those interested in Chinese importation in avoiding the restrictions of existing laws; and the gentleman from Washington Territory, upon our north, contiguous to British Columbia, where many of these people have been discharged and where they have been seeking their way across into the promised land, can tell you more particularly of the difficulties in the way of the operation of this act in his portion of the country. Oregon, being between, has not to the same degree experienced the dangerous defects of the present law. I ask the attention of this committee to a careful consideration of the facts which have been and will be hereafter presented by the delegation from these two sections.

I believe that the provisions of this bill before us are necessary for the enforcement of the original act. That act did not provide for the punishment of a violation of its provisions in the most important particulars. If we have a right to say that a certain person from a foreign land shall not enter this country, we have the right, and it is absolutely necessary that we should exercise the right, of providing a punishment in case of a violation of the restriction. This the present bill does; and if that were the only provision in the bill it would merit the careful attention and the favorable consideration of this House at the present time.

As I said in the start, I will not consume the time of the House by any elaborate discussion of this question. That has been quite fully done in the past. I only desire to appeal to my side of this House, as formerly in the Forty-seventh Congress, to stand by the interests of the Pacific coast. This is not a party measure with us. Our people are united. They look upon this as a matter of great importance to their material interests and advancement and prosperity, and I particularly call the attention of this side of the Chamber to the fact that the original act which this bill proposes to amend was passed by your votes, and ask that you stand by its provisions. Make it effective wherein it has proven to be defective, and give us the full benefit your existing legislation intended. Give us that which will insure an effective operation of existing laws, sustain your action of the past, and you will merit the hearty thanks of the united people of the Pacific coast.

Mr. RICE. Mr. Chairman, I shall be obliged to occupy more time than I had intended, because strangely it devolves upon me to explain the provisions of this bill. Bills are usually explained by the majority which favor them. This bill has thus far received scarcely a word of explanation from that majority. There have only been declamation, appeals, rhetoric, in place sometimes, not in place here.

It is asserted that this bill is in the interests of labor, and it is asserted that it is demanded by 1,500,000 suffering people dwelling on the Pacific coast. It is asserted that unless it is passed by this Congress Chinese invasion will be complete. And we are treated by the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY] to a rehearsal of what happened in the islands of the Pacific or Indian Ocean as a result of such a completed invasion, as indicating, I suppose, the horrors that may be anticipated on the Pacific coast unless we pass this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this bill I undertake to say is not demanded by the inhabitants of the Pacific coast. I undertake to say that it adds no single barrier to the coming of the Chinese into our country. I undertake to say and I am going to prove that it is only clap-trap and surplusage from beginning to end. Here are twelve long, dreary pages of printed paper—sixteen sections—and what do they contain? Let us see.

In 1868 this country made a treaty with China under the lead of Anson Burlingame, of Massachusetts, whom some of us there still remember with pride and affection. It was a treaty granting mutual privileges and rights to the inhabitants of the two countries. China, before that, had walled herself in from the rest of the world; but by friendly negotiations on our part, preceded by some acts of hostility on the part of European nations, that Chinese wall was broken down and this friendly treaty negotiated between this country and that. Under the operation of that treaty 100,000 Chinamen got into this country, and then arose the cry of alarm from the Pacific coast. Something must be done to protect the people of that coast from this immigration of yellow non-voting laborers. They could bear the immigration of all others, but the yellow laborers who have no votes must not be admitted within the confines of the free Republic, and an act was forced through Congress under the lead of these same representatives from the Pacific coast, for whom, I beg to say, I have the highest regard and consideration, which was vetoed by President Hayes because it was in violation of the Burlingame treaty which we had obtained from China.

That veto of the President was accepted, but demand was made for some action, and subsequently a commission was sent by this Government to China, and a supplemental treaty was made with China by which some relief might be afforded to our friends upon the Pacific coast and yet no violation to the treaty be committed, James B. Angel being the leading commissioner on the part of the United States. That supplemental treaty provided—what? It provided for a limited restriction of the immigration of whom? Of the Chinese laborers into this country; a limited restriction which should be reasonable.

Only laborers are to be included in the limitations; and the second article of that supplemental treaty provides that all other Chinese subjects may still continue to come and go into the United States "of their own free will and accord, as the subjects of the other and more favored nations." So that—and I want the representatives of the Pacific coast to correct me if I make any misstatement or fall into error anywhere; they shall have time enough to do it—so that this supplemental treaty provides only for restriction as to laborers and permits all other Chinese subjects to come and go of their own free will and accord into this country as ours into theirs.

The Forty-seventh Congress, after the ratification of this supplemental treaty under the lead of these Pacific coast Representatives, passed a bill which was vetoed by President Arthur because it violated even the modified and supplemental treaty in that it prohibited the importation of all Chinese laborers into this country absolutely for the term of twenty years. It was held by the President that that was a violation even of the modified treaty, and therefore he vetoed it, and the veto was sustained.

Still the cry came up for relief, and the Forty-seventh Congress was held by the throat until it passed the act which it is attempted here to-day to amend. That act was passed May 6, 1882, and went into effect August 4 of the same year. That is the act to which the eloquence of the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY] is, and of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. GEORGE] was directed; and it was in place there. That act was passed, signed, and approved, and has now been in operation for nearly two years. I say it has produced the result which it was intended to effect, and the proposed amendatory act will add nothing to it within the scope of the treaty which we have made with China.

I wish to prove that the act has done its work, and that anything further is unnecessary. I will prove it by figures, and I ask correction from any gentleman of the statements I am about to make.

Since the passage of that act and up to the 15th day of January of this year 17,000 Chinamen departed from these shores and only 3,415 came to this country; making during the two years this treaty has been in operation a difference of 13,600 in this country.

Mark you, we had no right to prohibit and the act does not prohibit those who came before its passage under the old treaty from going home and again returning to this country; and of the 3,415 who have come to this country since the act of May 6, 1882, went into operation the greater part were those who had the right to return. Not more than five or six hundred Chinamen have come into this country de novo during these two years; only those who had acquired under the treaty the right to come here have returned, and they could not be prevented from returning.

Is not that a pretty effectual working of the act? Only 3,415 have come to this country. Does not that evince a pretty thorough working of the act for the first two years?

Mr. PETERS. Was the vote to which the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY] alluded taken before or after the passage of the act of 1882?

Mr. RICE. It was taken before the passage of that act. To show that I do not speak without authority, let me quote as additional authority the San Francisco Chronicle of January 13, 1884. I fancy that my Democratic friends from California will not deny the authority of that journal, or its bitter anti-Chinese sentiment.

Mr. HENLEY. Allow me to inform the gentleman that it lacks a great deal of being a Democratic paper, if you put it upon that ground.

Mr. RICE. I believe it belongs to the Independent party in California, but it is anti-Chinese.

Mr. HENLEY. It is thoroughly Republican.

Mr. RICE. Is it thoroughly Republican?

Mr. HENLEY. Thoroughly and emphatically Republican.

Mr. RICE. All the better, then. [Laughter.] I will now read the extract which I was about to read from that paper. It says that before the operation of the restriction act 1,500 Chinese per month were coming into California, but that since the passage of that act the average of monthly arivals has not exceeded 66. The arrivals were reduced from 1,500 per month to 66 per month. It then goes on to say:

> There is of course a wide difference between monthly arrivals of 1,500 before the passage of this law and the 66 average for the last year. In the ten years for which the law runs the surreptitious arrivals would not aggregate more than 3,500.

The paper says that the half of the 66 per month were probably "landed by fraud or perjury or other evasion of the act." It is therefore to prevent the suspected surreptitious immigration of 3,500 in ten years that this bill is to be enacted into law.

But mark this, there is no evidence that a single one of those 66 monthly arrivals were fraudulent or surreptitious; but the proper conclusion is that they really were those who have the right under the treaty to return to this country.

Mr. HENLEY. The gentleman invited corrections of his statements.

Mr. RICE. Certainly.

Mr. HENLEY. Therefore I venture to interrupt him, but will not do so without his consent.

Mr. RICE. I beg that you will do so.

Mr. HENLEY. The gentlemen assumes that all of the Chinese who have entered into California since the passage of the act of 1882 are contained in the statistics which he presents to the committee.

Mr. RICE. I do.

Mr. HENLEY. Since the gentleman expresses a desire to be eminently fair and candid in this matter, I beg to call his attention to the fact that on the calendar of the Federal courts in San Francisco, district and circuit courts, there are pretty nearly three hundred cases of persons who are applying to be admitted under the provisions of this act; so many that it has acted as an absolute barrier to all other litigation. Further than that, in a letter dated November 22, 1883, written by W. H. Wasson, the Treasury agent, and addressed to Hon. Charles J. Folger, Secretary of the Treasury, it is stated that there are in the neighborhood of 20,000 Chinese in British Columbia who are threatening to come over the line at any time; and this amendatory bill proposed here is designed to prevent that as one of the dangers which threatens the peace of California.

Mr. BUDD. And if the gentleman will allow me, I will say that the Chinese from British Columbia are now coming over the line daily.

Mr. RICE. Well, there are several Chinese in Massachusetts who may go over the line and get into California. There is no evidence that they have started, and I have seen no evidence that any have started yet from British Columbia. I take the figures of the United States officials in California.

Does the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY] want to know how these three hundred cases to which he refers came into the United States courts? It is because you do not acknowledge the validity of a single passport that has been put into the hands of the men who have the right under the treaty to come back by their government, but you arrest and try every one of them in your courts before you let them in, when they have the full right under the treaty to come in. That is how your courts happen to be clogged up with these cases to which you refer. If you would admit——

Mr. ROSECRANS. The gentleman seems to imagine that every passport presented is really a true passport.

Mr. RICE. I have no evidence that these passports are not true. If the gentleman from California has such evidence I will thank him to present it.

Mr. ROSECRANS. The courts in a good many instances have found that these passports were not true.

Mr. RICE. I would like to know in how many instances?

Mr. ROSECRANS. I can not give the exact number.

Mr. RICE. More than thirty-three in all during the two years? Will the gentleman answer my question? I have looked into the figures, and I ask the gentleman whether of all the cases that have come into the courts there have been more than thirty-three in which the passports have been found fraudulent?

Mr. ROSECRANS. I do not remember; I never kept an account of the number of fraudulent passports. But I know that in cases of parties who have been arrested, a considerable number of forged papers have been found. I know that Republicans, represented by such papers as the San Francisco Chronicle, want this bill passed for the purpose of making more effective the law which, according to the gentleman from Massachusetts, is already effective. We do not object to the effectiveness of the law; we only want to make it perfect.

Mr. RICE. I am going to show in a few minutes how you are trying to make it perfect.

As the gentleman has called my atttention to these passports, let me make a statement in regard to one of which I was reading a few days ago in a California paper, to show how thoroughly this law is made to work under the influence of public opinion, such as exists in the State of California.

Under the treaty, merchants still have a right to come into the United States from China. A young man of eighteen came into California the other day from China with a passport signed by his government, seeking to exercise the right as a merchant to enter this country. His father had come to the country many years before and had established himself in a small mercantile business in one of the interior towns of the Pacific coast. This boy of eighteen had been fitting himself to enter into partnership with his father and had come here with the passport of his government certifying that he was a merchant seeking to enter upon our shores. And he was arrested before he could set foot upon the shores of California, and was tried in the courts there; and that passport was declared to be fraudulent because he had never been a merchant and was only proposing to be one. Without being allowed to enter upon the land, without being allowed to see his father whom he had not seen for years and to join whom he had come so far, he was turned back over the weary waste of the Pacific Ocean—refused an entrance into this "land of the free." That is the way this act works in California. Do you want to make it any more thorough than that?

Now, I wish to read from another authority. I have here the Argonaut. I do not know whether that is a Republican paper or a Democratic paper, but it is a California paper.

Mr. CASSIDY. That is another Independent journal.

Mr. RICE. Another Independent journal! The Independent party must be thriving in California.

Mr. HENLEY. What is the date of the paper which the gentleman is about to read?

Mr. RICE. December 1, 1883—about the time you began to get up this agitation. Now, I beg my friends, especially my California friends, to listen to this from the Argonaut:

It strikes us that our very respectable journals are making more fuss over this business than its importance justifies. Certain of our politicians are making an ado about it that is unseemly and ridiculous. We are not impressed that there is any danger. The law is working as well as we expected it would. Chinese immigration has been practically suspended by it. We are getting no more Chinese now than we ought to have, nor more than are profitable and convenient to keep up the number which, by reason of their existence among us, have become indispensable to us.

Now, this is in the same line as the statement of Judge Hoffman, the discreet, learned, and impartial judge of the United States district court of California, whose order sent that young man back to China because he never had been a merchant, but was only proposing to be one. What does he say?

It appears that not only has the flood of Chinese immigration with which we were menaced been stayed, but a process of depletion has been going on which could not be considerably increased without serious disturbance to the established industries of the State.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I have here something which I am sure will interest my friend from Massachusetts——

Mr. RICE. Anything will interest me that comes from you.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I had occasion to call the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to the probability of a traffic in the importation of Chinese labor over our Northern borders. I showed him that a large number of these people along the line of the railroad were coming through in small squads, because there was a profit in the importation of labor. This led to his sending me a copy of the report of Mr. Wasson, from which I will read an extract——

Mr. RICE. I am afraid the gentleman is not so interesting as I may be in a few minutes, and if he pleases I will leave him to read that in his own time rather than mine.

Mr. ROSECRANS. It will occupy but a moment. Mr. Wasson, in his report, says:

The term "laborer" may include a woman. The wife takes the condition of her husband; and upon this ruling the artful Chinese, who invariably have two or three names, without regard to right or wrong, having no regard for our oath, claim and swear that they are either connected with some mercantile establishment or own a wash-house. Upon this evidence they are permitted the same privileges as the citizens of the most favored nations, and come and go at will.

Mr. RICE. It is not so interesting even as I thought it was going to be. [Laughter.]

Now, why is it that our politicians are making so much ado over this business? Let me read a little more from the Argonaut in answer. One reason that the Argonaut states for this "much ado about nothing" is that "white labor votes and yellow labor does not." This is one reason given by the Argonaut.

Mr. TULLY. I did not hear that last remark.

Mr. RICE. White labor votes and yellow labor does not.

Mr. TULLY. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. RICE. Well.

Mr. TULLY. Are you in favor of yellow labor voting?

Mr. RICE. I am giving you a reason why you are not agitated about yellow labor as about white.

Mr. TULLY. That is not fair.

Mr. CASSIDY. That is an unfair answer.

Mr. TULLY. Let me suggest that is not an answer to my question.

Mr. RICE. It is not germane to the subject. [Laughter.] Now let me read a little more from the Argonaut:

Experience and observation demonstrate that there is no depth of absurdity nor height of wickedness to which the daily journals of San Francisco (Alta excepted) will not crawl or climb to conciliate the good-will of the ignorant and demagogue element of the labor class. This practice of slobbering over the idle poor and pandering to prejudices that are the growth of ignorance and political demagogism is too common to demand notice, or even to attract it, if, as has happened before, and by the same journals, great damage to the city of San Francisco and State of California did not result from it. All this blowing of smoke and ashes from out the dead Chinese question is having a damaging influence abroad. It is arresting immigration by sounding false alarm of a new Chinese invasion.

It then goes on to give the figures I have already given, showing the effect of the act during the two years it has been in operation, and then concludes:

If in our country it can not stand up under the immigration of 200 moon-eyed barbarians a month, who work for their living, obey the law, and don't vote, it had better go out of business and close the concern.

Now, I have shown that the act of 1882 is effectual and operative. I have shown it by the figures; I have shown it by the testimony of Judge Hoffman, by the testimony of the Chronicle, the Argonaut, and I have heard as yet no word to contradict the statements from these representatives of the Pacific coast.

What, then, is this bill—this precious waste of ink and paper; what is it? I want gentlemen to attend seriously to this matter.

Here is the first section of the bill. It provides that the first section of the act of 1882 "shall be amended so as to read as follows," and it then goes on to print a half page which reads precisely as section 1 of that act with one single exception. The original act says that during such suspension it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come or, having come, to remain in the United States. This amends that by saying to come "from any foreign port or place." In the interest of economy and good grammar I ask if it is necessary for this House to stop in the great debate on tariff reform and put aside all other questions to amend the old act by inserting, when it provided it should not be lawful to come into the United States, the amendment "from any foreign port or place."

That is the first amendment. We now come to the second, "that the master of any vessel who shall knowingly bring within the United States on such vessel and land, or permit to be landed, any Chinese laborer." That is the way the old act read. The new one reads: "to land or attempt to land or permit to be landed," &c. And that is the relief that is to be extended by this Congress to the suffering communities on our Pacific coast. "To land or to attempt to land or permit to be landed!" Puerile and frivolous I declare it to be, although, as the gentleman from California has said, it is the result of the combined wisdom of the Representatives from the Pacific coast.

Section 3 is amended so that in line 39 are introduced the following words:

Provided, That all Chinese laborers brought on such vessel shall not be permitted to land except in case of absolute necessity.

Some Chinese sailor or some Chinese boy who had crossed the ocean to see his father might have been permitted under the present act to set foot upon the sacred soil of California, but he shall not do so any longer; and under the provisions of this act no one from that forbidden country shall be permitted to land except in case of "absolute necessity." What is that condition? If he had the small-pox, could he be taken out of the vessel and carried to a hospital? Will you answer that? What would be a case of "absolute necessity," my genial friend from California, my kind-hearted friend? Will you please, when you make your speech, give us the answer?

Well, that is three pages of this bill, and I have read you everything new there is in it so far. Now we will take two pages more. What are the next two pages? Why, the late act required the certificate, upon which the Chinese laborer should return, to state his name and occupation. Now here we have two pages which provide in addition to that that the certificate shall state the "individual, family, and tribal name" of its unhappy bearer. "The individual, family, and tribal name!" It is not enough to state his name, but that of all of his race. It takes two pages of the bill to provide for that, and I have got over now to the sixth page of the bill and I have given you all there is in it that is new thus far.

Mr. HENLEY. The gentleman will excuse me, but perhaps it may aid him in his criticism——

Mr. RICE. Oh, I understand; I have not given all. The occupation must be stated.

Mr. HENLEY. Yes, but it may improve the gentleman's argument to know that the criticisms last made by him have been agreed to by the Senate committee; that particular portion of it——

Mr. RICE. I call the gentleman to order for referring to what has been done in the Senate.

Mr. HENLEY. Done in committee. Well, the point of order may be interposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and his point of order from his standpoint on this bill would be to prevent the truth, I suppose.

Mr. RICE. My friend from California is getting personal now.

Mr. HENLEY. Oh, not at all.

Mr. RICE. Then, Mr. Chairman, we come to the next question. Under the treaty Chinese merchants have a right to come into this country, and under the last act they had a right to come if they were ticketed and labeled to a sufficient degree; but they were not ticketed and labeled enough, and so this sixth section of the new act makes additional provisions with which the Chinese merchant who seeks to come into this country must comply.

As submitted by the combined wisdom of the Pacific coast the section originally provided that no young man from China should come into this country in order to study—the graces, I presume, and amenities of life which are practiced in California and elsewhere—in order to study unless he had a certificate stating the nature and the character of the contemplated studies, whether the same are to be prosecuted within the United States; where; how long; and that he should not stay ninety days after he got through. I say this bill as originally submitted had that provision in it; but even the Foreign Affairs Committee struck that out. They would not report that to the House. But they left the provision in with regard to the merchants. No merchant shall come here unless he has obtained permission of the government of which he is a subject, and a certificate from that government stating a great many particulars in regard to him.

Now, then, my friend from California, my somewhat excitable and personal friend, stated in his speech something about Chinese Christianity, Chinese religion. I did not copy it all, but the gentleman will remember what it was. He held them up as a race without any religion, without any doctrines or principles of religion; held them up to execration and denunciation by those pious communities in this country of ours; and the merchants of that country must be excluded from this country in the manner which is provided in that section because thus irreligious and unprincipled.

Will the gentleman listen for a moment? Here is a letter, extracts from which I am permitted to read, dated Tien-Tsin, August 9, 1882. This is from a Chinese merchant, one who can not come into this country under this act unless he has the signed permission of his government and is ticketed and checked and labeled under the provisions of this section. What does he say?

I have perused the appeal for assistance with care, and have no hesitation in saying that the noble movement contemplated should be instantly responded to from all quarters of the universe. Had the late act failed, I and my friends would be most happy to head a Chinese circular and send it among our friends. But to ask our countrymen to subscribe to a hospital to be built in a country which the Chinese are not for ten years permitted to enter is more than we dare to do. With due respect to the President, and to avoid publicity, and to avoid censure, asking you to omit mention of names, allow me to ask your acceptance of the accompanying small sum of $300 as a subscription to the Garfield Memorial Hospital.

Twenty-five hundred dollars besides this was sent across the ocean from Chinese merchants as subscriptions to the Garfield Memorial Hospital to be erected in this capital city of the United States. I pray my friends to amend this section by providing that instead of the passports and checks which it provides these subscribers to the fund of the Garfield Memorial Hospital may be permitted to come to see it when it is built by presenting their receipts for not less than $300 each to the custom-house officers of San Francisco. [Applause.] Who shows best: the disciples of Confucius, who four hundred and fifty years before the beginning of our era declared, "Do not do to others what you would not wish them to do to you," or the promoters of this act, who, wearing the sign of Jesus of Nazareth, do not, as it seems to me, exhibit the spirit of the Master in their acts?

Mr. BUDD. May I ask the gentleman a question while he is speaking of the morality of the Chinese?

Mr. RICE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUDD. Do you not know that the Chinese have no regard for their daughters, and that they often do not give them names, but simply a number, as we do to our convicts; that they sell them into prostitution; that they sell their wives and children, or pledge them, to come to this country; that when children are born that are females they are killed or thrown into the street, gathered up by carts, and denied burial; that the very men who want them to become citizens say they are such liars and thieves that they must be watched, and assign as a reason for this that they have not had the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth?

Mr. RICE. I did not know more than about half of that before. I knew there were many bad people in the world, some in China, some in San Francisco, some in New York, some, a very few, even in the city of Worcester. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUDD. I speak of the habits of the Chinese as laid down by Nevins, Speer, Williams, Doolittle, Cornwall, and other writers friendly to them.

Mr. RICE. I have gone over, and have gone over faithfully, all the provisions of this bill except one. Let me say right here that the gentlemen are mistaken when they say that British America has adopted any restrictive act in regard to the Chinese. There have been rumors about it, but they have not done it. Let me say also that this act does not provide against carting over or wheeling over some unhappy Chinaman from Canada across the line into the United States. It does not add anything to the old act to protect our friends in that respect.

But having gone over all that pertains to the old act, let me now come to what is the heart and the kernel of this act. That is all to be found in the fifteenth section of it. I beg the members of this House to listen to this section 15:

The provisions of this act shall apply to all subjects of China and Chinese, whether subjects of China or of any other foreign power.

That is the whole substance of this amended act; that is all that is in it, really, that is new or that is not absolutely puerile and frivolous.

The provisions of this act shall apply to all subjects of China and Chinese, whether subjects of China or of any other foreign power.

Now, it happens that there are two British provinces in which Chinese dwell. There is the province of Hong-Kong, ceded to Great Britain in 1841; its capital, Victoria; population in 1872, Europeans and Americans, 6,000; Chinese, 115,000. There are 115,000 Chinamen that have not been kept out by any act we have adopted heretofore. Singapore was ceded to the British in 1824. Its population in 1871 was 74,000, of whom 54,000 were Chinese. In all nearly 200,000 Chinese who possibly would not be kept out by the act of 1882. Why not? Because it happens that they are subjects of the British Empire and that over them floats the British flag. One of them was let into Massachusetts a few months ago under the decision of Judges Lowell and Nelson that this act of 1882, being entitled "An act to carry out certain treaty provisions with China," did not apply to Chinese who were subjects of Great Britain, with whom we had made no supplemental treaty authorizing us to do any such thing. And therefore a Chinaman got into Boston from Hong-Kong, and he is at large somewhere in the country now, and for all I know he is executing a flank movement upon California. [Laughter.] I should like to have my stalwart friend from Indiana arm himself and attempt to arrest the career of that dangerous knight-errant before he shall reach the Pacific coast and throw it into additional alarm. One got into Boston because he came under the red cross of England, and our court thought that Congress had not yet enacted anything that would justify us in keeping him out.

It is to arrest the incursion of such Chinamen that this act is prepared and presented. Let me read from the report of the majority to prove this:

To show that it—

This act—

To show that it has failed so to do—

To keep out the Chinese—your committee have only to cite the decision of Judges Lowell and Nelson of the United States circuit court in Massachusetts, to the effect that the Chinese laborer born on the island of Hong-Kong, after its cession to Great Britain, is not within the provisions of the act of 1882.

That is all they have to say. The words are "they have only to cite." So that this is the be-all and the end-all of this matter—to keep out English Chinamen from the United States.

Where are your treaty rights to do that? Did you vote for steel cruisers the other day when you were anticipating the presenting and putting this bill through the House? How long, think you, England would keep her ironclads from bombarding our cities if you should refuse to her subjects, Chinamen though they are, the right to set foot upon our shores? Think you the English governor of Hong-Kong would sit down and fill out to a Chinese sailor on an English vessel sailing thence to San Francisco that ridiculous certificate which you provide in this act he must have in order to be allowed to enter this country? Think you that if an English vessel anchored at the wharf of San Francisco with Chinese sailors on board, born in Hong-Kong, and without that certificate—think you that the English Government would allow these sailors to be arrested, thrown into prison, turned back if they chanced in discharging the cargo of the vessel to set foot upon your soil because, forsooth, they had not brought this permit of the Imperial Government of England to authorize them to come in under the provisions of this act?

That, gentlemen of the committee, is all there is in this bill. Are you ready now upon this showing to pass this bill upon any clamor from the Pacific coast, or for any party reasons whatsoever, when its only provision will either be ignored by England as foolish bombast or will lead us into war with that country?

I have spent much more time than I intended in the discussion of this subject. It seemed to devolve upon me to explain the provisions of this bill. If it is to pass, and I presume it will pass, I presume that the clamor from the constituents of the gentlemen who have spoken and who will speak in its favor will be potent here. If it is to pass, no argument showing further its transparent tenuity and ridiculous absurdities can be of any avail.

But I was determined that it should not pass without spreading upon the records of this House an explanation of its provisions and its intent. I declare it to be petty in its details, presumptuous in its attempts, and impossible as to execution.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman pardon me for interrupting him one moment?

Mr. RICE. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. I understood my friend to say that the other law had been effective and had performed the very duty that this bill was designed to perform.

Mr. RICE. With one exception.

Mr. EATON. And now, if I understand him correctly, he says that this bill is impossible of performance. If so, then I would be glad to have him tell me why, if the other bill has been effective?

Mr. RICE. Because we have no navy with which to enforce it against the nations of the earth other than China; and even in regard to China, if a fleet of Chinese junks could get across the Pacific they would bombard San Francisco into submission in a single day.

Mr. EATON. Ah, now I understand.

Mr. HENLEY. We will not call upon Massachusetts to protect us in that emergency.

Mr. HAMMOND. Allow me to ask the gentleman if it would be a casus belli for us to refuse to receive any of the population of England who are disreputable and vicious, who are repugnant to our notions of decency and propriety? Can we not exclude English paupers without its being a cause of war? I ask the gentleman that as a legal question.

Mr. RICE. We can make police regulations by which we can exclude paupers, vicious and diseased persons.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then if it be proved that the Chinese are such, can we not exclude them without making it a casus belli?

Mr. RICE. If you think you can cover with that description the Chinese merchants who trade with the world, and who send their subscriptions here to build our memorial hospital——

Mr. HAMMOND. I am not talking about Chinese merchants.

Mr. RICE. I am, and this act will exclude them just as much as it will exclude the vicious.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will you vote for this bill if we will let them come in?

Mr. RICE. Let who come in?

Mr. HAMMOND. The Garfield hospital fellows.

Mr. RICE. I trust I should if I had the chance; but I do not see what that has to do with this matter.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then you say you will vote for this bill if we will except them from its operation?

Mr. RICE. Oh, that is rather a small question, as it seems to me, to come from so large a gentleman.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then I understand you to decline to answer.

Mr. RICE. I am just closing, and was about to say that this continual hectoring of the Chinese is a matter against which I protest; not because of any belief which I have in the universal Fatherhood of God or the universal brotherhood of man, but because, like my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON], I have a good Yankee tendency to thrift and well-doing. I want to be on friendly terms with China, so that we may extend our trade to her markets and take within its sphere the 400,000,000 of her population. Those 400,000,000 are men and women after all who have their wants and who desire us to supply them. They are ready to work, to trade, and to learn of us. By extending our markets to them and continuing on friendly commercial relations with them we shall derive those profits which an ingenious and powerful nation always derives from trade with a weaker and less developed nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICE. I have two hours, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman had two hours.

Mr. LAMB. I was perfectly willing that there should be two hours allowed to each side.

Mr. RICE. I am just about to finish my remarks.

Mr. LAMB. I have no objection to the gentleman continuing, but I want to speak about the agreement as to debate. If you remember, Mr. Chairman, there was an objection to the agreement which was proposed, and consequently each of us has his own time.

Mr. RICE. In conclusion, I wish merely to say that we ought to cultivate friendly relations with China, if for no other reason, in order to secure the advantages of trade and commerce with her people. I adjure the House not to do that which will cover the broad Pacific with the red flags of war and of conquest, but rather that which will cover those seas with the white sails and iron keels of commerce, which shall weave indissoluble bonds of friendship and of amity across the ocean. Build not up on the Pacific coast a Chinese wall with gates opening only from within, and with cannon frowning without. Rather from the high turrets of a Christian civilization let the electric lights of industry, of science, and of philanthropy shine across the Pacific and illumine the dark places of the old land where our race was born. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] will control the remainder of the time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. EATON. Of the hour allotted to me as one member of the committee, I yield fifteen minutes to my friend from California [Mr. GLASCOCK].

Mr. GLASCOCK. Mr. Chairman, in the short space of time allotted to me it is hardly to be expected that I can say much upon this question. I simply desire, as far as in me lies, to voice the sentiment of a million and a half of American citizens upon a subject that so closely relates to American labor as does the matter now under consideration. But, sir, it is not my intention to discuss the policy of restriction of Chinese immigration. That policy has already been clearly and unmistakably outlined in the act of 1882, of which this bill is amendatory.

This bill presents no new nor radical phases of this, to us on the Pacific coast, most vital question. It simply operates to cure what is diseased in existing statute, to make more perfect an imperfect expression of popular will. Is there anything startling in this? Are we endeavoring to overturn any well-settled principle of governmental policy when we say that the act of 1882 has been tried, found wanting, and that we desire to make it conform to the evident intention of the framers of said act? This question is not to be decided upon popular clamor, passion, or prejudice, but calmly and dispassionately, as every great economic problem ought to be solved by this body of representative Americans. Its intimate connection with the greatest of our living questions, that of American labor, its status, its wants, and its possibilities, demand at your hands and will receive that earnest, unbiased, intelligent treatment which its importance deserves.

I am glad to state that no opposition to this measure of partial relief comes from this side of the Chamber. The Democrats in Congress have uniformly responded to every cry that has come out of the West against the evil of Chinese immigration. There has been no halting, no wavering with them upon this question. They have ever faced with unbroken ranks any invasion upon the rights and dignity of American labor.

Sir, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts who has just taken his seat has taught us from the Pacific Slope much for which we ought to feel profoundly grateful. Such is the density of our ignorance that we have always held the Chinaman to be irreligious, untruthful, given over to slavery, infanticide, and enforced prostitution, wanting in honesty, filthy of habit, and infamous in practice, but the gentleman shatters the convictions of thirty-odd years of observation and actual contact with the counter argument, strong as proof of Holy Writ, that some Chinaman, name unknown, on August 9, 1882, subscribed $300 to the Garfield Memorial Hospital, and that certain other Chinamen, names also unknown, raised and transmitted to this country $25,000 for the same purpose. We had scarce rallied from the shock of this conclusive answer to the charges ere we learned that the disciples of Confucius show better than the promoters of the bill who wear the sign of Jesus of Nazareth. Now, the gentleman can drag me into no discussion as to the merits or demerits of the Christian religion as compared with the teachings of the Wise Man of China, but it will afford food for serious reflection to the thousands of Christian promoters of this bill on the Pacific coast when they learn that, in the opinion of the distinguished gentleman, they are not yet ascended to the religious plane of the followers of Confucius.

We learn still further that the amendments incorporated in this bill are frivolous and puerile, and the gentleman takes an hour to tell us so. This is a grave charge made against the representation of three States and two Territories, and, coming from so eminent a source, merits a more than passing consideration. He objects strenuously and with withering sarcasm to the insertion in the first section of the words "from any foreign port or place." To show the necessity of this amendment we have only to cite the decision of Judges Nelson and Lowell, of the United States circuit court of the gentleman's own State, to the effect that a Chinese laborer born in the island of Hong-Kong after its cession to Great Britain is not within the purview of the restriction of the act of 1882 because of the want of some such language in said act, and the per contra decision of Justice Field, delivered in San Francisco September 24, 1883, in the matter of Ah Lung, a similar case. When such distinguished jurists disagree so radically upon the alleged plain letter of the statute, ought not the matter to be made clear by amendment?

But the gentleman, while contending for the puerility of this amendment, admits that section 15, to the effect that "the provisions of this act shall apply to all subjects of China, and Chinese whether subjects of China or of any other foreign power," is not absolutely frivolous. We are indebted to his clemency, and this the more since the section referred to is but a recognition of the substance of the amendment objected to. Section 15 is opposed because it will get us into trouble, possibly war, with England, for which we are wholly unprepared. Not that we would object to it, but that we have no navy. I may be permitted to say that to any one who has even casually kept pace with the current of English policy and English history this is the acme of absurdity.

England cares no more for the inhabitants of Singapore and Hong-Kong than she does for the Hottentot or the Kaffir. They are the fruits of her aggression, the slaves of her will. They are part of her possessions, but not of her people. Her ægis is thrown before them to protect the chattel, not the man; the servant because of the service he can render, not the member of her family who has been wronged. Following out the line of cold commercial policy for the protection of her colonies, she has through those colonies adopted more stringent regulations to prevent Mongolian immigration than are contained in any bill ever submitted to an American Congress. There is nothing to fear on this score. The objection, not the amendment, is frivolous. We violate no treaty stipulation by this act. We exclude now the pauper and the criminal immigrant. We have the same right to exclude a servile and debasing class of foreign labor, and on the same grounds—its inevitable tendency to lower the tone of our civilization by the degradation of our labor. What we require of "the most favored nation" is that the immigrant coming to us from her borders shall be clean-handed, free, capable of assimilating with our people and of understanding and appreciating the blessings of a free government. This is the sum of our requirements, the limit of our concession. We could do no more, no less, for the preservation of our people, the conservation of our honor, and the advancement of our nation. If a war be necessary to protect these, then war be it. While the American people will not invite a contest on these grounds, they will not shrink from it.

The bill is next attacked because in it are provisions making the attempt to land Chinese laborers a misdemeanor and providing that all such laborers brought on any vessel shall not be permitted to land except in case of absolute necessity. The first follows the established policy of criminal statutes and therefore needs no explanation, and the second is equally void of offense. It means simply what it says in plain English. When brought here in violation of law such laborer shall not be allowed to land except in case of absolute necessity. What that necessity shall be is left for judicial determination.

The inquiry is then made why we require that the certificate shall state the individual, family, and tribal name in full of the person presenting the same? It is a matter of some astonishment that a gentleman possessing such a fund of information concerning Chinese character, habits, and customs should have failed to know that every Chinaman has at least three names, the name of his tribe, of his family, and his individual name, the confusion between which is, to those who have had dealings with the race, a matter of common notoriety. The query seems still more strange since the gentleman in the course of his remarks was referred by my colleague, General ROSECRANS, to a report made to the Secretary of the Treasury by Mr. Wasson, in which that fact is mentioned.

The bulk of the argument in opposition to this measure, however, seems to have expended itself in the assertion that Chinese immigration, under the restrictive provisions of the act of 1882, has practically ended and that there is no necessity for further amendment. Reliance in support of this assertion is had upon certain figures compiled by the San Francisco Chronicle and some characteristic utterances clipped from the Argonaut. As to the Argonaut—and I say this simply because the gentleman appears to derive much satisfaction from the statements therein made—it may comfort the gentleman to learn that the editor of that paper has been heretofore one of the foremost advocates on our coast of the policy of not only exclusion but expulsion of Chinese from this country, and so strong has been his feelings and convictions on this score that in 1880, while a delegate to the national Republican convention, he with the balance of the California delegation threatened to jump the party barriers and bolt the convention unless an anti-Chinese plank were placed in the platform. What is more, this threat forced you, as a matter of party policy, to recede from your convictions, your teachings, and the sentimental philanthropy which finds its abode in the breast of the Eastern Republican, and to insert in your national platform a plank that you did not believe in, but did need.

Mr. HENLEY. Pardon me, this same gentleman——

Mr. GLASCOCK. I have but a short time left.

Mr. HENLEY. The time will be extended to you. This same gentleman is on record as having advocated the burning of the steamship company's ships which brought these people to California.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts can find any consolation in that he is welcome to it.

Now, sir, a few words in reference to the figures. It is always safer when figures are dealt with to have those that are official.

In this connection I beg leave to refer to that portion of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, of date January 16, 1884, containing the report of E. L. Sullivan, collector of the port of San Francisco. I will not take up the time of the committee in reading it, but will print it with my remarks.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,
Collector's Office, December 3, 1883.

SIR: Respectfully referring to Department telegram of the 23d ultimo, requesting a statement of the arrival of Chinese at this port for the last few months, &c., I beg to submit the following statement in detail of arrivals and departures since August 4, 1882, deeming that such statement will furnish you more information in regard to the operations of the exclusion act than one covering a shorter period:

* Number for San Francisco.

This sums up a total of 2,652 for this port direct, and 3,558 in transit to other ports and places outside the limits of the United States. Of this number (2,652) 1,814 had return certificates, leaving 838 claiming to be allowed to land for other reasons.

Of this number there were landed by the court on writs of habeas corpus	64
And there are out on bail, cases undecided	9
As laborers under Department ruling of October 26, 1882:
On Chinese consuls' passports	184
On affidavits in most cases authenticated by Chinese consul	130
On affidavits of white persons	168
Those holding "Canton certificates," describing them as traders, &c., but who afterward claimed to be laborers, and entitled to land on account of previous residence, evidence on affidavits of white persons	69
As merchants claiming the right to land on account of previous residence, there were landed:
On Chinese consuls' passports	60
On affidavits of white persons	60
On affidavits of Chinese, vouched by Chinese consul	99
Of merchants resident outside the limits of China at time of passage of the exclusion act there were landed on our consuls' certificates	97
Total	940

The excess of 940 over the 338 to be accounted for was occasioned by the landing of some of those who came in transit, but after arrival substantiated their right to land by evidence of previous residence.

Summary:

Total number of Chinese arriving at San Francisco since August 4, 1882, and up to November 9, 1883		2,652
Number departed during the same period:
Holding return certificates	12,181
Without return certificates	1,905
Excess of departures over arrivals		11,434

The Department will observe that for a long time after the act went into effect the arrivals from China were few, and that they were nearly all of the class holding return certificates, but gradually after the Chinese Government began to issue certificates under section 6 their number increased, and the discrepancy between the apparent condition of the holder and his description in his certificate began to appear.

On the City of Peking, last arrival, concerning which I telegraphed that I was investigating and would report the result, I have to say there were a great many who were evidently laborers holding certificates issued by the Chinese Government, but when it became known that they were doubted and would not probably obtain admission for the holder, the plea of being a merchant or trader was abandoned, and the one set up that the holder was a laborer entitled to land by reason of previous residence, and in most cases they established this fact by evidence satisfactory to myself and the surveyor.

This goes to show that, as I have previously intimated to the Department, the method of issuing certificates in China is very loose.

On the arrival of the Arabic, which is not included in the foregoing statistics, the discrepancy was still more noticeable, and I determined to refuse landing in each case where there was a doubt raised by the appearance, conversation, &c., of the holder of a certificate without further investigation, having learned from the interpreter, Long Sing, that he had questioned each one before he had communicated with his friends on shore, leaving the alleged merchant or trader, as the case might be, to carry his case into court if he chose to do so.

A great deal of difficulty is experienced in obtaining a proper interpretation of the Chinese certificates to ascertain if they correspond with the English therein, and I have been compelled to employ intelligent Chinese who understand English for this purpose as temporary laborers.

The last one, Long Sing, has been intimidated by enraged Chinese from appearing in court in the case of the Arabic's passengers, and consequently the Government could not substantiate by him the facts ascertained on inquiry on the vessel.

This covers a period of about fourteen and a half months. During that time, from August 4, 1882, to November 9, 1883, Chinese to the number of 2,652 landed at San Francisco. The number departing was 14,086, but of these it will be noted that 12,181 held return certificates, leaving a net departure of 1,905. In this connection it will also be noticed that within said time 3,558 Chinese entered San Francisco in transit for places outside the United States. That this furnishes opportunity for an evasion of the act, let me call your attention to what E. L. Sullivan reports to the Secretary of the Treasury, August 13, 1883:

There are various subterfuges to which Chinese resort to gain illegal entrance, such as purchasing tickets in transit through the United States from Hong-Kong to Victoria, British Columbia, for instance; then when they are landed in the United States under the provisions of Department circular of January 23, 1883, it is an easy matter to obtain a certificate at the custom-house by false representations entitling them to return. Of course after this has been obtained it is easily concealed, and the Chinaman continues on his voyage to Victoria with an innocent countenance, to return on the next steamer and demand admission upon his certificate.

How many of these constitute a part of the 12,181 departures it is impossible to tell. Let me also call your attention to the report to Secretary of Treasury made by A. W. Bush, collector at Port Townsend:

Now, many thousands of Chinese arrive at Victoria direct from China, and it is estimated that there are now in British Columbia from 12,000 to 15,000 of them. If it is not necessary for Chinese laborers coming to the sound via Victoria to have passports, there will be afforded to persons so disposed opportunities for importing any number of Chinamen from Victoria, as the ordinary passenger descriptive-list is wholly insufficient to identify the Chinaman; and we at this port will not be able to ascertain where said Chinamen are from, whether from San Francisco or some intermediate foreign port, as in the following case: A vessel sails from San Francisco for Puget Sound via Hong-Kong, having on board five hundred Chinamen whose destination is Seattle, Wash. If no passports are required from San Francisco how may we know whether the five hundred have not be (been) exchanged for five hundred other Chinese; but on the other hand, in case passports were granted at San Francisco, then we can, by reference to the certificates, easily determine their identity, and this would also prevent the shipping into the country fresh Chinese in the place and stead of those old and decrepit who go home to die.

Knowing the Chinese character for cunning and duplicity, we are not slow to imagine that they have not failed to avail themselves of this opportunity.

Be this as it may, we know that large numbers of Chinese have come into this country and are coming in in violation of the act sought to be amended. Our northern and southern frontiers, being loosely guarded, furnish ample facilities.

W. H. W. Wassen, special agent, reporting to Secretary of Treasury from Port Townsend, November 22, 1883, says:

SIR: Since my arrival in the collection district of Puget Sound a large share of my time has been given to the discovery of the truth or falsity of the many reports recently circulated through the public press of violations of the Chinese exclusion act in this Territory.

I have visited and closely investigated all the localities near the boundary line where Chinese subjects would be likely to cross. Careful inquiry has been made at the several places visited and the principal localites where Chinese reside, and my firm belief is that in very many cases the reports published are true, and that violations have occurred both by land and water.

There are about 13,000 Chinese in British Columbia within thirty miles of the northern boundary of Washington Territory. Fifteen hundred have recently been discharged from the employ of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, and 3,500 more will be discharged on or before January 1, 1884. There are 2,500 unemployed Chinese in and about the city of Victoria. In addition there have been about 1,500 recently discharged from canneries on the Frazer River. There are, therefore, between 8,000 and 9,000 Chinese laborers just across the border who are now, or will be by January 1, 1884, out of employment and looking for means of subsistence, and there is not a single Chinaman in the whole lot who does not cast longing eyes to the country just this side of the line. Not contented with viewing the promised land from afar, they at once devise plans whereby they can be surreptitiously landed into the United States. They employ unscrupulous white men, to whom they pay large sums of money to pilot them through, who fully understand the secret avenues of egress, both by land and water, eluding the vigilance of frontier customs officers by these unprotected and exposed routes.

Why should they not come? They are subject to no risk in making the attempt save that of being arrested and sent back; they incur no penalty or forfeiture, and the next day repeat the attempt, and so continue until they smuggle themselves, with all that the word implies, into a country they are positively forbidden to enter. From a point where the forty-ninth parallel strikes Semiahmoo Bay there is an unprotected portion of the line between the United States and British Columbia thirty-six miles long. This portion of the country has many trails and roads whereby Chinese laborers can conveniently cross. These routes also afford great opportunity to smuggle opium and other merchandise.

Within the last two months one hundred and twenty-five Chinese, at the least calculation, have come into the United States by those routes alone in violation of law.

In this locality there is but one inspector, located at Schome, with instructions to visit different points by land and water. This is entirely too much country for one officer to successfully operate with benefit to the customs-revenue service.

I would therefore suggest that the Department give special instructions to the collector to station two additional customs officers on this unprotected line. It seems important that this should be done without delay.

In my opinion Congress should be asked to affix a penalty to the Chinese restriction act of May 6, 1882, otherwise it will become a dead letter so far as regards the enforcement of the law on the northern frontier.

Does this furnish no food for reflection? Is not this the proof demanded by the gentleman from Massachusetts as to the fact of unlawful immigration across our border?

For these reasons we have asked in good faith that the law, wherein it has been found to be defective, should be amended. We have asked that our borders be protected as well as our ports. To do this at a saving of great expense to the Government we ask that peace officers be clothed with the powers of United States deputy marshals for the purposes of this act. To save frauds and evasions of the law at our ports of entry we have inserted the amendments in sections 4 and 6, which have not been referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts. It has been found that the affidavit system of admission has been productive of more trouble and fraud than profit. We have provided that the certificate shall be the sole evidence admissible to prove right of entry. It has been found that the Chinese Government has been extremely careless, to say the least, in the issuance of merchant, traveler, and student certificates. In proof of this I refer you to the report to Secretary of Treasury made by J. M. Morton, surveyor of the port of San Francisco, October 26, 1883, in which he says:

It is a noticeable fact that the number of merchants or "traders" arriving from China has steadily increased since the customs officials at Canton have been prepared to issue these certificates. That such increase is due, in a measure at least, to the facility with which all classes are enabled to procure the Canton certificates seems apparent. The very simplicity and honesty of some of the alleged "traders" furnish proof of this, as may be witnessed in their replies to interrogatories addressed to them by customs officers here. For instance, in answer to the question, "What is your occupation?" one will say, "I am a porter in a store."

Q. "Have you an interest in the business?"

A. "No; I work for a salary." Another will reply, "I deal in fish or matches."

Q. "Where is your place of business?"

A. "I have none; I peddle them on the street."

It is hardly possible that such persons could have been subjected to a very rigid examination at Canton looking to the establishment of their claim to belong to the class "other than laborers" and entitling them to come within the United States. Undoubtedly, by proper inquiry, the Canton official could have elicited the same candid answers as did the customs officers here, in which event the certificates could not have been consistently or lawfully issued. To what extent the law is being evaded by the issuance of these certificates can not, of course, be stated. If the authorities at Canton do not exercise greater care and vigilance in the matter of examining applicants for such papers than has apparently been the case up to this time the evasion in this respect will prove to be material, for it can not be expected that customs officers here, as a rule, will be able to expose such frauds as may be practiced upon the authorities at Canton, unless it be that Chinese "traders" are generally as guileless and unsophisticated as were the peddlers and porters above referred to, who innocently answered all the questions propounded to them, and thereby destroyed their chances of getting into the country.

The effect of this carelessness in the issuance of certificates has been to fill the Federal courts upon our coast with habeas corpus cases to the exclusion of all other and more important business. Judge Hoffman, cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts with so much unction, rendering the decision of the court in a case on which he sat in banc with Judges Sawyer and Sabin, January 19, 1884, said:

We also think it proper to avail ourselves of this occasion, as this opinion may possibly attract some public attention, to say that if the Chinese immigrants come in the future in anything like the number in which they have recently arrived it will be impossible for the courts to fulfill their ordinary functions if these habeas corpus cases are to be investigated and disposed of. There remains on the calendar of the district court, I am informed, one hundred and ninety cases. For five or six weeks, even with night sessions, I have been unable to make any great impression on them. All ordinary business, public and private, of the court is necessarily suspended, or if resumed, these passengers, many of whom may be entitled to their discharge, are left either incarcerated or on bail without the determination of their cases. It is impossible for the courts if the Chinese continue to arrive in such large numbers as heretofore, to attend to those cases and discharge the ordinary current business of the courts.

It will be seen this decision was rendered at the time when, according to the gentleman from Massachusetts, immigration had practically stopped. Sir, the position assumed by the opponents of this bill is not tenable. The expressed intention of the act of 1882 was to suspend the immigration of Chinese laborers for ten years. We have shown that the act is defective, that they still continue to come in violation of law. It is no answer to the proof of this defect to say that the number of arrivals has greatly diminished. The act is good so far as it goes. Our people do not object to its purpose, but to its partial failure to perform the offices of its creation. Those who criticise us condemn the original act. Every argument used against us shows how little is known of the true status of the question and of the true character of the people sought to be kept out. Our people are not timid nor are they jealous. They are open-handed, free, brave, and generous. We want immigration in the West, but not such as this; we want men who will not only be with us but of us, men of home life and home ties. We are not prepared to surrender even a small portion of this great heritage of ours to an alien race, unassimilating, cunning, and treacherous; a race that looks upon our institutions and civilization with contempt, that changes not nor does it progress, that comes among us for gain and not for residence, that is debasing in all its attributes.

Mr. Chairman, we can not compete in the struggle of existence with such a people. Anglo-Saxon civilization, with all its pride of ancestry and achievement, can not stand before it. It has a power of passive endurance, a grim tenacity, a cunning of hand, and a frugality that defies Caucasian energy and competition. These two civilizations can not flourish together. One must dominate. I am no alarmist. I believe in the future of our country and the advancement of our people; but I believe that that future is to be made bright, that advancement certain, only in proportion as we preserve the manhood of our people from the debasing influence of a civilization that touches but to destroy.

Mr. EATON. I now yield ten minutes to my friend from California, Mr. BUDD.

Mr. BUDD. I would prefer that the gentleman should yield to my colleague, Mr. SUMNER.

Mr. EATON. Then I will yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from California, Mr. SUMNER.

Mr. SUMNER, of California, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great attention to what the gentlemen from California have said as to the need of new legislation to stop Chinese immigration, and so far I have failed to hear one of them say that there is any Chinese immigration coming to their State to-day. It is a bill which is entitled "to execute certain treaty stipulations," and it departs flagrantly from the particular treaty upon which it professes to be based and violates a dozen others. The bill is unfortunate. On its face its very principle of exclusion and proscription is repugnant to an American, and it is for that reason I have listened the more attentively to hear if those gentlemen could at this time give to us some satisfactory reason or some urgent facts to justify us in again taking so revolting a dose as this House swallowed two years ago when the restriction bill was passed.

You remember well, every member of the last Congress can remember, the sensational telegrams which were then read showing impending danger of disorder and the magnitude of the coming flood of Chinese about to inundate our civilization with paganism and barbarism. To-day this bill comes which is harsher in its provisions and still more repugnant to our notions of the equality of man, to the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and to the doctrines for which our Department of State has contended in all its disputes with foreign governments since it was organized, the right of the people of one country to visit and sojourn in any other, the complete protection of the citizen everywhere by his government. No other country has contended more vigorously than ours for the right of free intercourse.

There is no need of this bill to amend the law now in force. It is useless and it is capable of a great deal of mischief. There is no excuse for it. When the other bill came up two years ago many gentlemen who now sit around me voted for it, though with reluctance, remembering with something of tender regret all the grand declarations they had been in the habit of making on the Fourth of July about our broad and hospitable country to whose shores every man and woman in the world, whatever their religion, their language, or their belief, were welcome. It was contrary to the democratic spirit in a country peopled by immigrants, contrary to the genius of our institutions, to proscribe immigration. But the pressure from California was great; all sympathized with their fears, and the yielding disposition of those from sister States made them so far waive all there was in these cherished traditions that they voted for that bill. It became a law. The great flood was checked. It diminished from month to month and from day to day until it now has in fact ceased. Wishing to obtain as reliable and recent information as I could on this subject I inquired last evening, and have this morning the following official letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., May 2, 1883.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry I have the honor to inform you that the number of Chinese immigrants arrived in the United States from October 1, 1883, to March 31, 1884, was as follows:

At San Francisco	343
At Port Townsend	105
At all other ports	7

The following were the occupations of these Chinese immigrants:

Merchants	287
Without occupation (of whom 47 were females)	58

Respectfully,

JOSEPH NIMMO, JR.,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. R. R. HITT, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

This statement covers the period of six months just passed. It thus appears that the "merchants" who came in that half a year—and they are the men aimed at in this bill—numbered 287; they are the men who are entitled by the treaty to come and go when they will upon certificates by the Chinese Government. But our California friends say many of these "merchants" are in truth laborers, falsely certified as merchants, and they want this stricter law to prohibit the invasion of cheap Chinese labor. California is afraid public order will be disturbed in this great nation if some fraction of two hundred and eighty-seven shall in six months get in and prove afterward to be laborers. But even this petty number has stopped.

I am advised unofficially that the arrivals stated by Mr. Nimmo were nearly all in the months prior to January, 1884, and that the last five steamers have brought none. The truth is that last fall, long before this Congress met, complaint being made that there was some fraud in certificates going on at Canton, whence all Chinese come to California, the Chinese Government took hold of the matter promptly, the officer who had committed the frauds was dismissed and punished, an example was made of him, and an order was issued soon after by which the issue of all certificates to "merchants" was stopped.

The persons mentioned by Mr. Nimmo as "laborers" are Chinamen who were in California when the law of May 6, 1882, was passed, and are exempted from its provisions, being entitled to go home to China and return to California when they please, taking with them certificates from our own custom-house officers.

Owing to the stoppage of the certificates by the Chinese government, an act of good faith on their part, Chinese immigration is now substantially at an end. The rulers of that country are disposed, as is the government of every wise nation, to avoid foreign complication. It is really one of the most cautious governments in the world, and generally governments are reluctant to see their citizens go to foreign lands.

The statement contained in the opinion of Judge Ogden Hoffman, of San Francisco, which was cited by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] gives figures, which other gentlemen have mentioned, showing arrivals of Chinese at San Francisco from August 6, 1882, to January 15, 1884, 3,415; departures, 17,088—coming down only to January last, since when it has stopped. And the judge makes this warning remark, which is full of significance coming from a public man of such distinguished position in California:

> Not only has the flood of Chinese immigration with which we were menaced been staid, but a process of depletion has been going on which could not be considerably increased without serious disturbance to the established industries of the State. It is stated that the wages of Chinese laborers have advanced from $1 to $1.75 per diem, a fact of much significance if true.
> It is much to be regretted that the notion that the law has, through its own defects or the fault of the courts, proved practically inoperative has been so widely and persistently disseminated.

Those words were uttered by Judge Hoffman from the bench on the 31st of last January. Already the prophecy contained in his remarks has been verified, as all my California friends well know, for since even that recent decision John Chinaman has ceased to be "cheap John," has struck for higher wages, and established industries are disturbed. As their numbers have diminished, as the 20,000 Chinamen have returned home, the remainder have raised the price of their labor. The cigar-makers of San Francisco, for instance, over 3,000 in number, struck for wages so high that a lockout ensued, and the manufacturers sent to the Atlantic coast for others with whom to replace them. Twenty-five hundred have been taken there, and John Chinaman, now too high priced, has gone out of those establishments. As the judge anticipated, the great industrial interests of the State are being deranged by the too rapid depletion and rise in price of the Chinese laboring population, to which California industries have become accustomed.

The facts that no new one comes in, that thousands steadily pour out homeward, that there is a pressure of public opinion and of general personal dislike operating to push them out of the country, that by the course of nature men will die—all these causes tend to their speedy diminution, while there is nothing operating to an increase. This process is solving the Chinese question quietly, healthfully, according to the great laws of political economy.

In Oregon, as the honorable gentleman from that State so well knows, the price of Chinese labor has gone up so high that there is now no difference between it and the price of ordinary labor. San Francisco is pretty near the same condition. Ah Sin is no longer dreaded and Dennis Kearney's occupation is gone, not ruined by cheap Chinese labor, but by their exacting demands, which are putting them out of the way of other workmen. The "Sand Lots" feeling can no longer be invoked. In fact, the political agitation in that region to-day is scarce more than the remains, the echo, the feebler continuation of the passionate outbreak of dislike to the cheap and multitudinous Chinese, present and pouring in, that threatened California three or four years ago. But that danger is passed. The action of the Chinese Government in stopping certificates has ended even the petty driblet that crept through after the great flood was checked.

These restrictions by the Chinese Government on the other side have been established spontaneously and sincerely. There is therefore no likelihood at all that any different policy will be adopted there, nor the least cause for expecting a revival of Chinese labor immigration. Then why ask us again to pass this measure, so obnoxious in its principle and in this amended form far harsher than ever, with new provisions of positive mischief?

The restrictions contained in the fourth section, imposed on travelers and merchants, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] has explained so forcibly and so luminously that I need not attempt to repeat what he said. They are harsh and stringent. In the treaty with China, upon which treaty this proposed legislation is assumed to be based, is a provision that Chinamen other than laborers shall have the right to go and to come of their own free will, that they shall have in all respects the rights guaranteed to citizens of the most favored nations.

There is no citizen of any country in Europe who is entitled to freer ingress to the port of New York than is a Chinese merchant to come into San Francisco or whatever other port in this country he chooses to enter. That is a solemn provision of that treaty, and now to carry out that provision it is proposed in very mockery that these harsh, revolting, inquisitorial provisions shall be enacted by Congress.

What are they? It is proposed that when a Chinese merchant or traveler comes into this country he shall be stopped and asked, "How much money have you? What is your financial standing? Are you going through the country, or will you stop here? Where did you last reside? What have you been doing?" and so on. A long inquisitorial section is provided here which we have never dared to offer to other nations whose citizens have the same treaty protection for free ingress and egress to and from this country.

That section has provisions harsher than were adopted during the dynamite panic by the Russian military authorities. It is more prying and exacting than is exacted or was exacted from a man going into Russia in a time of their greatest severity, as many gentlemen on this floor know by experience. From that autocracy we can learn lessons of liberality, of civilization, and of Christian tolerance in dealing with enlightened merchants who travel through the world.

But all that I have discussed is the smallest and least important part of this bill. The essence of the bill, upon which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAMB] in charge of the bill keeps his eye all the way through, is that brief provision in the fifteenth section:

> That the provisions of this act shall apply to all subjects of China, and Chinese whether subjects of China or any other foreign power.

There are many hundred thousands who are Chinese in blood, in language, in race, who are subjects and citizens of various other great powers than China.

We have treaties with them guaranteeing to Americans the right to go and sojourn in their countries, and to their subjects the right to come freely and pass through or reside here. In utter violation of these treaties the bill proposes to exclude Chinese persons who are subjects of any of these great powers, born under their flag and owing them allegiance.

As my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] has stated to you, there are more than 100,000 persons of the Chinese race at Hong-Kong who are subjects of the Queen of Great Britain; and his illustration of the difficulties which would arise in case a British ship, manned by British subjects of the Chinese race, and coming into one of our ports, should be harassed under the provisions of this bill shows very fairly the unreason, the disregard of treaties, and the endless embarrassments it may bring upon us. But that is only one illustration of one country. We have treaties with England, France, Spain, Holland, Portugal, Brazil, and several other powers that have among their subjects great numbers of persons of the Chinese race. And this bill, should it be passed, can any day lead us into complications and troubles with any of these nations.

There is the English city of Singapore, with 30,000 Chinese; the Portugese cities and islands, with over 70,000 Chinese; the islands of Java and Sumatra, belonging to Holland, with thousands of Chinese among their subjects; the French possessions at Saigon and the adjoining regions north; the great Spanish city of Manila. Subjects of all these powers are to be dealt with by this bill. It declares boldly that it applies with its every restriction to them all in spite of treaties, guaranteeing free intercourse and of international law and the sacred faith of the nation.

It is no answer to say that the English themselves in Australia exclude Chinese laborers. This is a provision to harry English subjects and subjects of other governments who are not laborers at all, but travelers and merchants. It is so bald a violation of our treaty obligations with many nations that the case can not be made stronger by any argument than it is by the statement. We have in our treaties declared that all citizens and subjects of these governments should have with respect to the United States the right of free entry and residence, and we have the "most favored nation" clause in almost every treaty. I have often met at Paris a gentleman of the Chinese race, a distinguished scholar, who is a professor in the most splendid university in Europe. He is a French citizen, has a French wife and family. If he, though a learned man, should think he could instruct himself by listening to the debates of this body, before he could reach Washington he would have to be subjected to all the indignities contemplated by the sixth section of this bill. How long do you think it would be before the French minister would be inquiring at our State Department to know whether French citizens were to be outraged in such a manner; whether all the obligations of treaty and of international law, which is wider and older than treaties, were to be disregarded? The fact is the right of peaceable citizens, in ordinary times, to enter a country and depart at will has been so universally recognized that of late it is rarely inserted in a treaty at all. It is a generally accepted doctrine and part of the modern civilization among the most enlightened nations. Even passports are rapidly being dispensed with.

This bill, the gentlemen from California say, is intended to make law of Judge Field's decision where he held that a British subject of Chinese race and born at Hong-Kong, coming to San Francisco, was excluded from landing by the provisions of the act of May, 1882; while Judges Nelson and Lowell, of Massachusetts, held that such a person landing at Boston was not. Gentlemen have spoken of that decision as showing that the law of May, 1882, and the treaty with China cover English subjects; the law carrying out what was the true meaning of the treaty, which they propose now to put beyond doubt. Judge Field says nothing as to the meaning of the treaty. He so construes the law as to find that a British subject was aimed at; but when he comes to the meaning of the treaty he says, that was a question for those who voted for the law to decide—and it is for you to-day to pass upon. I read the language of Judge Field:

An act of Congress upon a subject within its legislative power is as binding upon the courts as a treaty on the same subject. Both are binding, except as the latter one conflicts with or interferes with the former. If the nation with whom we have made the treaty objects to the action of the legislative department, it may present its complaint to the executive department and take such other measures as it may deem that justice to its own citizens or subjects requires. The courts can not heed such complaint, nor refuse to give effect to a law of Congress, however much it may seem to conflict with the stipulations of the treaty. Whether a treaty has been violated by our legislation so as to be the proper occasion of complaint by the foreign government is not a judicial question.

It is for us to-day in voting upon this bill to decide whether we will undertake to override that treaty with China and disregard all our other treaties with nations having persons of the Chinese race among their subjects.

Even if this particular legislation should not immediately lead to any very great practical consequences in the way of complications or disturbances as regards our relations with China or with other powers, it is a precedent that we make, a false doctrine we act upon, a record of error that is sure to come back to plague us; for it will return in that way. We are to-day pressing upon Spain, and have been in constantly arising cases for twenty years, every consideration we can present for the protection of the rights of American citizens sojourning in Spanish possessions, especially Cuba. We are pressing that doctrine to its utmost verge. We have been in almost incessant correspondence and dispute in regard to American citizens in Ireland, urging their right to sojourn, to freely enter and depart. We have pressed the doctrine to its most liberal interpretation everywhere.

By this bill we propose to establish the principle that a government can exclude peaceable subjects of friendly powers in disregard of treaty. Let us not be too fast. We may have cause to repent, even if we care not for principle or right.

The precedents that were established during the war, when Mr. Seward felt constrained at times to lay a strong hand upon foreigners denizened here, have come back since (how often gentlemen know who choose to peruse the diplomatic correspondence) to embarrass us in reference to that which we have most at heart—the protection of Americans abroad, especially those who are foreign-born, going back to Ireland and Germany.

I need not go further in illustration. The bill is an abandonment of the general doctrine which we have all been proud to profess all our lives, which we have never yielded save once, in passing the original Chinese immigration bill, and then upon a great necessity which we believed justified us in departing for the time from the accepted American faith, that our shores should ever welcome every man and woman who came. At this time, when we are asked to re-enact the former bill in a harsher and more repulsive form, there is no urgent reason, no dread of a great flood of Chinamen, no practical result or benefit to induce us to take this action or excuse us for it. There is no such immigration as that which the bill proposes to regulate or prohibit. The measure does not carry out any treaty stipulation whatever, notwithstanding its title professes it. That object was long ago practically attained. It will lead to infinite embarrassment in its defiance of public law, of the usages of international intercourse, of the doctrines which we have often professed in our intercourse with this very Empire of China and with a dozen other great nationalities with which it is our highest interest to maintain friendly and mutually profitable commercial relations.

Mr. LAMB. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY].

Mr. CASSIDY. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to detain the committee to submit more than a single expression on this question. During the last Congress the act prohibiting cooly immigration to this country was discussed in all its bearings; and the Congress of the United States by the law then enacted settled the policy of this Government with reference to this subject.

The bill under consideration does not in any sense change that policy; nor does it in my judgment in any sense contravene the treaty between this Government and the Chinese Empire. Under that treaty we have been given the power to exclude a certain class of Chinese. We have the right to suspend, prohibit, or limit the coming of cooly laborers to this country, and no gentleman has undertaken to say to this House that the amended bill under consideration anywhere conflicts with the rights conferred by that treaty. We have simply sought to make the law which was enacted by the last Congress fully operative and effective. We have, where it has been found nugatory, or has been evaded, endeavored by the bill to make provisions which shall carry out the original intention of Congress under the enactment of the law passed at the last session.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman propose to treat of the violation of treaties with other nations as alleged to be in this bill? I hope he will give us some information on that point.

Mr. CASSIDY. I have not considered that this bill goes to that extent. As originally drafted the intention was, and Judge Field so held, that these people were to be treated as a race. Judge Field gave that construction to the law, and I hold that Congress has the right, if it sees proper to exercise it, to infringe treaties with other countries by act of Congress to the extent of terminating such treaties and all treaties; the right, I think, is undoubted; public policy might dictate a different course, but the right can hardly be questioned.

Mr. RICE. Have you any doubt this act as it reads would violate the treaty?

Mr. CASSIDY. In theory it might; practically, it would not.

Mr. RICE. In theory it would.

Mr. CASSIDY. It excludes the importation of coolies alone. It will not infringe treaties with any government. It will not be applicable to any other country than the Chinese Empire, because these coolies do not come from other countries, and hence the bill can not in any manner be made applicable to other countries.

I have undertaken to show that by this amended bill we make no change of policy. None is contemplated. We merely seek to make effective the law enacted by a prior Congress which proved inoperative and abortive.

All political parties in this country are committed to the doctrine that the further coming of cooly slaves to this country shall be prohibited. Both national conventions in 1876 inserted in their platforms resolutions to that effect. Similar resolutions were included in both platforms of both national parties again in 1880. So then, in enacting the law, in seeking to make it effective, we are simply recording the will of both great national parties of this country as expressed by their national conventions for the last eight years.

I have been a little astonished that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] should have sought to raise here the race question in connection with the consideration of this amended bill seeking to revise the doctrine that we are discriminating against the Chinamen, and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] intimated as much also, that we are against the Chinaman because his skin is yellow.

Mr. RICE. Oh, no. I said because he had no vote.

Mr. CASSIDY. Is the gentleman in favor of conferring the elective franchise on the Chinaman?

I assure gentlemen on this floor that the people of the Pacific coast care nothing about the color of a man's skin. They are against the Chinaman not because his skin is yellow, but because of the debased civilization which he brings to this country; because he does not assimilate with us; because he does not come as other emigrants come to this country, freely and voluntarily to enjoy the blessings of our free Government. I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that no Chinaman has ever yet come to the United States because he loved freedom and hated oppression. No living man of them ever came with that idea, or from any appreciation of the blessings of liberty and free government in this country. They do not come as European emigrants come to this country. They do not come to be of us and with us and to be citizens of this great Republic. They come in every instance merely to better their condition from a financial point of view, stipulating even in the contracts they make before leaving home that after death their bones shall be taken back to China. These are our objections; and these are the reasons, Mr. Chairman, why we are opposed to the further coming of these obnoxious people; and these are the reasons why we seek to make the original law effective.

Mr. EATON. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from California, Mr. TULLY.

Mr. TULLY. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to consume any great length of time in this discussion. I do not know that I will be able to enlighten the House much upon the subject. As I understand the question, this act is simply an amendment which proposes to cure the defects in the original law, nothing more or nothing less; and here I want to say to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts who leads the opposition, that with a thirty-odd years' residence in California I think I may be permitted to say I know more about the Chinese question than he does. At least if we had here under discussion a question relating to the characteristics, the habits, and the customs of a race of people dwelling in Boston, or any other part of Massachusetts, I would concede, to begin with, that the gentleman himself was better prepared to advise upon that subject than myself. I think, therefore, that it is no egotism on my part to say that I am better posted on the Chinese question than he is.

Now, my colleague stated that in a vote a few years ago upon this question, a direct vote, a few hundred men against 150,000 voted in favor of this Chinese immigration. I want to add that in 1878 there was a constitutional convention held in California, which was composed of one hundred and fifty-two members. I had the honor of being a member of that convention, and they were elected upon a non-partisan ticket. They were composed largely of non-partisans. There was no politics in it; none entered into the construction of that convention; they were chosen one Democrat and one Republican. And that convention memorialized Congress upon that subject; and out of one hundred and fifty-two men in that convention only one man was found to vote in favor of Chinese immigration. The Republicans of that constitutional convention—such men as Judge McShafter, a New Englander by birth, and I presume reared in the same political faith as the gentleman from Massachusetts—led in the debates, urging that memorial to be sent on to Congress. And I think if the gentleman from Massachusetts had resided for a few years in California he would see cause to change his opinion in relation to this matter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in September, 1883, Judge Field, speaking upon this question, rendered a decision in which he makes use of this language, and I want to call the attention of the House to it for he states the whole question in a nutshell and does not talk about the Chinese philosophy as derived from the teachings of Confucius. But in considering the act of Congress, and giving the reasons which induced his decision, he says:

were adopted a great number of Chinese had emigrated to this State (California), and after their adoption the immigration largely increased. But notwithstanding the favorable provisions of the treaty, it was found impossible for them to assimilate with our people. Their physical characteristics and habits kept them as distinct and separate as though still living in China. They engaged in all the industries and pursuits of the State; they came in competition with white laborers in every direction; and their frugal habits, the absence of families, their singular ability to live in narrow quarters without apparent injury to health, their contentment with the simplest fare, gave them in this competition great advantage over our laborers and mechanics (7 Sawyer, 549). They could live with apparent comfort on what would prove almost starvation to white men. Our laborers and mechanics are not content, and never should be, with the means of bare subsistence. They must have something beyond this for the comforts of home, the support of a family, and the education of children. Competition with Chinese labor under the conditions mentioned was necessarily irritating and exasperating, and often led to collisions between persons of the two races. It was seen that without some restriction upon the immigration of the Chinese white laborers and mechanics would be driven from the State.

That, gentlemen, is the language of Judge Field, a man who has lived thirty-odd years upon the Pacific coast, a man who knows perhaps as much of the habits, characteristics, industries, and resources of California and the condition of its people as any living man. He tells you that it is found impossible for these people to live harmoniously together with our laborers. He says it is impossible for this class of labor to commingle with the white labor of this country. It is my own observation that wherever the Chinese have gone into any trade or avocation the white labor is compelled to desert it. You need only to look at any factories started in San Francisco, whether it be a shoe manufacturing establishment, a cigar manufactory, or any other class of industry where you find the Chinese at work, and you will not find among them any white laborers.

You go upon the strawberry farms, and where you find them engaged in picking strawberries by gangs you find no white men at work with them. Where they are hired in the harvest-fields and take possession of the headers and gather the grain, you do not find any white men where they are. They are extending their operations into the dairy business in California, and when they take hold of a dairy the white laborers disappear. They go into the fields of my district and gather the beans, which are a profitable crop in my country; and then the white laborers go out. This is simply a question whether you prefer to give the labor of California to white men—men of our own race and kindred—or whether you wish to give it to Chinamen?

I say further that these men contribute nothing comparatively to the support of the government of the State of California or of the United States. The common Chinaman pays no taxes whatever—no man who is familiar with him will deny this assertion—save and except when you get a small poll-tax from him. For under our statute there you can compel the employer to pay the poll-tax of the employé; if you can find a man that is indebted to him you will get that. They own no personal property whatever, save and except a few merchants. The common Chinaman carries all his belongings in a pack on his back; he lives in these little hovels which have been described, moves when he wants to, and is responsible to nobody. As fast as their money is made they ship it to their own country. They make no investment in real estate or property of any kind. They contribute nothing to the building of schools, to the making of roads, or enhancing the value of property—nothing whatever. All they make they ship monthly to their own country.

I know what I am talking about. I am familiar with these Chinamen. I have lived among them and have done business for them in a large section of country for many years; and when I make these assertions I know them to be true.

In reference to the fitness of these people to become citizens of our Government, let me say that they know and care nothing for your American institutions. They have laws and enforce them on their tribes in the State of California, even, Mr. Chairman, to the putting of men to death for violating their social customs. Any man who is familiar with the character of the Chinaman and who is familiar with his habits will tell you this is true. As regards his moral character, he has none so far as my observation goes. I do not speak against the whole race, but in over thirty years' experience with those people I have never met a Chinaman who had the slightest moral sense of right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICE. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN].

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from Massachusetts to say only a word on this bill.

It was a question sure to receive full discussion, and it has. There are many objections to the bill, and they have been presented most clearly in the elaborate and exhaustive arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT]. Any of these would seem to be sufficient to induce a man to vote against a bill so unjust and unnecessary. But there is one reason—not sentimental, not political—which ought to be conclusive, and that is the one which I wish again to call the attention of this House to.

If you pass this bill you break the treaty with China and give her fresh cause of offense. But that is China, and I suppose you do not care. But you must also break your treaties with Great Britain, with France, with Germany, with all the powers of Europe. That is a different matter, and I for my part see no reason why, to keep out seven hundred Chinese a year, we should proceed to the measures suggested in this bill, which would abrogate them all. Is this worth while?

Mr. RICE. I yield five minutes to my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN].

Mr. LYMAN. A beautiful passage in the Book of Common Prayer adjures us to confess and acknowledge our manifold sins and wickedness. Therefore I shall begin by confessing a sin of my native State in order that I may gracefully proceed afterward to call attention to the sins of a sister State, California. It is thirty years ago that there arose in Massachusetts a movement called the Know-Nothing movement. It was directed against the Irish. What did they say about the Irish? They said that they were Roman Catholics, and therefore could not come here; that they were dirty, and therefore could not come here; that they were ignorant, and therefore could not come here. The Know-Nothing movement swept the State of Massachusetts that year and elected a governor, and then it died out, as it ought to have died out. I cast my first vote in that election. I am proud to say I cast it against that movement, for I remembered that my own father, stout Protestant as he was, had subscribed money to put up a Roman Catholic church in Boston that the Irish might have a place of worship.

I voted against that movement. And now, what has been the result? The vote of Boston is controlled by the Irish to-day. But we manage to live and make money. Two of my most honored colleagues on this floor are Irish by birth, and I see many more in this House among our most valued members who are Irish or the sons of Irishmen. Now, sir, I am not going to compare the Irish to the Chinese or to any other race. I only give this as an instance, for this outcry was not primarily against the Irish as a race or as a nation. It was because they came to Boston and Massachusetts and worked for smaller wages than Americans would take. That was the reason of the outcry against them, and that is the reason of the outcry against the Chinese in California to-day, and that alone. I will demonstrate that out of the very mouths of my friends from California who have spoken to-day.

They have told us that the Chinese universally are liars and thieves, that they practice infanticide, that they are guilty of acts of immorality, that they are altogether bestial. Very well; if they are, then what do people employ them for? What does this exalted nation which is so moral, so Christian, so temperate, and so good, employ them for?

When I visited California I found these Chinese as butlers in houses taking care of the silver, as nurses taking care of the children; I found them employed as cooks; I found them everywhere employed and trusted. Now if they are such an infernal pack of scoundrels, why do the people there employ them? It is all nonsense.

Mr. HENLEY. I will explain to the gentleman if he desires.

Mr. LYMAN. I have only five minutes; otherwise I would yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. HENLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. LYMAN. I found them employed and trusted everywhere, and a quiet, laborious people. I will not say that I am opposed to excluding given races from this country; I am not going to lay down any such principle as that. But I say that when we do exclude any persons we should do it consistently. We should exclude all the Mongolians of all types, all the negro types, all the types and races which we do not consider quite equal to ourselves, and not draw a line so as to exclude only these particular Mongolians. There is no sense in that; no justice in it.

We have to-day in this country 5,000,000 of negroes, more or less, to whom we have given the right of suffrage. Every one knows that the negro type is certainly not higher than the Mongolian or yellow type.

Have they destroyed us? Here are my honored friends on the other side from the South who live among the negroes, side by side with them and in fellowship with them. I do not say it is a good thing, but it is a possible thing; that is all I say.

Mr. SPRINGER. They are citizens; that is the difference.

Mr. LYMAN. We made them citizens.

Mr. BRENTS. And you can not make the Chinese citizens; that is an impossibility.

Mr. LYMAN. I do not say that you can. Let us, I say, if we have any law on this subject, have a consistent law that will exclude whole races and whole nations.

Mr. POLAND. I have been somewhat amused to see how easily gentlemen can support this bill, and for reasons which they entirely ignore and disregard in supporting another bill which has now for days been debated in this House.

A great deal has been said about the morals, habits, and religion of the Chinese, and of the dangers that will accrue therefrom. But everybody understands that these are not the real and substantial grounds upon which the people of the Pacific States desire their exclusion. The real objection to them is that they are so frugal, economical, and industrious; can live so cheaply and work so cheaply that our laborers can not compete with them, and that if they are allowed to come here freely they will engross all employments to the exclusion of our own laborers. Employers there, like employers everywhere, if left free will employ the cheapest and best. In short, the argument is that the exclusion of the Chinese is a necessary protection to labor on the Pacific coast. How differently these same gentlemen argue and vote on the tariff bill! The friends of a tariff say that the laborers of Europe can and do work for a much lower rate of wages than is possible for the laborers of this country, and that therefore the products of their labor can be brought here and sold at a lower rate than the products of labor here, and that the importation of such foreign products ought to be discouraged by the imposition of duties for the protection of the labor of this country.

But the argument when thus applied is wholly disregarded. Every man ought to be freely allowed to purchase what he wants where he can cheapest, no matter where.

Thus it is all right to protect labor on the Pacific coast by excluding the cheaper laborer from China. But when it is asked to protect labor on the other side of the continent by discouraging the importation of the products of foreign pauper labor, it is all unconstitutional and wrong. Which is right?

I shall vote against this bill, but for other reasons than that it protects labor. Those reasons have been fully stated by others.

One word as to the Chinese becoming citizens. It is said that the Chinese refuse to be naturalized, and thereby become citizens. Whose fault is this? You will recollect, Mr. Chairman (Mr. COX, of New York), that I had something to do with the revision of the statutes of the United States, made some years ago. Now, the commission who made that revision changed the language of the naturalization laws so that a Chinaman might be naturalized. The consequence was that the Pacific coast was aflame at once, and we had to make hot haste to restore the language of the old law, and keep out the Chinese from becoming citizens. This is how it came about that the Chinese do not become citizens.

Mr. MILLS. Have not both parties changed sides on this very thing?

Mr. POLAND. Oh, no.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. ELDREDGE took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, his Secretary, who informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 79) granting a pension to Caroline M. McDougal, widow of Rear-Admiral David S. McDougal;

An act (H. R. 406) granting a pension to Catherine Bullard;

An act (H. R. 2319) granting a pension to Laurena C. P. Haskins;

An act (H. R. 3931) to add certain counties of Alabama to the northern district therein, and to divide the said northern district, after the addition of said counties, into two divisions, and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 6538) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Saint Croix River, in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 224) granting certain publications to the Cincinnati Law Library.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session and proceeded with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1798) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am opposed to this bill because it is a revision of the act of the last Congress; I am opposed to it because it follows in the same line of legislation and violates every idea I have on the subject of human rights.

Gentlemen object to Chinamen, they say, first, because the Chinese are paupers. If I have read correctly the testimony taken by the commission appointed by the Congress of the United States, the very reverse of that is true.

It is said that they are vicious. To some extent the testimony establishes that fact; yet notwithstanding that there is scarcely a respectable family on the Pacific coast that does not employ them as cooks, waiters, and chambermaids. They are admitted into every household, they are about every table, they are in every chamber. Yet they are denounced here by gentlemen as being the most vicious and depraved in the universe.

I do not doubt the power nor do I challenge the policy of the Government in the exclusion of the vicious and pauperized of any nation in the world. Indeed it is the duty of a nation to protect its citizens from the paupers and from the vicious and from the diseased of other nations.

But it is not because of these things that you gentlemen on the Pacific coast are opposed to the Chinaman. You are opposed to him because he is a laborer; you denounce against him the penalties of this bill solely because he is a laborer, and for no other reason. If you will amend this bill so as to exclude the Chinese leper or pauper or the vicious population of China I will vote for it as cheerfully as any gentleman of this committee. But that does not answer your purpose. That is not the object of your legislation. You have become frightened because in the last quarter of a century 100,000 Chinamen have settled on the Pacific coast. Yet when the daily papers announce that during almost every month of these years quite as large a number of wage people have landed at Castle Garden, it does not frighten you at all.

Mr. HENLEY. They are not the same kind of people.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. You make no objection to these laborers from Ireland, from Germany, from Norway, from Poland, or wherever else they may come from. notwithstanding they put their labor in competition with that of our laboring people.

Mr. HENLEY. We can compete with that kind of labor.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But gentlemen say they object because the Chinese do not assimilate, because they do not come here on account of their love for liberty or in the expectation of becoming American citizens. Yet in this very legislation you prohibit the courts of the United States from naturalizing them. You object to them because they are not naturalized; and you will not allow them to be naturalized! You object to them because they come here, and then the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. CASSIDY] objects to them because they go away! He says they come here, stay a little while, and then go away. So at one end of the line you object to them because they come, and at the other end because they go away! And then you object to them because they will not be buried here when they die. I would like to know what a Chinamen can do that will please you.

A MEMBER. Stay away.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. You say you desire this legislation for the protection of American labor, yet nearly all of you who support this measure are in favor of putting the American laborer at the mercy of every laboring man and woman in the world.

Mr. HENLEY. Every one that is white.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Ah! that is the key-note of this infernal legislation. These men are not white!

Mr. TILLMAN. That is right.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY] says that is it, and my distinguished friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] echoes it. I remember well when a distinguished gentleman, and I see him in my presence, denounced on this floor in his representative capacity the negro as vicious, low, ignorant, and depraved, unfit to live among us or to exercise any of the privileges of American citizenship. But since we have made the negroes voters the negro character has changed in the opinion of that distinguished statesman, and in churches, in halls, and before literary societies he is endeavoring to establish the fact that the negroes are the wittiest, the cleverest, the most social, affectionate, and docile people in the world. [Laughter].

I remember that a distinguished statesman who has been on your Presidential ticket said that if we should repeal that article of the constitution of Indiana that excluded negroes from our State, and especially if emancipation should take place, the free negroes from Kentucky and Tennessee would come into our State until white labor would be driven from employment. But we did it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope I may have permission to illustrate a few of the ideas I have endeavored to express.

Mr. BUDD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana may be allowed to proceed.

Mr. HENLEY. How long?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Thirty minutes.

Mr. HENLEY. I must object to an extension of thirty minutes because of the order of the House limiting debate.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Ten minutes more will be as much as I care to use.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be allowed to proceed ten minutes longer.

Mr. TULLY. I object.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. The objection comes too late. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. TULLY. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am much obliged to the gentleman. I believe I never objected to any gentleman expressing his opinions in this House, and I never intend to do it.

Mr. RICE. It is understood that this extension of the time is made by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, emancipation came, the negroes in Tennessee and Kentucky were freed, yet white labor is not seeking employment nor has the toil of the laboring man in my State ceased to be remunerative. Why? Gentlemen forget a great law of economy, that when you take a laborer from one field and transplant him to another you do not thereby increase the aggregate of human labor at all; you have made a vacancy where he came from to supply one at the point to which he is taken. By transplanting labor from one part of the world to another you do not increase its aggregate. And this fear of competition where the competitors meet upon an equal field is idle. There is no danger.

But let me go a little further. It was said the people of California voted with great unanimity to exclude this people from their borders. Well, if I were ready to concede the right or propriety of this exclusion on the part of California, I do not permit California to determine the character of the people who come to my State. I do not ask for the laboring people of Indiana the protection that California would give us.

And yet this bill does not only put this Chinese wall around California, but you extend it around all the thirty-eight States and seven or eight Territories.

Mr. BUDD. How many of them are there in Indiana? Forty-one, I believe.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not know how many we have, and I do not care. It is not a question of how many we have; that is not the question; it is a question of eternal right. It is the right of the Chinaman, in the first place, to expatriate himself if he chooses. The question on our part is, Shall we continue in reference to the Chinese people that policy we have exercised toward every other people in the world? That is all.

Another thing, has the Chinaman hurt your people in California? I am bound to take your word for it. I have never been there. I shall not challenge the integrity or the intelligence of gentlemen who have said certain things in regard to this people. But I read with great care and sincere desire to ascertain the truth the testimony taken by the Congressional committee on this question, and I reached, if that testimony is to be relied on, a very different conclusion from that given by the gentlemen who have denounced the Chinese as to their habits and influence on labor and morals on the Pacific coast.

One fact is significant, at least: if you have been ruined by Chinese cheap labor, how is it that to-day common labor on the Pacific coast is higher than it is in any other part of the United States? How does it happen?

Mr. ROSECRANS. It is not due to the introduction of Chinese labor.

Mr. BUDD. What is that the gentleman has said?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If your labor on the Pacific coast is ruined, how comes it common labor commands a higher price on the Pacific coast than in any other State?

Mr. BUDD. Will the gentleman permit me to answer?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman will have his opportunity to answer.

Mr. BUDD. I desire to answer it now, if you will permit me. I have the statistics here which show that in every occupation in which the Chinese on the Pacific coast engage labor is less than in the Eastern States, while in every occupation from which Chinese are excluded the price is higher.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not stand here to challenge what the gentleman says. I take my statistics from an impartial committee appointed by Congress and representing both sides of this controversy, and I believe in the figures given by them and also the conclusions to which they have come.

And more than that, if it be true you are not injured, as I take it you are not, by Chinese labor in the reduction of price, what have the Chinese done for you? I do not know anything about this personally, but this report states they have reclaimed large bodies of tule lands, the most productive you have in California. They have done this and they could never have been reclaimed by any other people.

Mr. BUDD. Let me explain——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. You can in your time.

Let me say further they have built your railroads; they have contributed largely to the wealth and prosperity of California. I know you will say, when they earn money they leave. I suppose you have no objection to their going off, not the slightest; but you say, when they leave they take their money with them. If they labor so cheaply they pay $2 of labor for $1 they take; when they leave if they take $100,000 of your money away they leave $200,000 of labor in its place. Now how long would it take at that rate for California to get poor by Chinese cheap labor?

How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. One minute.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Well, then, I will yield that one minute to my friend from the State of New York [Mr. COX] to set himself right with regard to the colored population.

Mr. COX, of New York. I never was wrong, but I thank the gentleman for his one minute, and I will use that in complimenting him.

Mr. EATON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. My friend from Indiana has been for years threatening me with some little diatribe in relation to something I once said about the negro. I think he must go back even as long ago as when a young man I visited Rome. There I heard a negro—who has since become a bishop in Abyssinia—deliver, in the Sistine chapel, an eloquent address in pure and classic Latinity. In a book I then wrote I descanted on the singular prejudices against color in our own land. But I only wanted to say that I, like my distinguished friend from Indiana, had perhaps at one time some little prejudice against the negro. I was raised somewhat in the West, and had, I am free to confess, some of the same prejudices which he and his party leaders had for a while in early days. His great leader, Senator Morton, had them also. He expressed them two years after my speaking here during the war. In 1866, at Richmond, Ind., he made a speech denouncing negro suffrage. Indiana had other statesmen similarly prejudiced even as late as the period when that State was represented by Judge Jeremiah Wilson, the ablest man who ever came here on this floor to represent that State.

What did he do in the Forty-third Congress? Does the gentleman from Indiana remember? He brought in a bill to break up the black and saddle-colored government of this District of Columbia. [Laughter and applause.] Why did he entertain such prejudices against them? These legislators had got to stealing so much that they stole even the spittoons in their Legislative Assembly. [Great laughter.] They were so malodorous in character and bad in conduct that even your Republican brethren, then in a majority in this House, took away from them the right of voting and controlling affairs in this District. Did you vote for it? I ask the gentleman from Indiana. Were you a member of the Forty-third Congress?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I suppose the gentleman from New York knows I was not a member of that Congress.

Mr. COX, of New York. You ought to have been. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. COX, of New York. If you had been here would you have voted for it? I like to place the gentleman on record in that respect. I like to use the argument ad hominem upon such a good subject.

He makes a point about the tariff against me and this side of the House. He says: "Oh, yes! You would allow the productions of Germany, France, and England to come into our country. You thus antagonize and degrade American labor; but you advise the stoppage of Chinese immigration." The gentleman knows that when a Chinaman comes here he is not in a parallel condition with those of other nationalities. He never comes here to stay. He comes for other purposes and then goes. When you ask him where this heathen goes after death—whether he goes to the deity of Confucius or to the Jehovah of our religion, or to any other god—he says, "No; I go to China!" [Great laughter.]

That is the element the gentleman would ask you to admit into competition with our labor. We welcome the German, the Irishman, and all who come to us to enjoy our institutions. We welcome those who come here to better their condition and that of their families. We extend open arms to all who come to enjoy the blessings of a government where no armies tax and intimidate, and where all can enjoy life and liberty and pursue happiness. We love the Scandinavians with their thrift and their virtues. Let them come from their hive, out of which so many races have swarmed. Let them cast their lines with us. We like to have them enjoy their heritage in our pleasant places.

The gentleman from Indiana himself, if he would trace his ancestry back far enough, will doubtless find that he is either Irish, or Scandinavian, or French, or perhaps English, or may be a splendid composite of all of them. [Laughter.]

But now, sir, he indulges in a personal point against me. It is: that I did not like the negro in my service here. He thinks it strange that I should have changed my opinion of the colored man in recent years. Why, sir, the negro is better than he was then. [Laughter.] We have learned to know and like him better. I have seen something of his characteristics. I know that he is kind, affectionate, gentle, accommodating, and he begins to like the Democratic party far better than he was wont in other days. [Laughter and applause.] He votes with us more frequently. Why does he do it? He has learned wisdom. He knows that the Democratic party is his best friend. When the Howard irregularities were developed here; when the Freedmen's Bureau was investigated; when the Freedman's Bank rascalities were unearthed, he found who it was that befriended him when Republican rogues despoiled him of his hard-earned money. [Laughter and applause.]

Therefore, all hail to Ethiopia! It is stretching out its hands to the Democratic party. We are ready to say: Come to us, poor, downtrodden children of Ham, come to us and we will give you refuge. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire leave to print some additional remarks upon this question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COX, of New York, having resumed the chair). The Chair hears no objection if the Chair understood the gentleman's request. [Laughter].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I simply desire the privilege of having inserted a portion of the gentleman's speech made in 1862. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that. [Great laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. What I desire is to print his speech delivered on this floor in 1864 on the negro question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be inclined to object unless he had a chance to explain the speech [laughter]; however, the Chair hears no objection. The gentleman can print the whole speech if he wishes to.

Mr. COOK. I desire to ask the chairman this question: Do I understand the speech the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] wishes to print is his own or yours?

The CHAIRMAN. The occupant of the chair cannot debate when he is in the chair. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana.

[Extract from speech of June 6, 1862, delivered in the House of Representatives by Hon. S. S. COX, of New York.]

The right and power to exclude Africans from the States (North) being compatible with our system of State sovereignty and Federal supremacy, I assert that it is impolitic, dangerous, degrading, and unjust to the white men of Ohio and of the North to allow such immigration. By the census of 1860, in Ohio, we have 36,225 colored persons out of a population of 2,339,559. As a general thing they are vicious, indolent, and improvident. They number as yet one black to about sixty-three whites, but their ratio of increase during the last ten years has been 43.30 per cent. while that of the white increase is only 17.82 per cent. About one-tenth of our convicts are negroes.

I gather from the census of 1850 that four-tenths of the female prisoners are blacks, although they compose but one-eightieth of the female population of Ohio. In Massachusetts the convicts in the penitentiary are one-sixth black; Connecticut, one-third; New York, one-fourth.

In Ohio the blacks are not agriculturists. They soon become waiters, barbers, and otherwise subservient to the whites. They have just enough consequence given to them by late events to be pestilent.

If the Senator could visit Green's Row, within the shadow of this Capitol, henceforth "Tophet and black Gehenna called, the type of hell," and note the squalor, destitution, laziness, crime, and degradation there beginning to fester; if he could visit the alleys in whose miserable hovels the blacks congregate, he would hardly be reminded of the Paradise which Milton sang, with its amaranthine flowers [laughter], blooming trees of life, its golden fruitage, its amber rivers rolling over elysian flowers, its hills and fountains and fresh shades, its dreams of love, and its adoration of God. Alas! he would find nothing here to remind him of that high estate in Eden, save the fragrance of the spot and the nakedness of its inhabitants. [Laughter.] If the rush of free negroes to this paradise continues, it would be a blessing if Providence should send Satan here in the form of a serpent and an angel to drive the descendants of Adam and Eve into the outer world. If it continues, you will have no one here but Congressmen and negroes, and that will be punishment enough. [Laughter.] You will have to enact a fugitive law to bring the whites to their capital. [Laughter.] The condition of the negroes here is not unlike their condition in Ohio.

Mr. EATON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Washington Territory [Mr. BRENTS].

Mr. BRENTS. Of the propriety of the passage of this bill there can be but little question. If it was right and expedient a year or so ago to pass the bill of which this is amendatory, it is certainly right to pass this bill and carry out the original purpose for which that bill was passed. It has been found that there were some defects in the original act. Under it there are a great many Chinese surreptitiously coming into this country. That I grant has been partially denied by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE], but it was also partially admitted by him. He said that there were but a small number coming into California, and therefore the passage of this bill was not necessary. The people of my Territory are complaining to-day that there are hundreds and I might almost say thousands of these Chinamen coming across the Strait of Fuca from British Columbia. If the law as it now stands is perfect, why is this? It is evident that it needs some amendment, that it needs some curative provisions in order to prevent the violation of the original act and the evasion of its provisions.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is urged here that the people of the Pacific coast do not want this prohibitory legislation, and that their Representatives are here as demagogues not representing the sentiment of that people; that they are asking Congress to do something that the people do not want. Now, this may sound very well to gentlemen who know nothing of these Chinese and much less of the constituents of the Representatives from the Pacific coast. Is it reasonable to suppose that these Representatives are here claiming and insisting upon something that their constituents do not want?

It may do well enough to say that this is the work of politicians, that politicians are doing this thing. I tell you the politician that is successful, the politician that comes here term after term, must represent the sentiment of his constituents. And the people of the Pacific coast have been sending their Representatives here for years asking this very same thing with perfect unanimity.

But my friend the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] says that because some of the Pacific coast members are free-traders, and because, as he says, they are not in favor of protecting the labor of this country, therefore he, the gentleman from Indiana, because he claims they are inconsistent, wants to be equally inconsistent. He is not in favor of the protection of American labor because he says that some gentleman from California, who is a free-trader, is in favor of changing his position on this question and is inconsistent.

It is also claimed that the wages of these Chinamen are equal to the wages of our own citizens. That was not the case, we all know, before the passage of the present act, and it is not the case now, although the wages of the Chinese have to some extent appreciated.

This, however, has only lessened the evil in a very small degree. If American labor should be protected from ruinous and destructive competition with the pauper and servile labor of the Old World at all, then this bill should become a law. These people, even those who have been here half a lifetime, are as essentially foreigners as those who have never left their native shore, and their labor is just as truly and essentially foreign labor.

The Chinaman comes not as the German comes, as the Frenchman comes, as the Englishman, the Irishman, the Scandinavian, or any other foreigner comes, to find a refuge from oppression and a home in a free country. He comes a slave, to remain a slave while here and to again return to his native land in the same condition, and it is not in our power to free him. He is under obligations stronger than we can impose of unalterable allegiance to his own country. He has no sympathy with our form of government, our benign institutions, and scorns our manners and habits of civilized life. He makes no attempt at conformity with anything pertaining to our American civilization. He comes not to promote our common welfare or to contribute to our common prosperity. He comes simply for gain, and not his own gain, but the gain of him whose slave he is, and after his temporary stay is ended he takes all his accumulations with him. On what principle can my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] vote to protect our American labor from competition with the pauper labor of Europe that does not require him to protect it from the same competition with the servile labor of Asia? And what difference can it make where that labor is performed, so long as it is in all essential particulars, to all intents and purposes, foreign labor?

But, Mr. Chairman, this is not simply a question of protection to American labor against degradation from foreign competition. It is a question of protection to our very institutions themselves against threatened demolition and overthrow, a question not alone of dollars and cents to our people and nation but a question of the continued existence and perpetuity of virtue, morality, intelligence, civilization, and free government. It is a question of the admission of an incongruous and inimical element, of the infection of our political system with a disease that may prove fatal, with a deadly leprosy. The number here at this time may not be alarmingly great, but there are too many, and it is better to close the door against this curse now than to wait until it has grown greater and the difficulties of doing so have correspondingly increased.

Mr. Chairman, we cordially invite immigration from abroad. We gladly welcome the good and the virtuous, the poor and the oppressed of every land. But, sir, the coming of this vicious, diseased, criminal element for the purposes that actuate that coming is not immigration. It is importation, invasion, and as such should be discouraged and prevented. This country is great in area and in resources, but none too great for those who are here and those who may yet come for the purpose of becoming a part and parcel of our American nation and our posterity. We have no right to make this country the dumping-ground for the world's social and political offal, but we should endeavor to make it the home of virtue, intelligence, and freedom.

Let us, then, Mr. Chairman, pass this bill and do what we attempted to do and supposed we had done in the last Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington Territory has expired.

Mr. EATON. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I gladly give my adhesion to the principles of this bill, and I ought to say, perhaps, as an excuse for doing what my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] appears to think needs an excuse—for giving my support to a bill of this character—I ought to give as an excuse that twenty years ago, in the Legislature of my own State, believing that this importation of Chinese people would work nothing but misery to the people of this country, I offered a series of resolutions instructing the Senators of Connecticut and requesting her Representatives to prepare some bill and vote against the importation of these people; and I do not change often, although I regret to see that some gentlemen about me think I have changed in the last day or two somewhat. It is pretty difficult for me to change my convictions. It is very true the majority of my Legislature, belonging to the same party that my friend from Indiana does so much honor to, voted down my bill and my resolutions. But all the same, my opinion remains that these Chinese people should be kept from our border.

One would suppose, hearing the gentleman from Indiana to-day, that this was a new question. Sir, was the gentleman from Indiana a member of the last Congress——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is the gentleman from Connecticut asking me a question?

Mr. EATON. Yes, sir. Was the gentleman from Indiana a member of this House when the bill passed which is now a law?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I was a member, and I talked my very level best against it, and I then voted all the time against it.

Mr. EATON. I was about to say that in the cursory examination I have been able to give to a book I have in my hand, I found my friend from Indiana voted against that bill. I could not ascertain the line of his remarks, for I could not put my fingers upon them in the short time I had to make the examination. Did he believe then it was unconstitutional? Did he believe then it was not just and proper to protect the laborer against the effete civilization of China? I have not been able to see he is satisfied with his own position.

But what I desire to have this House understand is this, that this is no new legislation. It is to perfect the present law with an addition that we will not permit 100,000 Chinese to gather at any seaport and call themselves the citizens of France or of Great Britain and then be smuggled into this country. That, if I understand my friend from Indiana as well as my friend from Massachusetts, seems to them to be a very bad principle of this new bill. It is a good principle of it to me. Under the treaty with China, with which I had something to do and which I have examined with a great deal of care, I agree fully we should drive our four-in-hand team close to the wall. It is possible that we drive the leaders over the wall.

At all events we go this far—and I would abrogate that treaty were it necessary in order to place this law upon our statute-books—we intend to prevent the importation of these people.

Gentlemen rise in their places on this floor and compare these Chinese with their civilization to the Irishmen, to the Englishmen, to the Germans, to the Scandinavians, to the Frenchmen, who come here and become a part of us, assimilate with us, intermarrying with our sisters and our daughters. That sort of talk is neither reason nor sense. We welcome the Germans. The Germans are represented on this floor by two or more of our most valued members. We welcome the Irish race, and the Irish ought to be welcomed here. What other race did more for this country in the war of the Revolution and in the last war with Great Britain? Montgomery died at Quebec. The Irishman was found in every contest, on every battlefield, and in every fight upon the seas. And he is to be compared to-day, is he, with this Chinese civilization? Sir, I confess I am astonished.

We do not desire that people here. We say this country is a home for the oppressed. So it is. We say it is a home for the exile. So it is. But it is not for China to vomit 100,000,000 of its 400,000,000 population upon our shores. In my judgment it is not the part of wise statesmanship to permit that people to come here.

I think I heard my friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT]—perhaps I did not catch his remark correctly—I think I heard him say that there would be a conflict between this and foreign countries if this bill should pass.

Mr. HITT. I said that this law, being in conflict with our treaties with many nations, would be a precedent which might be taken advantage of to embarrass us.

Mr. EATON. I did not catch what my friend said. I take him at what he now says. I am not fearful of that. We are here, from fifty to sixty millions of people, and in the near future we will be one hundred million. Justice will be what this great people will do. We will say to France, we will say to Great Britain, we will say to Germany, your children are welcome to our soil; but you must not put a consulate down at Hong-Kong or anywhere else and draw an imaginary line around one hundred miles of territory and call that much of China yours, call the population of China British, or French, or German subjects and insist that they shall come here. And my word for it, there will be no difficulty between this fifty or one hundred millions of people and any other power on God's green earth.

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman permit me one question?

Mr. EATON. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman's distinction and experience make me value so highly his opinion that I venture to ask him if he thinks that a law like this passed by Congress is in consonance with our treaties with the nations which have extensive Chinese populations among their subjects, we having sworn to obey the Constitution and the laws and the treaties made thereunder in our votes as members of Congress?

Mr. EATON. Will my friend name the nations? I want to know what I am talking about.

Mr. HITT. France, England, Holland, Spain, and other nations have among their subjects many thousands of persons who are Chinese by race, and who will be subject to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. EATON. I will answer that question if I have time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EATON. I have answered it. I have said I would not permit Great Britain, or France, or Germany to establish trading-posts somewhere on the coast of China and draw an imaginary line around a hundred millions of that rotten population, and then let them endeavor to force them onto our soil, let the consequences be what they might. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. And you would build up a navy to enforce it?

Mr. EATON. We will take care of the Navy at the proper time.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Mr. Chairman, one of the most important chapters in the history of this country's relations with foreign powers was the ratification of the Burlingame treaty with China. It was accepted on the part of this country as an important step, not only of profitable commercial interest to our people but toward the enlightenment of a nation of which we knew little except by tradition. It was the breaking down of the Chinese wall of which we were taught in our schools and the commencement of new commercial relations with an important foreign power. We felt that that treaty would certainly be a great benefit to us. Section 29 of that treaty—the treaty of 1868—was as follows:

> The principles of the Christian religion as professed by the Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches are recognized as teaching men to do good and to do to others as they would have others do to them. Hereafter those who quietly profess and teach these doctrines shall not be harassed or persecuted on account of their faith. Any person, whether a citizen of the United States or Chinese convert, who, according to these tenets, peaceably teach and practice the principles of Christianity, shall in no case be interfered with or molested.

Is the legislation of 1882 in harmony with this article of the treaty? Is it not a violation of the spirit of that agreement? Under it did not our Government pledge itself to deal justly with the citizens who might come here from China, no matter whether they worshiped God or the sun or the moon?

The details of the present bill have been fully explained by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] and his colleague upon the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT]. But the merits of the whole question of Chinese immigration seem to have been entered into, and I propose to raise my voice against all legislation of this nature, whether it be the bill before us or the law which it is proposed to amend. The act of 1882 can never be amended to my satisfaction except by an absolute repeal.

I opposed the bill of 1882 because I believed it was un-American, because I believed it was unrepublican, because I believed it was undemocratic, because I believed it was unpatriotic. There must be an underlying principle of right to every measure of this kind to give it life or vitality, and that legislation lacked such a principle entirely. It was not founded upon mercy, justice, or patriotism. It lacked every one of these attributes. It was unworthy of a proud nation, whose great boast is its liberty and its love of freedom. It was unworthy of a nation which in all its history has reached out and invited the people of foreign nations to come to its shores.

While this is not a political measure, so far as the history of political parties goes, I am proud to say that the national platform of my own party adopted in 1868 embraced as one of its planks this declaration:

> Foreign immigration, which in the past has added so much to the wealth, development of the resources, and increase of power of this Republic, the asylum of the oppressed of all nations, should be fostered and encouraged by a liberal and a just policy.

Now, is it a "liberal and just policy" for 55,000,000 of free people to say to any nation, "Your laborers shall not come to this country?" Fifty-five millions of American freemen worrying about 150,000 Chinamen in the country! The great State of California, with 580,000 people, complaining to-day because there are 61,000 Chinamen within her borders!

Mr. CASSIDY. The gentleman has read from the Republican platform of 1868. I wish to ask him whether the platform adopted by the Republican national convention in 1876 and also the platform of 1880, approved by General Garfield in his letter of acceptance, did not contain a declaration that these people should be excluded?

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I will say in answer to the gentleman that the Republican national platform of 1876 declared it the duty of Congress to fully investigate the effect of the immigration and importation of Mongolians upon the moral and material interests of the country.

In 1880 the national platform of that party "would limit and restrict that immigration by the enactment of such just, humane, and reasonable laws and treaties as will produce that result."

That was a declaration in favor of a "just and reasonable" policy toward the Chinese. Now is it a "just and reasonable policy" to say that "Chinese laborers from any port or place" shall not land in this country? Do you call such a restriction aimed at in this bill as in accord with either treaties or platforms?

Mr. Chairman, this bill is an insult to a great nation with which for many years we have been upon terms of commercial intimacy, a nation with whose people we exchange embassadors with the usual formalities, a nation whose embassador to-day is entitled to sit in our galleries, who has a home in this capital city where he holds fashionable receptions to which the members of the American Congress are formally and politely invited and which invitations are seldom refused. If it is right to keep the people of that nation out of this country, why do you not send home the young Chinamen who come to our colleges to learn our customs and our tongue and who often graduate with high honors? Why do you not send them home? Why do you not send home the representatives of the Chinese nation? Why not tell them to wrap their silken robes about them and leave this American Republic?

Mr. ROSECRANS. Is not the gentleman proceeding upon an incorrect basis when he addresses himself to this bill as if those provisions of law were not already upon the statute-book?

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I said that I was not undertaking to speak merely upon the particular bill under consideration but also upon the act which it proposes to amend. I am discussing the whole question. So far as I can by my vote and my voice I desire to oppose and denounce such proscriptive legislation by the American Congress. I say that the act of 1882 was the most cowardly act that an enlightened nation ever placed on its statute-books. It was unworthy of a great nation renowned for its love of liberty to yield to the cry from a section in behalf of nothing more than a local issue. It was unworthy of a nation which owes so much of its greatness and its influence to its friendly offices among the nations of the earth. It was unworthy of a nation which had its growth in independence, in resistance to oppression, in a liberty born of conflict, and which has grown strong in the liberal spirit which was the inevitable outcome of its own experience. It was putting an indignity upon a people whom we have taught by our history to expect better things, from whom we have derived many valuable principles in philosophy, mathematics, and even politics. Centuries ago the politics of China was purer than our own to-day and regulated by a more harmonious civil-service regulation than we are willing to establish or peaceably abide by. Then, I say as a Republican, as a Representative, as an American citizen, that there is no man under the light of God's heaven who should not be allowed to come to our shores so long as he comes to obey our laws.

Mr. BRENTS. The Chinese do not do that.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Where do we find the record of Chinese crime? Our jails are not filled with Chinese. The proportion of Chinese criminals is very small. Treat them like beings with souls and they will obey the laws.

Mr. ROSECRANS. The gentleman will allow me to say that the proportion of Chinese among our criminal classes in San Francisco is enormous.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I can point the gentleman to small sections of my own great State where beneath the sidewalk as you walk along are filth and squalor equal to anything that can be shown in San Francisco, and this too among white people. But if the Chinese in San Francisco commit crimes why not punish them under your State laws? Surely with the feeling there you ought to be able to find a jury that would convict a Chinaman of almost anything. Do not come to Congress to ask a protection which your State laws should give yon.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I desire to quote some very pertinent observations made by Mr. Joyce, of Vermont, when the bill of 1882 was under discussion. They seem to cover the whole question very completely. He said at that time:

Mr. Speaker, I am profoundly impressed with the importance of the great principle involved in this bill. In the consideration I have given it I have not been influenced by passion or prejudice. I have endeavored to look at it from the high standpoint of national honor and true statesmanship. I am sure this bill ought not to pass, and that every man who votes for it will in the end most deeply regret it.

I would protect our people from the evils growing out of foreign immigration by the humane, just, and reasonable legislation I have already suggested, and beyond this, I would welcome men from all lands and climes. I would bring them in contact with our civilization, teach them our language and our laws, instruct them in our labor and industries, educate them in our schools and colleges, let them feel the power and influence of our holy religion, inspire them with our hopes and patriotism, imbue them with our ambition, as fast as possible meet and crystallize them into our social life, and then set upon their heads the crowning glory of American citizenship.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, and to sum up my objections to this bill, I am opposed to it because it is a violation of the terms of the treaty of 1880 with China; because it is hostile to the spirit of our institutions; because it is in direct antagonism with the great principles of our civilization; because it is in contradiction of the policy we have always pursued toward all other nations; because it is a bold and unwarrantable repudiation of our national declarations on this subject; because it is building the same wall against China which she has kept up against the world for centuries, and which we helped to pull down; because it is a deadly blow at our growing commerce with one of the richest kingdoms on the globe; because it is a palpable violation of the terms of the Republican platform of 1880; because foreign immigration, more than anything else, has built up this country and given us prosperity and greatness.

It is a wonder to me, in view of the legislation enacted in 1882 and attempted now, that China does not sever all commercial relations with us. She is surely more magnanimous than our own country would be were such an indignity to be placed upon us.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I repeat that as a Republican, as an American citizen, as a representative upon this floor of an intelligent constituency, I oppose this bill as I opposed the act of 1882, because it is small and narrow statesmanship; because I believe it is needless; because I believe it approaches to political persecution; because it is a violation of existing treaties; because it is narrow and proscriptive, and, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] says, because it is petty in its details, presumptuous in its demands, impossible to execute, and because I believe that the principle underlying it and underlying all such legislation to be everlastingly and eternally wrong.

Mr. LAMB. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes allotted me I can say but little. This proposition is to prevent a Chinese inundation. It has been stated, sir, by a very great writer of Roman history that the Republic of Rome endured for eight hundred years and finally fell because of the inability of its constitution to absorb the various races conquered by the Roman arms. A distinguished Senator in the other end of this Capitol, a Republican, said not a year ago that the prosperity and safety of the American Republic depended on the homogeneity of its population. This proposition is too palpable to be denied by any member on this floor. European emigration is what we have courted and invited from the earliest days of this Government. The Saxon, the Gaul, the Celt, and all the members of the families of Europe, oppressed by poverty and despotism, have been made to feel by us that our hearts as well as our great dominions were open to them.

Our fathers came here not to conquer alone, but to settle and make homes for themselves and their descendants. They loved freedom and believed labor to be dignified.

Our civilization must of necessity be always in antagonism of old Europe, because it is a civilization that respects labor, whereas in Europe labor is degraded. But the wish of our Republican brethren on this floor is to flood this country ultimately with an alien population from Asia, alien in nature, political organism, and religion, which is and must ever be hostile to the happiness and destiny of this Republic.

I doubt not that the parentage of every white man in this Hall, yes, in either end of this Capitol, could be traced back to what our friends on the other side of this Chamber designate as paupers from Europe. In this the American of Causasian origin realizes the greatest pride. It is but an indication of what his race may achieve in those pursuits which in this country lead to the most exalted positions among mankind, and that are with us free and accessible to all who rely upon individual manhood and its attributes for success.

The question of suffrage, sir, we have already greatly complicated in our midst. The amendments of the Constitution of the United States enacted since the war of secession have given the right of suffrage to a vast and ignorant population, as well as aliens by the laws of creation.

I have heard it charged on this floor, and in fact by members on both sides of this House, both Republicans and Democrats, that the question of negro suffrage had not been settled, and if it had been settled it had been settled disastrously. I pause for a denial. We have yet to develop the negro voter into a higher state. We can only hope to adjust this race of people to our political institutions by education to a more elevated appreciation of their rights in American citizenship. No possible effort should be spared to accomplish this result either by Federal or State exertion. The fruits of neglect in this matter must inevitably be disaster to all that an American citizen holds dear. Our friends on the other side of this House are quick to charge the responsibility of carrying this bill on this side. We accept the issue most cordially. We feel that what the great States and Territories on the Pacific Slope demand in this matter should be conceded.

Does not the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER] know that the bill we have before us is one which passed the last Congress when this House was Republican? It was made a law by the combined wisdom of Democrats and Republicans. This proposition is only to amend and make more efficacious that legislation, and in order that it may not be a dead letter on the statute-books, a mere mockery, and that as far as possible this continent shall be kept for the Caucasian race in order that we may advance to a higher civilization and perfection, political, religious, and physical. When that point has been attained we may then reach out our hands to aid and lift up all other races to the plane we may have reached. We can then do so without periling the institutions to which we look as the foundation of our safety and glory.

I shall heartily vote for the amendment and hope all lovers of America will do the same.

Mr. LAMB. I yield now for one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. In that minute I wish to give notice I shall at the proper time offer this amendment:

After the word "mining," in line 248, insert the following:

"And that so much of this act and the act to which this is supplementary as can be made operative shall be applied to and enforced against all persons of whatever nationality who are or may be imported into this country under any system of contracts."

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, so much has been said this afternoon on the provisions of the bill now under consideration that I do not feel it to be necessary to occupy much of the time or the attention of the committee.

The greater portion of this bill, in fact all of it but one section, has been in issue in this House before. Two years ago a law was enacted by the Forty-seventh Congress which limited Chinese immigration to this country for a period of ten years. It was first for a period of twenty years. The issue was made not as a party one, but upon the same state of facts which has been brought to the attention of this committee to-day.

It came with a demand from men of all parties upon the Pacific coast for its passage. They came with a unanimous voice asking the representatives of American citizens to protect the laboring men of California and the Pacific States from the pauper labor of China. To-day all but one of the sections of this bill before the committee ask that that legislation, before enacted, shall be so perfected that no Chinese laborer can come to this country to compete with American labor. I take it for granted that the gentlemen who were here at that time and voted for that bill will to-day vote for the bill which we have presented, and which is now pending before this committee. I take it for granted also that every man who is in this Congress and was not in the last, who believes in the principles embodied in the law of 1882, will also record his vote in favor of this bill.

There is a record, Mr. Chairman, upon this question, not only of individuals, but a record of parties as well. Much has been said about the Democratic party being a party of free trade, as was said so forcibly to my colleague from Indiana a while ago. I am proud to say that no single Democrat upon this floor has lifted his voice to-day in behalf of the pauper labor of China and against the interests of the free labor of America. I am glad that the opposition comes from that side of the House which pretends always to protect the interests of the American laborer. And may I not be pardoned for asking the gentlemen who for the past two weeks have with loud voices and unmeasured tones denounced my side of the Chamber because of their wishing, as they allege, to break down American labor to the depths of degradation of the pauper labor of Europe—I say may I not be pardoned if I ask them whether they are in earnest, or whether it is not their endeavor to protect capital alone?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, rose.

Mr. LAMB. No; I can not yield any more of my time. When this legislation was before Congress two years ago—and I have the record here before me—sixty-six Republicans, sixty-six members of the other side of the House, who stand here pretending to protect American labor, voted against that bill. When the bill to limit immigration for ten years was before the House, thirty-seven members of the House voted against that bill, and of that number thirty-four were Republicans, and but three Democrats. Upon this proposition, then, as to whether my party is in favor of free trade, in favor of placing the labor of America upon a level with the pauper labor of Europe, I am willing to be judged by the record.

My colleague from Indiana, who always talks well, asked to-day upon the floor of this House why not limit the immigration to Castle Garden; why not limit the immigration of the Irishman, and the German, and the Scandinavian?

Why not limit the immigration of men who come here with their wives and their children to become part and parcel of this great body-politic, to partake with us of the blessings which a free government insures to us all? I was sorry that the gentleman should ask such a question. These people came here from abroad because they love free government. They came to be of us and with us. They came to bring forth honest sons and virtuous daughters, to build up the strength and the glory and the prosperity of the American people. And I say it comes with poor grace from any gentleman on this floor to talk of comparing in any measure whatever the condition or the qualities of the immigrants who land at Castle Garden with those who land at the Golden Gate of California.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. LAMB. I can not yield.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will not misrepresent what I said.

Mr. LAMB. I shall not do so. I say it is not fair. The circumstances are not the same under any condition of facts which may be presented. These people from China do not come here to live with us. They do not ask to be American citizens. They do not ask the wages for labor that are granted to the hardy sons of toil from Germany and Ireland, and which they require and ask for the maintenance of themselves and families. They come here to live on rice and rats and get as much money as they can out of the American people, and go back to China and take their money along with them. There is no comparison in the conditions, and there should be none made. As for myself, speaking for myself alone, and I believe for the great majority of the Democrats on this side of the Chamber, I am in favor of protecting the American laborer whenever, wherever, and under whatever circumstances I get the opportunity. If I can protect him by keeping out competitive pauper labor from either China or Europe that is brought here for the purpose of degrading American labor, if I can do this without levying a tariff to take money out of the pockets of somebody else in order to protect him, so much the better for him and so much the better for this Government.

But, sir, I am not for free trade under any circumstances. I am not in favor of placing labor in this country upon a level with the labor of free-trade England. I was elected to Congress upon a platform which declared itself in favor of a tariff for revenue so adjusted as to protect American industry without creating monopoly, and I stand upon it to-day. Neither, Mr. Chairman, am I afraid of the red flag which was waved in our faces this afternoon by my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts, who with one hand waved the red flag of Johnny Bull and with the other the bushy tail of the British lion. I am afraid of neither. And this brings me to the question of the treaty that my friend discussed with so much dignity and ability.

Mr. CUTCHEON. While the gentleman is passing to another point will he now permit a question?

Mr. LAMB. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I will say in relation to being interrupted that I have yielded every moment of the time it was possible for me to yield this afternoon. And I now only want to say a word in conclusion in regard to the question as to whether or not we are violating any treaty with foreign governments in the fifteenth section of this bill. The truth is, as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE], that upon the question of a Chinaman who, as he says, stole into his State from Hong-Kong, Judges Lowell and Nelson, of the State of Massachusetts, decided that he was a citizen under the law and could not be kept out. Judge Field, of California, in a similar case, held that under the provisions of this law that Chinaman could have been restrained from coming here.

That is the condition of affairs to-day. I believe it was the intent of the framers of the law of 1882 that no Chinaman from any port or place should be allowed to come into the confines of this Government; and section 15 of this act has been placed in the bill in order that there shall be no longer any doubt upon this question; that it shall be settled once and for all that no Chinese laborer shall be allowed to come to California or to any other part of these United States of America. To that I give my assent. They are not American citizens. I speak here to-day for American citizens, whether born upon this soil or whether born across the briny deep. I speak for every man who comes to this land of plenty to live under our institutions and to live with us as citizens; I speak for his right to come here. But as for the man, be he Chinaman or who he may, who comes to this country wishing to grow rich upon the wants and troubles of others, if he refuses to become naturalized and become an American citizen I do not believe he deserves any protection.

The gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Indiana have both said that this legislation was not needed or demanded. I can point you to the petition-box of this House; and I would call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] to the fact that there are petitions in that box from labor organizations representing more than half a million of the laboring men of this nation asking for the passage of this bill. And as for me, I will take their word for what is necessary for their protection rather than the word of the gentleman from Massachusetts or the gentleman from Indiana, distinguished as they may be. The gentleman from Massachusetts said that they did not know what was best for them. He may say and the gentleman from Indiana may say to the laboring men of this country, "You are too ignorant to know what you want; we treat your appeals with contempt because you know not what you ask." They may say that. But as long as I have a voice to speak on this floor, as long as I have a vote to cast, I shall lift my voice and record my vote in favor of the additional legislation which the honest, intelligent, fair-minded laboring men of this country ask me to support.

I move that the committee rise.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, pursuant to order, had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1798) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LAMB. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and pending that motion I move that general debate on the pending bill be limited to one minute.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will make it three minutes. I should like to have two minutes.

Mr. CONVERSE. I ask unanimous consent to offer some amendments which I propose to offer to the tariff bill.

Mr. LAMB. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MORRISON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. COBB. I desire to have an order to print some evidence before the Committee on Public Lands, which it is important should be printed.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for. The regular order is the motion made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LAMB] that all general debate on the bill under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be limited to one minute.

Mr. RICE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICE. If that motion is agreed to will it prevent the reading of the bill by paragraphs?

The SPEAKER. It will not. When general debate is closed the reading of the bill by paragraphs for amendment and the consideration of amendments under the five-minute rule will come up.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House and resumes consideration of the bill (H. R. 1798) in relation to Chinese immigration. By order of the House all general debate on the bill will close in one minute.

Mr. LAMB. I yield that minute to my colleague [Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. As I shall avail myself of my time under the five-minute rule I shall not occupy the minute assigned me by my colleague. I surrender it to the committee at large.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read the first paragraph of the bill, as follows:

That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"Whereas in the opinion of the Government of the United States the coming of Chinese laborers to this country endangers the good order of certain localities within the territory thereof: Therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of this act, and until the expiration of ten years next after the passage of this act, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States be, and the same is hereby, suspended, and during such suspension it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come from any foreign port or place, or having so come after the expiration of said ninety days, to remain within the United States."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking from the eighteenth line the words "from any foreign port or place" after the words "it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborers to come."

I do not propose to discuss that amendment, but simply avail myself of this opportunity to respond to an imputation made by my distinguished colleague [Mr. LAMB] that in the remarks which I delivered to the Committee of the Whole a short time since I attempted to institute a comparison or to draw some kind of a parallel between the Mongolian and other races. I did no such thing. I believe in the superiority of the white race and always did. But that has never seemed to me to be a reason why I should deny to the blackest man in Africa or the yellowest man in Asia the common rights of human nature. I have always believed that every man had the right of an even start and a fair chance in the race of life, and that equality meant simply this, that every man had the right to be the equal of every other man if he could be.

What I said in regard to immigrants who landed at Castle Garden was this, that the objection made to the Mongolian was that he was a competitor with American laborers in the labor market. I said that was the objection made to the Mongolian. I say that every man and woman, every working man and woman who arrives at Castle Garden from the old countries of the world put their labor into competition with American labor; that is all. I welcome laborers from Germany and Ireland and Scandinavia and everywhere. But I said that, according to the logic of things, if you object to a Chinaman because he works, why not object to these other men and women because they work?

This is not a party question, and I have not sought to make it so. I do not care, so far as my vote is concerned, what the Republicans put into their platforms. I do not care a fig for political platforms, not a fig. I do not stand on them when I believe them wrong. They are but whistles upon which every man plays his own tune. I am as to this question on the platform of the Representative from the sixth Congressional district of the State of Indiana. I consult my own judgment and vote according to my own conscience. No party is responsible for my views. I am able, if need be, to stand alone.

Another thing: In referring to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] and myself, my colleague said, if I have his language correctly, "The gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Indiana may say to the laboring man, 'you are too ignorant to know what you want.'" Why, sir, I certainly never uttered such a sentiment; never, never.

Springing as I have, thank God, from the laboring people of this country, I hope I will be indulged in an allusion to myself. As an orphan boy forty years ago I entered the ranks of the laborers in my district. If I have risen to anything it is due to the sympathy and support of a laboring people. I am the only one of my family that entered a profession or ever held official position. Have I turned against my own people, my own kindred, against my own ancestors?

I love the human family and believe in the equality of all. I have as much respect for the man who labors in shops, in the mines, in the ditches, and upon the farm as I have for the professional man in his office. I believe in the brotherhood of mankind. It is unfair, it is unkind, it is ungenerous to attempt to torture anything I said into even the remotest imputation upon the intelligence of the laboring men and women of this country. Before I shall do so my right arm shall perish and my "tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth." [Great applause.]

Mr. HAMMOND. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move to amend by striking out of line 13 the words "after the expiration of ninety days next;" also strike out of line 19 the words "after the expiration of ninety days."

This paragraph as it stands is an exact copy of the first section of the act of 1882, except that the words "from any foreign port or place" have been inserted. The proposition to strike out those words having been withdrawn it leaves this section all right, except that I think a mistake has been made in including in it the words in the original act of 1882, which gave ninety days during which Chinese may be shipped into any port of this country without any legal inhibition. If amended as I propose the paragraph will read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act, and until the expiration of ten years next after the passage of this act, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States be, and the same is hereby, suspended, and during such suspension it shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come from any foreign port or place, or having so come, to remain within the United States.

As I understand the committee does not for any reason wish to give ninety days in which Chinese may come here. It was all right and proper in the original act to give ninety days' notice to the world. But that act having already been executed, and this act being merely amendatory and to perfect the policy which was established by the act of 1882, I think the limitation of ninety days should be stricken out.

Mr. BUDD. I desire to state that the object of placing these words in the amendatory act was to provide that this act which is amendatory should not go into operation for ninety days. We have secured under the original act the exclusion of all the Chinese affected by it. But by the bill which is now under consideration we propose to exclude not only the subjects of China but all Chinese, whether the subjects of that or any other power. We make other limitations and restrictions. We require other necessary descriptions in the certificate; and unless we allow ninety days any of these people coming here with a certificate under the old act would be turned back—an act of injustice we do not desire to inflict.

Mr. HAMMOND. As I understand, the committee desires to give ninety days within which the Chinese may come. That is the operation of the bill, as I understand.

Mr. HENLEY. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] is proper.

Mr. HAMMOND. If this bill passes in the present language, ninety days, as I understand, will be allowed within which these people may come ad libitum.

Mr. HENLEY. The gentleman is right about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RICE. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, this is not a proper amendment to be adopted. The original act, of which this bill is amendatory, provided that for ninety days after its passage Chinese might come and go without subjecting themselves to the provisions of the act. Those who did this obtained the right under that act to do so. Now, in amending our legislation on this subject we can not justly interfere with the rights which were thus obtained. The intention of the bill, as I have understood from the gentleman from California, is to leave that section of the original act exactly as it was except by the addition of the words in the eighteenth line. Is it not so?

Mr. LAMB. That is right.

Mr. RICE. The gentleman who reported the bill states that I am correct. I think it will mar the whole effect of the bill to begin to make these changes.

Mr. HAMMOND. I understood the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY] to say that the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. HENLEY. Yes, sir; that is correct.

The amendment of Mr. HAMMOND was agreed to.

Mr. RICE. I move to amend by striking out all of this paragraph after the enacting clause down to and including the words "United States," in the twentieth line. My friend from Indiana [Mr. LAMB] said something to this effect, that I had said the laborers of this country or some portion of them did not know for what they asked. If he will find any such remark, or anything that can be tortured into such a remark in the course of my speech, I shall be willing I had almost said to vote for this bill. I said no such thing; my friend misunderstood me.

Mr. LAMB. That was the inference I drew from the gentleman's remarks. He said that this legislation was not necessary at all. I replied that half a million of workingmen had petitioned for it. The inference from the gentleman's statement was, of course, that they did not know what they wanted. But the gentleman did not make the statement in so many words. I drew the inference.

Mr. RICE. The gentleman and I may differ as to the inference to be drawn from my remarks. I move to strike out this paragraph because it is exactly the same as the paragraph of which it is amendatory, except the simple words in the eighteenth line, "from any port or place." Now on the eleventh page of this bill, section 15 makes this provision in fuller and better phraseology:

SEC. 15. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all subjects of China, and Chinese, whether subjects of China or any other foreign power.

There is what gentlemen wish to get into our legislation; and it is unnecessary to duplicate the provision by inserting it in the paragraph now under consideration. I ask gentlemen to read the section as it stands in the act:

It shall not be lawful for any Chinese laborer to come, or, having come, after the expiration of ninety days to remain within the United States.

That covers the whole question. It prohibits the coming of these laborers into the United States from anywhere. Therefore, this language in the pending paragraph is surplusage, and for that reason I have moved to strike it out. The question which it presents can be debated when we come to consider the fifteenth section better than it can be here.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. RICE, it was not agreed to there being—ayes 22, noes 143.

Section 2 of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows:
"SEC. 2. That the master of any vessel who shall knowingly bring within the United States on such vessel, and land, or attempt to land, or permit to be landed any Chinese laborer, from any foreign port or place, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 for each and every such Chinese laborer so brought, and may also be imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year."

Mr. RICE. I move to amend by striking out in this section the words "or attempt to land." It seems to me it is no use, for the mere sake of introducing these words, to embrace in this legislation what is already in our statutes.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. RICE, there were—ayes 24, noes 135.

Mr. RICE. I am so much astonished at the great number of negative votes that I ask for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion of Mr. RICE was not agreed to.

Mr. GUENTHER. I move to amend by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, much has been said on this floor in regard to tariff reduction and the protection of labor. I have accepted these expressions as sincere. I am always willing to do all in my power for the protection of the interests of labor. I wish to make American labor dignified and remunerative, platform or no platform, as the gentleman from Indiana would. I would welcome to this asylum, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER] calls it, everybody who comes to this country to escape oppression. But, Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to admit to our shores anybody whose presence tends to degrade American labor.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER] asks why we do not send the Chinese students home. We have no desire to do that. We have no wish to proscribe Chinamen on account of their race. All we want is to prevent coolies from coming here. The gentleman says that our jails are not filled with Chinese. If he would go to San Francisco he would come to the conclusion that many of the Chinese there ought to be in the jails.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Does not this bill prohibit or prevent Chinese merchants from landing here?

Mr. GUENTHER. Certainly not; it only excludes such coolies who now come in under fraudulent certificates that they are traders or merchants.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin I will go as far as he does in prohibiting cooly slave labor.

Mr. GUENTHER. If you will go as far as I do, then you will vote for this bill. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. The record shows that during the last year only two hundred and eighty-seven Chinese merchants have landed in San Francisco, and this bill means to send them home.

Mr. GUENTHER. Yes; but how many traders? I said in my remarks in the last Congress if my own German countrymen should come to this country with like intention and under like circumstances as these Chinese I would be the first one to vote to exclude them. I stand by that statement to-day.

I do not indorse the sentimental theory of my friend from New York that this country is the asylum for everybody. It is a place of refuge to every one who may come here wanting to be one of us, assimilating himself with our ideas, our institutions, and finally becoming a full-fledged American citizen.

Mr. WELLER. Good.

Mr. GUENTHER. But I do not propose to allow any people to come to this country who comes here simply to underbid American labor, and after they have accomplished their purpose and filled their pockets to leave laughing in their sleeves and to return whence they came to live upon the profits they made here.

These Chinese will not even allow their bones to rest in American soil. That kind of philanthropy I will not indorse. I will vote whenever I have a chance to keep out such degrading competitive labor. I will do so regardless whether that labor is Mongolian or Caucasian.

This bill under consideration simply intends to carry into effect the Republican provision of the restrictive act of 1882, which by both Houses of the last Congress was deemed a just measure and was therefore passed. All that is now designed is to make that law effective.

The CHAIRMAN. The formal amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will renew it and yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GUENTHER. I only want another minute. All we want to do now is to make effective the provisions of the act of 1882, so they will be carried out as they should be. If the gentleman from New York would go to San Francisco I am sorry to say he would find there a number of shyster American lawyers who make it their business to help these coolies to land on American soil under a certificate that they are traders and merchants, and that practice this bill is mainly intended to prevent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I regret to find myself in antagonism to everybody who has spoken on the Republican side of the House on this question except my friend from Wisconsin who has just taken his seat. It may seem to be an ungracious thing for men who were born abroad like the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself to object to other foreigners coming here to seek the benefits of this free country. But, sir, if every foreigner who comes here should follow the custom of the Chinese, to return home with the money he earned here, it would ruin the United States in ten years.

Now, a word on this labor question. The man who was a laborer here twenty years ago, if industrious and frugal, is independent now. The man who is a laborer to-day in the United States, if he is industrious and healthy and economical, will have a competence in twenty years from this time. The day that a man labors for that competence is the weak day with him, and I will never agree that any foreigner shall come here and compete with him in his day of weakness when he is striving to make an independence, and when the competition is not for the purpose of making his competitor an American citizen, but for the purpose of sending abroad the earnings and accretions of labor in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said in the last two weeks with regard to a liking for labor. I am a protectionist because I want the American laborer to have a difference or margin between his income and his outgo; and I do not want that kind of competition to come. Still I confess if these people came to the United States, to the free United States, if they brought their children with them, sent them to the common schools to become Americanized, as I have toiled to do, I would have nothing to say against them. But every argument made, by even as eloquent a man as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] or the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE], has only convinced me more and more that the United States can not stand such a drain as would be put upon its finances or its morals if every foreigner followed the lead of these Chinamen.

I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 3 of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows:
"SEC. 3. That the two foregoing sections shall not apply to Chinese laborers who were in the United States on the 17th day of November, 1880, or who shall have come into the same before the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of the act to which this act is amendatory, and who shall produce to such master before going on board such vessel, and shall produce to the collector of the port in the United States at which such vessel shall arrive, the evidence hereinafter in this act required of his being one of the laborers in this section mentioned; nor shall the two foregoing sections apply to the case of any master whose vessel, being bound to a port not within the United States, shall come within the jurisdiction of the United States by reason of being in distress or in stress of weather, or touching at any port of the United States on its voyage to any foreign port or place: Provided, That all Chinese laborers brought on such vessel shall not be permitted to land except in case of absolute necessity, and must depart with the vessel on leaving port."

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I offer an amendment to this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "and," in line 38, and insert the words "nor shall said section apply to Chinese laborers."

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I understand that amendment is acceptable to the committee.

Mr. LAMB. There is no objection on the part of the committee to its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 4 of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows:
"SEC. 4. That for the purpose of properly identifying Chinese laborers who were in the United States on the 17th day of November, 1880, or who shall have come into the same before the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of the act to which this act is amendatory, and in order to furnish them with the proper evidence of their right to go from and come to the United States as provided by the said act and the treaty between the United States and China dated November 17, 1880, the collector of customs of the district from which any such Chinese laborer shall depart from the United States shall, in person or by deputy, go on board each vessel having on board any such Chinese laborer, and cleared or about to sail from his district for a foreign port, and on such vessel make a list of all such Chinese laborers, which shall be entered in registry-books to be kept for that purpose, in which shall be stated the individual, family, and tribal name in full, the age, occupation, when and where followed, last place of residence, physical marks or peculiarities, and all facts necessary for the identification of each of such Chinese laborers, which books shall be safely kept in the custom-house; and every such Chinese laborer so departing from the United States shall be entitled to and shall receive, free of any charge or cost, upon application therefor, from the collector or his deputy, in the name of said collector and attested by said collector's seal of office, at the time such list is taken, a certificate, signed by the collector or his deputy and attested by his seal of office, in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, which certificate shall contain a statement of the individual, family, and tribal name in full, age, occupation, when and where followed, of the Chinese laborer to whom the certificate is issued, corresponding with the said list and registry in all particulars. In case any Chinese laborer, after having received such certificate, shall leave such vessel before her departure, he shall deliver his certificate to the master of the vessel; and if such Chinese laborer shall fail to return to such vessel before her departure from port, the certificate shall be delivered by the master to the collector of customs for cancellation. The certificate herein provided for shall entitle the Chinese laborer to whom the same is issued to return to and re-enter the United States upon producing and delivering the same to the collector of customs of the district at which such Chinese laborer shall seek to re-enter, and said certificate shall be the only evidence permissible to establish his right of re-entry; and upon delivering of such certificate by such Chinese laborer to the collector of customs at the time of re-entry in the United States, said collector shall cause the same to be filed in the custom-house and duly canceled."

Section 6 of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That in order to the faithful execution of the provisions of this act, every Chinese person, other than a laborer, who may be entitled by said treaty or this act to come within the United States, and who shall be about to come to the United States, shall obtain the permission of and be identified as so entitled by the Chinese Government, or of such other foreign government of which at the time such Chinese person shall be a subject, in each case to be evidenced by a certificate issued by such government, which certificate shall be in the English language, and shall show such permission, with the name of the permitted person in his or her proper signature, and which certificate shall state the individual, family, and tribal name in full, title or official rank, if any, the age, height, and all physical peculiarities, former and present occupation or profession, when and where and how long pursued, and place of residence of the person to whom the certificate is issued, and that such person is entitled by this act to come within the United States. If the person so applying for a certificate shall be a merchant, said certificate shall, in addition to above requirements, state the nature, character, and estimated value of the business carried on by him prior to and at the time of his application as aforesaid: Provided, That nothing in this act nor in said treaty shall be construed as embracing within the meaning of the word 'merchant,' hucksters, peddlers, or those engaged in taking, drying, or otherwise preserving shell or other fish for home consumption or exportation. If the certificate be sought for the purposes of travel for curiosity, it shall also state whether the applicant intends to pass through or travel within the United States, together with his financial standing in the country from which such certificate is desired. If the certificate is desired for the purpose of prosecuting studies, it shall also state the nature and character of the studies, whether the same are to be prosecuted within the United States, and if so, at what place or places, with the probable length of time for the completion of the same; and no Chinese person entering the United States for the purpose of prosecuting studies shall remain therein for a period exceeding ninety days after the completion of the same. The certificate provided for in this act, and the identity of the person named therein, shall, before such person goes on board any vessel to proceed to the United States, be viséed by the indorsement of the diplomatic representative of the United States in the foreign country from which said certificate issues, or of the consular representative of the United States at the port or place from which the person named in the certificate is about to depart; and such diplomatic representative or consular representative whose indorsement is so required is hereby empowered, and it shall be his duty, before indorsing such certificate as aforesaid, to examine into the truth of the facts set forth in said certificate, and if he shall find upon examination that said or any of the facts therein contained are untrue it shall be his duty to refuse to indorse the same. Such certificate viséed as aforesaid shall be prima facie evidence of the facts set forth therein, and shall be produced to the collector of customs of the port in the district in the United States at which the person named therein shall arrive, and afterward produced to the proper authorities of the United States whenever lawfully demanded, and shall be the sole evidence permissible on the part of the person so producing the same to establish a right of entry into the United States; but said certificate may be controverted and the facts therein stated disproved by the United States authorities."

The Clerk will report the amendment recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee recommend the striking out of all after the word "desired," in line 135, down to and including the word "same," in line 143.

Mr. RICE. I beg to say that those lines are stricken out in the report of the committee. Lines are drawn through to indicate the action of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that to be the recommendation of the committee reporting the bill, but this committee must now pass upon it as well.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Mr. Chairman, when I entered the Hall to-day the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] was addressing himself to the bill under consideration, but stepped aside from the line of legitimate argument to allude to a speech which was made by the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in 1862 in reference to the African race.

The honorable gentleman from Indiana requested the unanimous consent of this House that this speech to which I have referred should be published in the RECORD, and I understand that it was given.

It is apparent that his object was not to address himself to the intelligence of this House upon the pending bill; but we are now in a Presidential year and his purpose was to represent the Democracy of this country as unfriendly to the colored race.

The colored man and brother is patted upon the back by Republicans in a Presidential year. But since the honorable gentleman has asked unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD what was said by my friend from New York with regard to the colored race some twenty years ago, I ask to have read from the Clerk's desk the utterances of a Republican Senator [Mr. JONES, of Nevada] during the last Congress, when we were not engaged in skirmishing on the line of a Presidential contest, as a Republican estimate of the African race.

It will be seen that he gave it as his deliberate judgment and conviction that if the restraining influence and guiding intellect of the white man should be removed from the negro free government could not be maintained for ten years. That is a Republican's opinion of the negro race when we were not engaged, as I have said, in a Presidential contest. Now I ask to have read from the Clerk's desk those passages in the speech of the distinguished Senator referred to which I have marked, in order that it may appear in conjunction with the speech of the honorable gentleman from New York.

Does anybody pretend to tell me that it is a blessing to this country that those people are here? It is no fault of ours that they are here; it is no fault of theirs; it is the fault of a past generation; but their presence here is a great misfortune to us to-day, and the question of the adjustment of the relations between the two races socially and politically is no nearer to a settlement now than it was the day Sumter was fired upon.

The philosophy of the history of every age and our experience of the last seventeen years justify me in making the prophecy that the African race will never be permitted permanently to dominate any State of the South. The experiment of conferring upon them political power in proportion to their numbers has thus far proved a dismal failure, and in my judgment will so continue as long as human nature is as it is. The failure has not been because we have not done everything we could to make it succeed, but because laws independent of and above all human laws have irrevocably stamped upon the one race its superiority over the other.

Intellect and intelligence are forces in this world often greater than numbers. It makes no difference what votes you put in a ballot-box, how many little white pellets of paper that signify one thing and dark pellets of paper that signify another. Those pellets of paper in that box which represent a majority of force will in the end rule even if they be a minority of numbers. If, contrary to my expectations, the colored race should permanently secure the control of any of the States of the South, and the whites should tire of trying to overcome the majority of numbers by force or intimidation, I predict that they would migrate to the State where their own race was in the majority.

Does anybody believe if the restraining, the directing, the guiding intellect of the white man that now surrounds the African in the South were entirely taken away and he was left to maintain our institutions alone, that he could do it? I do not know how my friends on this side of the House may feel, but I for one do not believe that they could be maintained without impairment for a period of ten years. This judgment may seem to some to be harsh and unwarranted, but it is the truth as I see it.

Suppose then that when the first ship-load of Africans were landed in this country some one had risen on the floor of one of the assemblies of the States and opposed their landing because they would in the end prove the source of immense disturbance in the country, because their presence would occasion a civil war, because they would produce precisely the effects we have since seen that they have produced in the South, how true these views would have been, though doubtless they would have been regarded as groundless and fanciful alarms. And, digressing for one minute, I ask Senators to reflect what would have been the condition of this entire country if the same proportion of Africans had been in the North as were in the South? I say, then, suppose that objecting to this immigration because it was the immigration of an incongruous race, of a race that could not assimilate or amalgamate with us, this speaker had urged the exclusion of the negro from our country, he would have uttered wise words and given sound advice. How delusive would have been the rejoinder in the light of our experience of any one who might have said: "We have broad fields and extensive acres where cotton, tobacco, and sugar can be raised, and it is for our common advantage to bring in these negroes and obtain the benefit of their cheap labor?"

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. How sharp and pointed the words then spoken, but how soft and dulcet the tones of the gentleman from Indiana to-day! Liberty would expire in the embraces of the negro, and free institutions could not survive in a State dominated by him, said the Republican Senator; but how sweet now the wooings of our friends on the other side!

Before the Clerk had concluded the reading of the above the hammer fell.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to propose an amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow the reading to be concluded?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am willing that by unanimous consent the remainder of the extract should be read or that it should go into the RECORD.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. As unanimous consent was given to the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] to publish a whole speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the extracts I have marked may be finished.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have expressed my hope that the committee would assent to that.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I knew my friend would agree to it.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the extracts.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order. I supposed the committee had given leave to print, not to read. It will take all day to finish the reading.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Oh, no; there is only a little more.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the extracts printed above.

Mr. HAMMOND. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BAGLEY). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Has not this bill the privilege of the floor only for to-day? I understand it is not a continuing order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the order is simply for to-day.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then I hope we will go on and finish the bill without unnecessary talk.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not desire to protract this debate, nor do I want to prevent a vote being taken on this measure, and I would not trouble the committee even for an amendment except to respond to what has been said by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE]. It is to me a little strange that the gentlemen on the other side will insist upon misapprehending what I said and they are disposed to avoid the point I have been seeking to make. When I referred to the position of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] I did not allude to the question as a partisan one at all. This question is not such; it rises above party; it rises above political platforms; it goes back, as I understand it, to the primary question of human rights itself, and I sought to illustrate this simple idea.

Mr. GEORGE. D. WISE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. In a moment. I simply intended to enforce this idea, that when a particular class of people possessed no political power they had no friends. Then they were dangerous to our liberties. If they were permitted to become citizens they would, according to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, put our liberty and form of government in peril. They were thus, while without political power, the subjects of anathema and they were the subjects of my distinguished friend's wit, which is always pointed and always sharp. And I pointed out that so soon as those people became voters, when it was put into their power to make this party strong or the other party strong, the mere fact that they had been clothed with political power revolutionized the opinion of politicians and distinguished men. The negro as a non-voter was a very indifferent kind of fellow in the estimation of the distinguished gentleman from New York, but when the negro could assist in making him or me, his political party or mine, or in unmaking him in a political sense, or in unmaking me, when he was clothed with that power, he became very respectable, and there was nothing for him then or since then but kind words. That is all. I do not seek to make the Democratic party responsible for this position. This prejudice against the colored people has existed in both political parties.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. A word further. I desire to serve notice on my Democratic friends, if they desire to put before the country the respective parties upon this subject of friendship to the colored race and to the rights of the colored people, if they desire to bring that into this discussion, if they challenge that controversy, give us the opportunity and we will be glad to institute a comparison between the two political parties.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask who brought this matter into this controversy to-day? The gentleman from Indiana. Who was it that attacked the chairman of this committee while in the chair, when he could not respond? The gentleman from Indiana. Who began and who is it that insists on having this irrelevant controversy? The gentleman from Indiana. Who is now making this particular complaint on this subject? My honored friend from Indiana. He attacked me when I could not answer.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I did it for your benefit. I wanted you to get right.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman said I became favorable to the negro when he had a right to vote, and that then I began to make eulogies on him in this District. So I did; at the request of respectable colored men whom your party had disfranchised in the Forty-third Congress. I spoke for them "without money and without price." I raised some $700 for the colored population to clear off the debt of one of their churches. It was the Berean church—the black Berean church it was. [Laughter.] Did the gentleman from Indiana ever do that much good or give that much money for the colored people?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It never became necessary for me to do penance in that way for my past sins.

Mr. COX, of New York. This lecture, I beg to say, since the gentleman referred to it, came off at Lincoln Hall. I was introduced by Frederick Douglass. He said if I could stand it he could; and he did. He amnestied me. If any one had that right, it was Douglass. I said to the audience that "I had become color blind." [Laughter.]

Since that time Mr. Douglass has advanced in civilization. He has become color-blind also. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Indiana is a friend, defender, and a brother of that miscegenationist incarnate. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Indiana has asked leave to print a speech of mine made during the war. I do not know what speech it was. It does not make any difference. It is rather late to revamp old prejudices. But since the gentleman asks consent to print one of my speeches against which the statute has been running for nearly twenty-five years, I ask permission to print in the RECORD the Lincoln Hall lecture in honorable encomium of colored brothers and of the African race. Suppose I did eulogize the negro; I bring him out almost as a white-robed angel. [Laughter.] What then? It happened a long time ago. The statute has run against it. It should not to be restored to gratify party hate or personal feeling.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Had not the gentleman from New York better add the statute of infancy to the statute of limitations on that question?

Mr. COX, of New York. To the people of Indiana, whom you are in the habit of addressing, that may seem to be real pungent wit, but to a body of statesmen like this it falls almost as flat as when the gentleman attempted to drag in some of my old speeches.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If you are satisfied with that, I am.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman——

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. LAMB. If there is no disposition to debate this question further, I will yield the floor and call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COX, of New York, having resumed the chair). The question is on the amendments reported by the committee, which will be voted upon together, if there is no objection.

The amendments reported by the committee were then agreed to.

Mr. RICE. I move to amend by striking out of lines 110, 111, and 112 the words "or of such other foreign government of which at the time such Chinese person shall be a subject."

I want to call the attention of the members of this committee to what we are doing at this moment. We are making history, or affording a chance for history to be made, with rather astounding rapidity. We have left the subject of Chinese laborers; they are excluded; every crack and cranny have been stopped.

We are now coming to the question of merchants, travelers, and other persons of the Chinese race, and in this section we are attempting to hinder and impede their coming and going of their own free will and accord, as is provided for in every treaty between this country and China.

More, the words which I moved to strike out also provide that merchants, subjects of other governments than China, but of the Chinese race, shall be hindered and restricted in their efforts to enter this country. Now, that is in direct conflict with our treaties with other nations than China—with Great Britain, with Brazil, with France, if France should obtain Chinese subjects.

I want to know if there has been shown any exigency to induce this House in this hot haste to vote for a provision which must either be scorned and hooted at and ignored as bombast by other nations, or else the enforcement of which will surely lead to difficulty and war. The Chinese laborers have been taken care of. The "Sand Lots" may be lighted up to-night and the war-dance go on. Now let us stop there.

Let us call a halt before we fling this insult into the face of other nations than China.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. RICE; and on a division there were—ayes 21, noes 134.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Section 8 of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. That the master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place shall, at the same time he delivers a manifest of the cargo, and if there be no cargo, then at the time of making a report of the entry of the vessel pursuant to law, in addition to the other matter required to be reported, and before landing, or permitting to land, any Chinese passengers, deliver and report to the collector of customs of the district in which such vessel shall have arrived a separate list of all Chinese passengers taken on board his vessel at any foreign port or place, and all such passengers on board the vessel at that time. Such list shall show the names of such passengers (and if accredited officers of the Chinese, or of any other foreign government, traveling on the business of that government, or their servants, with a note of such facts), and the names and other particulars as shown by their respective certificates; and such list shall be sworn to by the master in the manner required by law in relation to the manifest of the cargo. Any refusal or willful neglect of any such master to comply with the provisions of this section shall incur the same penalties and forfeiture as are provided for a refusal or neglect to report and deliver a manifest of the cargo."

Mr. RICE. I do not desire to impede the triumphant progress of this bill; but I wish from time to time to show its absurdities.

There is not the change of a word, the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," between the section as here proposed and the one which it professes to amend. Is it therefore necessary that we should readopt a section by an amendment which is an exact transcript of that section? I move to strike out this section. If that motion shall prevail it will leave the act already existing in the very form proposed here.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Section 10 of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. That every vessel whose master shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed forfeited to the United States, and shall be liable to seizure and condemnation in any district of the United States into which such vessel may enter or in which she may be found."

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I move to strike out the last word. I do not impugn the motives of any gentleman in respect to his vote upon this bill or upon any other. I may be accused of voting in response to a sentiment. I admit that charge, if gentlemen choose to make it. It is a sentiment, but a sentiment which is part and parcel of my creed as an American and as a Republican.

My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] says he is unwilling to degrade American labor. So am I. I have no desire to degrade American labor; I have no desire to cheapen American labor. But I do not believe that this bill affects that question in the slightest, because in all the discussions which I have heard here, in all the discussions which occurred here two years ago, I do not remember any single attempt to prove that the whole number of Chinese people in this country, even admitting that they are all laborers, affected the average price of wages received by American laborers.

According to the figures produced here the other day there are engaged in labor in this country over 17,000,000 of people; 17,000,000 of people engaged as laborers in this country. I do not believe that there is one intelligent man among the whole 17,000,000 that will admit that Chinese labor affects the average price of wages received by laborers in this country. I give them credit for too much sense, for too much manhood, to believe that any one of them will charge any such thing.

I say that if you desire to prove it produce your figures; simple assertions will not do it. I believe with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that this question of labor brought in here to-day, and brought into the discussion of the tariff bill, is considerably overdrawn. I believe with him that the laborers of twenty years ago are now among the foremost people of to-day; that many of the laborers of twenty years ago are the capitalists of to-day. I heard one gentleman state that twenty years ago he worked for 50 cents a day. To-day he is a Representative on this floor. Twenty years from now the laborers of to-day will be the capitalists; twenty years from now the laborers of to-day will make your laws. [Here the hammer fell.] I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Section 11 of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows:
"SEC. 11. That any person who shall bring into or cause to be brought into the United States by land, or who shall aid or abet the same, or aid or abet the landing in the United States from any vessel, of any Chinese person not lawfully entitled to enter the United States, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000, and imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1, before the word "bring," insert the word "knowingly."

Mr. BUDD. I desire to say that I am opposed to this amendment, but I do not wish to discuss it.

Mr. RICE. It is the unanimous opinion of the committee, as I understand, that this amendment should be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I desire to ask the Chair whether the hour of 5 o'clock, which has now arrived, does not interrupt the consideration of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the order for a recess has for this day been vacated by action of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 12 of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows:
"SEC. 12. That no Chinese person shall be permitted to enter the United States by land without producing to the proper officer of customs the certificate in this act required of Chinese persons seeking to land from a vessel. And any Chinese person found unlawfully within the United States shall be caused to be removed therefrom to the country from whence he came, and at the cost of the United States, after being brought before some justice, judge, or commissioner of a court of the United States and found to be one not lawfully entitled to be or to remain in the United States; and in all such cases the person who brought or aided in bringing such person to the United States shall be liable to the Government of the United States for all necessary expenses incurred in such investigation and removal; and all peace officers of the several States and Territories of the United States are hereby invested with the same authority as a marshal or United States marshal in reference to carrying out the provisions of this act or the act of which this is amendatory, as a marshal or deputy marshal of the United States, and shall be entitled to like compensation, to be audited and paid by the same officers."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the committee to this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the section the following:
"And the United States shall pay all costs and charges for the maintenance and return of any Chinese person who may not have been permitted to land from any vessel by reason of any of the provisions of this act."

Mr. BUDD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose this amendment of the committee, and I wish to state in a few brief words my reasons for doing so.

Mr. HENLEY. I do not think any debate on this question will be necessary. I have prepared an amendment which I think will be found acceptable all around. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting, after the words "Chinese person," the words "having the certificate prescribed by law as entitling such Chinese person to come into the United States."

Mr. BUDD. That makes it all right. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. RICE. I desire to know what this amendment means.

Mr. HENLEY. I can explain it in a few minutes. Under the amendment of the committee, without the amendment which I propose, if a steamship about to leave China should admit as passengers Chinese persons not having the proper certificate or not having the right to come to this country, and should the authorities of the United States upon the arrival of such persons in California refuse to permit them to land, it would then become the duty of the Government of the United States to pay the expenses of such persons back to China. With my amendment the effect of the provision will be that when a steamship company admits to its vessel on the other side Chinese persons with proper certificates, persons having a right to come here——

A MEMBER. Prima facie.

Mr. HENLEY. Then the United States Government is obliged to pay the expense of the return of such persons; but if the steamship company willfully admits on board persons who have no certificates and no right to come here, the company must pay their way back.

Mr. RICE. I do not see how this section, if amended in the manner proposed, would have the effect which the gentleman from California desires. As the provision would read, without any change, any person or steamship bringing Chinese persons unlawfully to this country would be liable to the Government of the United States for all necessary expenses incurred in the investigation of the matter and in the removal of such persons. Now, the amendment proposes that the United States shall pay these expenses. Does it mean that the United States shall pay them in the first instance and then collect them from the person or the steamship company liable to the United States? What does it mean? It seems to me that the amendment creates confusion and contradiction. I do not care anything about this question; it is not my matter; but I call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to this point, so that legislation which is to go out as the work of our committee and the work of this House shall not bear upon its face a contradiction. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The amendment of Mr. HENLEY to the amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The amendment of the committee as amended was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 13 of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows:
"SEC. 13. That this act shall not apply to diplomatic and other officers of the Chinese or other governments traveling upon the business of that government, whose credentials shall be taken as equivalent to the certificate in this act mentioned, and shall exempt them and their body and household servants from the provisions of this act as to other Chinese persons."

Section 15 of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows:
"SEC. 15. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all subjects of China, and Chinese, whether subjects of China or any other foreign power; and the words 'Chinese laborers,' wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers and Chinese employed in mining."

Mr. BRUMM. I move to amend the paragraph last read by inserting after the word "mining" these words:

And that so much of this act and the act to which this is supplementary as can be made operative shall be applied to and enforced against all persons of whatever nationality who are or may be imported into this country under any system of contracts.

Mr. HENLEY. I make a point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. RICE. I hope the gentleman will not make a point of order.

Mr. HENLEY. I am sorry I can not yield to the gentleman's aspirations, but I must make this point of order. The point is that this is a bill entitled "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese,' approved May 6, 1882;" and this amendment is not germane.

Mr. GLASCOCK. There is another point of order. There is pending before the House another bill of the same character.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the point of order.

Mr. BRUMM. As to the first point of order, that the amendment is not germane, I wish to say that can be cured by inserting the words in the title, "and other persons." That can be done here now.

And as to the second point, that there is already reported another bill embracing the substance of this, I am not of the opinion this rule goes so far as to say if there are two bills running parallel to each other, reported by the same or different committees, one when pending can not be amended because the amendment contains the substance of the other.

The substance of the amendment is that the protection of American laborers shall be extended to the Slavonic race. I take for granted this bill can be amended so as to extend its provisions to persons who come here under conditions similar to these Chinese.

While I am proud of my German ancestors, this amendment of mine strikes at no particular nationality, but carries out the principle underlying this whole legislation. It is not a question of race, but one of condition. It is a question as to whether we are willing to permit persons to come into this country who want the benefits and are unwilling to perform the duties or bear the burdens of the country. The whole question rests on that proposition. As to the Chinese, they only want the rights; they want, as it were, the cream of the country, but are unwilling to discharge any of the duties or bear any of the burdens of American citizens. That proposition is involved in my amendment. It is germane, and because it runs parallel and is the substance of another bill can not rule it out.

The CHAIRMAN. According to the title of this bill, which has not been amended, the Chair must rule, as it is confined to the Chinese, the point of order is well taken. This bill proposes to amend certain treaty stipulations relating to the exclusion of Chinese, and Chinese only, and not to persons of any other nationality outside of that treaty.

The point of order is sustained irrespective of another bill in substance the same which may now be pending.

Mr. RICE. I make the point of order against the words in lines 249 and 250 that they are not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. That already has been passed.

Mr. RICE. I did not know it. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was moved to it.

The CHAIRMAN. We are on section 15.

Mr. RICE. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was ruled out. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order to the section comes too late.

Mr. RICE. Is it too late to move an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. RICE. I move to strike out, in lines 249 and 250, "subjects of China or any other foreign power."

Mr. CASSIDY. I make the point of order on that amendment. These words are in print, and the point of order made against the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was that it went beyond the meaning of the title of the bill.

Mr. RICE. This is a bill, as alleged, to execute certain treaty stipulations with China. This provision is against subjects of other nations than the Chinese Empire.

Mr. SPRINGER. But they are Chinese nevertheless.

Mr. RICE. My point of order has been overruled, and I am now addressing myself to the motion I have made to amend the bill, I will inform the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That any violation of any of the provisions of this act, or of the act of which this act is amendatory, the punishment of which is not otherwise herein provided for, shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. BUDD addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HAMMOND. I move to insert what I send to the desk as an additional section to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect any prosecution or other proceedings, criminal or civil, begun under the act of which this is amendatory; but such prosecution or other proceeding, criminal or civil, shall proceed as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. HAMMOND. I offer that, out of abundant caution, as an additional section.

Mr. LAMB. There is no objection on the part of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAMB. I move that the bill be now laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. RICE. Before that I wish to move an amendment to the title of this act, so that it will read: "An act to violate certain treaty stipulations with China and other nations."

Mr. CASSIDY. I make the point of order that the amendment to the title is not in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, no gentleman upon this floor feels a deeper interest in this proposed legislation than I do. As the consideration of the bill was by the order of the House limited to this day, I have refrained from discussing it until I felt assured of its coming to a vote. As we have now reached the last section of the bill I may be pardoned for some brief remarks. I must express my great surprise at the character of this debate, as well as the criticisms which have been indulged in by the opponents of this measure. If there is such a thing as legislative estoppel it would certainly apply in this instance. Not once, but repeatedly, within the last few years Congress has expressed itself in favor of restricting Chinese immigration.

Not only in Congress, but among the voters and people of this country the question has been exhaustively discussed as one interwoven with the future destiny and welfare of our people, and involving the safety and harmony of our social and political institutions. The voice of the people has been echoed by their Representatives as far back as the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress. I had the honor, as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor, acting under its instructions, to report to this House a resolution requesting the President of the United States "to open correspondence immediately with the Governments of China and Great Britain with a view of securing a change or abrogation of all stipulations in existing treaties which permit the unlimited immigration of Chinese to the United States." This resolution was introduced February 25, 1878, and was accompanied by a report (No. 240), which I append. The House passed that resolution, and this was the first practical step toward the desired legislation.

After waiting patiently but in vain for some response to this resolution on the part of the executive department, the committee instructed me to introduce a bill, which was done. This bill was H. R. 2423, third session Forty-fifth Congress, and is commonly known as the "Fifteen passenger Chinese bill." In the report accompanying the bill (No. 62) we endeavored to show from numerous decisions that Congress had the right to repeal a treaty. This view was indorsed by the House, and on the 28th of January, 1879, the bill passed the House by a vote of 155 yeas to 72 nays. It passed the Senate and was vetoed by President Hayes.

The indignation with which this veto was received upon the Pacific slope and among the laboring men of the country brought forth its fruits. The treaty-making power was at last aroused to its duty, and a commission was sent to China to secure such a modification of the existing treaty as would put an end to the evils complained of. On the 17th of November, 1880, a new treaty for this purpose was concluded. When the Forty-seventh Congress convened, in its first session numerous bills were promptly introduced in both branches of Congress to execute the stipulations of the treaty. The Senate passed a bill fixing the period of suspension of Chinese immigration at twenty years, and providing for the identification and registration of those affected by it.

A similar bill had been reported by the House committee. Our committee of the House, being desirous of securing prompt action upon so important a subject, recommended to the House the substitution of the Senate bill for its own bill, then on the Calendar. After the most thorough consideration by the House, the Senate bill, on the 24th day of March, 1882, was passed by a vote of 167 yeas to 66 nays. Upon the 4th of April, 1882, the last day authorized by the Constitution, the President returned the bill to the Senate with his objections to its passage, and being there reconsidered, and not receiving the necessary two-thirds majority, it failed to become a law.

This second veto by the executive department, flung so ruthlessly into the face of the representatives of the people, was met with a storm of criticism and disapprobation stronger than the first. Immediately, therefore, another bill, limited to ten years' duration and shorn of some of the most important and necessary provisions of the vetoed bill, was rushed through the House under a suspension of the rules, without debate, and without opportunity of amendment. This last bill is the existing law.

And now, when we seek to make this law effective, when we propose to accomplish the very object which it had in view, the restriction of Chinese immigration to certain classes and upon certain conditions, we are met by arguments not affecting so much the proposed amendments, but aimed directly against the whole substantive proposition of relief. In view of the facts which I have just recited, that Congress within the past six years has by four different and overwhelming votes declared in favor of this remedial legislation, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I am surprised that at this late day such an attempt should be made. It is not the repeal of this law which the people now desire. It is simply its amendment, so that it may reach and remedy the wrongs which are acknowledged to exist.

Nor, sir, have I been less surprised at this attack upon the law than at the weapons which have been used for the purpose. Ridicule, sentimental and sensational appeal, and fierce denunciation have in turn played their part in the effort to overthrow this bill. The small number of Chinese now in our midst has been cited as a reason for non-action. And yet, can any man say how many more thousands would have crowded our shores except for the agitation of this subject, and the well-known hostility of the Pacific coast to their further influx? Is it not known that we are separated only by a comparatively short distance from 400,000,000 of Chinese, the most of whom are discontented, poor, oppressed, and eager to escape from their unhappy surroundings?

Only four years ago do we not know that there was a great drought and famine which in a single province of China destroyed a population ten times greater than that which now occupies the whole Pacific slope? Has not the history of the past demonstrated the fact that these great roving tribes may at any moment, under some impulse of interest or want or wild fanaticism, be forced from their present habitations to be hurled, like one of their mountain torrents, with resistless fury and destruction against their neighbor states? Are we not to-day divided from them by an ocean, Pacific both in name and by nature, which offers hardly an obstruction to the passage of the rudest and most primitive craft? Who in the light of these facts can ridicule the prospective danger which their coming involves? Who can say in the absence of any law prohibiting their immigration, pressed by hard necessity at home and tempted by alluring promises from corporate wealth here, how many years would elapse before the thousands whom we now claim would increase to millions, demoralizing our institutions, degrading our laboring men and women, and threatening the safety, the happiness, and the stability of society?

But we have heard to-day that the laboring classes are not concerned about this legislation, that it does not affect them, that it has not been shown that these Chinese have reduced the wages of labor, &c. And then, too, we have heard some allusion to the tariff, and surprise is expressed that the Democratic party has shown such an urgent desire to pass this bill.

Sir, it is true that the Democratic party has shown a deep interest in this legislation, and while I do not insist upon making a political issue upon this subject, our friends on the other side seem so disposed. I notice that all the speeches against this bill have been made by our Republican friends. I remember that it was a Republican administration which refused the request made by a Democratic House that negotiations changing the treaty with China should be commenced with a view to restricting Chinese immigration. I recall the fact that two Republican Presidents have resorted to the extraordinary power of the veto to prevent the passage of bills for this purpose. I recall the further fact that the bill we are now endeavoring to amend was passed under whip and spur, and against the protest of the five Democratic members of the Committee on Education and Labor of the last House, who, while declaring their intention to vote for the bill as better than no legislation, said in their minority report:

We doubt the propriety of striking out the section which imposed fine and imprisonment upon Chinese unlawfully in our midst. We fear that corporate greed and power will find points of entry through Mexico or Canada, and if Chinese laborers know that their coming is attended with no personal risk they will more readily make the effort. We also fear that the abolition of the general system of registry will be found to defeat the operation of the law, and also work a hardship to the Chinese already here, as without certificates, as provided in the vetoed bill, they will have no sufficient means of identifying themselves as belonging to the permitted classes.

I knew then that the bill we passed was defective and would require amendment. The tender scruples of an unfriendly Executive must be respected and the committee dare not provoke another veto. If, therefore, gentlemen insist that this measure is a Democratic measure I shall not deny that its origin and success are largely due to Democratic votes.

Nor is it to be denied that the support which it has received upon this floor is due in great measure to its relations to the laboring men of our country.

To the workingman—I care not whether he lives in San Francisco, New York, or Louisville—no bill before Congress is so important as this. If labor is degraded in California the effects of that degradation will reach the whole Union. The cheap cigars, cheap shoes, and the thousand other articles of Chinese handiwork come directly in competition with such work in other parts of the country. Water does not seek its level with greater certainty than the price and condition of labor in one city or State affects its condition in all the States of the Union.

In a self-governing community such as ours this question is of especial importance. Here, if anywhere, it should be the aim of the Government, of its legislative representatives, to elevate the dignity and preserve the self-respect of all its citizens. As are the people so will be the government. If the people are corrupt, if they are ignorant, selfish, or unpatriotic, the government will reflect these ignoble traits in its own features.

The introduction therefore of a class of men like the Chinese, who are without homes or families, whose education and habits disqualify them for citizenship, whose cheap wages degrade labor, is fraught with great danger to our republican institutions and should be promptly and effectually checked.

We say in theory to our citizens that they are to be protected in all their rights and privileges; we say to them in theory that the Government respects and honors labor—honors the bone and sinew of the land. How, then, can we hope to secure a bold, defiant, independent citizenship among the laboring men who comprise four-fifths of our population, if we declare to them by our conduct, by our practical legislation, that these generous theories are but myths, but glittering generalities? Shall we subject them to a competition—to a mode of life—that will make these grand and inspiring truths utter impossibilities? Shall we say to them that the rights and honors of American citizenship are one thing, and their possession, their enjoyment another and a different thing? Shall we, in other words, compel any class of our fellow-citizens to surrender church, home, and school to become mere "hewers of wood and drawers of water" by subjecting them to the shame and degradation which curse the Chinese laborer?

I hope and believe that no such declaration will ever go forth from this body, but that we will recognize the equal rights and dignity of all our citizens by the prompt passage of this bill.

Such a result is demanded by political no less than by industrial considerations. We welcome to our shores all who desire or intend to make this their home, or who expect to become permanent citizens of our Government. The German, the Irish, the French, and other immigrants to our country have quickly and successfully adapted themselves to our institutions. Prompt to defend the honor and to promote the interests of their adopted land, yielding cheerful and ready obedience to its laws and customs, they have illustrated in their lives and vindicated by their conduct the wise policy of immigration. As kindred drops of water, they have mingled and been lost in the great stream of American life. The Chinese have no such intention or experience. They do not come to seek homes. They disdain to accept our institutions; they look with contempt upon our social customs; they defy the authority of our laws; they retain all the distinctive features and characteristics of their national life. Twenty-five years of residence and contact with our people have left them unchanged and unimproved in any important particular. The argument, then, based upon a comparison of this race with our Irish and German fellow-citizens, is utterly without foundation. The Chinese, unlike them, have always been and always will be an alien element in our midst. We want no such servile and degraded class in our Government. We want a brave, patriotic, self-reliant, assimilative citizenship.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another strange and unnatural feature in this debate. Are the representatives of the American people to be arraigned before the world as they have been by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] as violators of the fundamental principles of our Government because of their support of this bill? Is this legislation a new departure in the experience of our own or of other lands? I deny it. I say that the American Congress and the people of the United States are only following now in the path that has already been trodden by France, by England, and by every country in the world that has ever suffered the disadvantages, the horrors, and the burdens of Chinese immigration.

As far back as 1855 the English colony of Victoria levied a capitation tax of $50 upon every Chinese immigrant. In 1861 a similar tax was imposed by the colony of New South Wales, and in 1877 by the colony of Queensland, and also by the French colony of Saigon. The same opposition has been aroused in Java, in Siam, in Singapore, in the Philippine Islands, and in the Australian colonies. Everywhere they have made themselves obnoxious; everywhere heavy penalties and restrictive legislation have been found necessary means of protection. The opinion which this bill impliedly expresses is therefore the opinion of the world. I am astonished, therefore, that our country alone should be singled out for condemnation because of this legislation.

But, sir, especially am I surprised that the gentleman from the State of Massachusetts, my distinguished friend [Mr. RICE], should be so urgent in his opposition to the bill. I recall the fact that fourteen years ago, when, as the census shows, there were just ninety-five Chinamen in the State of Massachusetts, there was a different sentiment on the part of that people and their representatives. That small number of ninety-five Chinamen alarmed the good people of the old Bay State, and a distinguished legislator, Henry Wilson, one of the greatest leaders of her thought and politics—then a Senator from that State, and afterward Vice-President of the United States, springing as he did from the loins of the people, and knowing and sympathizing with their wants—made a noble and emphatic stand against Chinese immigration. Standing yonder in the Senate of the United States fourteen years ago he uttered a sentiment that will be responded to by this House to-day. What is that? Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, declared:

I think the time has come—

And I repeat, this was fourteen years ago—when we should have some action upon this subject—

for it does seem to me at the present day that there is a conspiracy of capital in this country to cast a drag-net over creation for the purpose of bringing degraded labor here to lower and degrade our laboring men. And I think it is time to meet that question.

Following that declaration a convention held in Massachusetts in 1870 adopted this resolution:

Resolved, That while we welcome voluntary immigrants from every clime, and pledge them the protection of our laws and equal opportunity in every field of industry, still we are inflexibly opposed to the importation by capitalists of laborers from China and elsewhere for the purpose of degrading and cheapening American labor, and will resist it by all legal and constitutional means in our power.

This was the declaration of the Labor Reform party.

Another convention held in the same year and in the same State adopted a resolution in the following terms:

Resolved, That, independently of the question as to the expediency of bringing into intimate political and social relations two adverse races of men, we believe it to be wrong to stimulate by artificial means the irruption into our community of swarms of Mongolians, who have neither the wish nor the aptitude to assume the duties and responsibilities of citizenship, and are brought here by interested capitalists only as so much bone and muscle to lower the dignity of labor, degrade the condition of our workingmen, and create and perpetuate distinct classes in our social system.

So said the Democratic party.

At the head of the respective tickets, put in the field under those resolutions, we find the names of Wendell Phillips and John Quincy Adams, names memorable in Massachusetts and in the United States. And when they went to the people of Massachusetts upon those issues, although there were just ninety-five Chinamen in that State, the people responded by a vote of 71,482 out of 151,237; or within a fraction of one-half of all the votes cast. Thus did the people of Massachusetts over fourteen years ago record their approbation of the legislation that we now propose.

And now when the evil has spread all over the land, when hundreds of thousands have flown to our shores from that great bee-hive of China, when four sovereign States of this Union stand pleading at the bar of Congress for this relief, and when one Congress after another has solemnly recorded its judgment [cries of "Vote!"] in favor of this restrictive legislation, it is time, in the eloquent words of you gentlemen in the rear, that we should come to a "vote" on this question. [Applause.]

Mr. RICE. I wondered where the gentleman from Kentucky had been during the day that I had not before heard his voice upon this question. It seems he has been mousing among the records of the past and has raked up from the archives something from the records of Massachusetts which he thinks conflicts with my action here to-day. Had he gone further back he would have found worse things than that. Massachusetts, thank God, moves, and I stand now beneath the sun of to-day and not beneath the sun of fourteen or fifteen years ago. More than that, sir; I speak, I act, I vote here according to my own convictions of duty, and not according to those of any other man, whether he be a son of Massachusetts or a son of Kentucky.

Mr. Chairman, had the gentleman from Kentucky been here during the day he would have known that it is admitted by the friends of this bill that it violates our treaty stipulations with other nations. No one has yet dared to gainsay that point, which I made against the bill at the outset and I challenge contradiction of the statement. This act, if adopted by this House, does violate our treaty relations not only with China but with England and other nations; and my motion, sir, is, that it be amended so that its title shall read in conformity with its contents.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the title proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to violate certain treaty stipulations with China and other nations."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. LAMB. I move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1798) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments for the favorable consideration of the House.

Mr. LAMB. I demand the previous question on the amendments and the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think it is not necessary to read the amendments. Every gentleman knows what they are.

The SPEAKER. If a separate vote is not asked the question will be taken on the amendments as a whole.

The question being taken on the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole, they were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LAMB. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. LAMB and Mr. VAN EATON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 184, nays 13, not voting 125; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The following were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. HARDY with Mr. JOHNSON.
Mr. DOWD with Mr. HOLTON.
Mr. HEWITT, of New York, with Mr. VALENTINE.
Mr. GRAVES with Mr. BREITUNG.
Mr. DORSHEIMER with Mr. MOREY.
Mr. REAGAN with Mr. HOWEY.
Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. CHACE, except on the tariff.
Mr. HEMPHILL with Mr. YORK.
Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. RUSSELL.
Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York, with Mr. CULBERTSON, of Kentucky.
Mr. RIGGS with Mr. KELLOGG.
Mr. BENNETT with Mr. BURLEIGH.
Mr. YOUNG with Mr. PAYNE.
Mr. BELMONT with Mr. BARR.
Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, with Mr. MCKINLEY.
Mr. SNYDER with Mr. HANBACK.
Mr. COBB with Mr. E. B. TAYLOR.

The following were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, with Mr. CALKINS.
Mr. THOMAS with Mr. PHELPS.
Mr. CLARDY with Mr. BELFORD.
Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. MCCOID.
Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. REED.
Mr. MULLER with Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey.
Mr. THOMPSON with Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania.
Mr. DINGLEY with Mr. KLEINER.
Mr. ROCKWELL with Mr. MULDROW.
Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. WAIT.

Mr. MORSE with Mr. PAYSON.
Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. RUSSELL.
Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. WASHBURN.
Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. RANNEY.

The following were also announced as paired:

Mr. GREEN with Mr. HOOPER, until May 5.
Mr. JONES, of Alabama, with Mr. LONG, until May 5.
Mr. WOOD with Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, until May 10.
Mr. JORDAN with Mr. BELFORD, until May 5.
Mr. MUTCHLER with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania, until May 6.
Mr. MATSON with Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, until May 5.

The following were announced as paired on the Chinese bill:

Mr. WADSWORTH with Mr. TOWNSHEND. If present, Mr. WADSWORTH would vote "no" and Mr. TOWNSHEND "ay."

Mr. RYAN with Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts. If present, Mr. RYAN would vote "ay" and Mr. DAVIS "no."

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan, with Mr. PETERS. If present, Mr. HATCH would vote "no" and Mr. PETERS "ay."

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. MILLARD. If present, Mr. MILLARD would vote "no" and Mr. ADAMS "ay."

Mr. HUNT with Mr. POLAND. If present, Mr. HUNT would vote "ay" and Mr. POLAND "no."

Mr. SPRIGGS. I desire to state that when my name was called I voted inadvertently. I am paired with Mr. REED and will withdraw my vote.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to say that unless it is so stated in the pair no one is paired on this bill.

Mr. MCCOID. I wish to say that I authorized a pair until 4 o'clock to-day. Returning to the Hall after that time, I have voted.

Mr. LAMB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENSIGN L. K. REYNOLDS.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire now to ask the House to do a graceful act of kindness which I have two or three times before endeavored to have done. It is to pass a joint resolution of the Senate to allow Ensign L. K. Reynolds to accept a medal from the Government of Austria for an act of humanity. He has left our shores on the expedition for the relief of Lieutenant Greely and his party, but if we pass this resolution now he can be reached by telegraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will not do that in the absence of gentlemen who have heretofore objected.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have made my arrangements with those gentlemen. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY] has consented that the joint resolution be taken up.

Mr. WELLER. I have withdrawn my objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that my friend, after a moment's reflection, will see the impropriety of calling this matter up in the absence of gentlemen who have objected to it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have made my arrangements with them, and they are perfectly content. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY] was here a short time ago.

Mr. WELLER. I saw him.

Mr. HOLMAN. I regret exceedingly to interpose an objection. I am thoroughly and heartily opposed to resolutions of this kind, but still I would not object if gentlemen were present who heretofore have objected to this particular joint resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

AMERICAN-SPANISH COMMISSION.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for your consideration a communication from the Secretary of State recommending the appropriation of the sum of $22,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to meet the proper obligations of the Government on account of the courteous services of the various umpires of the late American-Spanish Commission.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, May 3, 1884.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TUCKER, for Monday next.

PRINTING TESTIMONY.

On the request of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors unanimous consent was granted to have printed the testimony of the Mississippi River Commission.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. RANDALL that the House adjourn, and upon a division, there were—ayes 10, noes 21.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I now respectfully renew my request.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no quorum here and you can not pass anything. You may as well adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no quorum here.

Mr. COX, of New York. I renew my request.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the use of trying that?

Mr. COX, of New York. The objection is not insisted upon.

Mr. RANDALL. It is insisted upon.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope my colleague will yield to the inevitable.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would yield——

Mr. RANDALL. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. COX, of New York. No business has intervened since the motion to adjourn was voted down.

Mr. RANDALL. If gentlemen prefer I will withdraw my motion, and they can go on here as long as they please without a quorum.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think there will be no objection to my request.

Mr. RANDALL. There will be objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has lost all the "milk of human kindness."

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will have to present something more potent than an appeal of that kind.

Mr. COX, of New York. I can not furnish the gentleman anything stronger than milk this evening. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. RANDALL that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BURLEIGH: Petition of veterans of Washington County, New York, in reference to pensions—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. J. M. CAMPBELL: Papers relating to H. R. 6830, for the relief of Adam J. Greer—to the same committee.

By Mr. CONVERSE: Resolutions of the Wool-Growers' Association of Texas, and of the Wool-Growers' Association of Clark County, Ohio, for the restoration of the wool tariff of 1867—severally to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of James P. Titus and 75 others, citizens of Ohio, of the same import—to the same committee.

By Mr. COOK: Petition of T. B. Denslon and 300 others, for a double-track railroad from New York to San Francisco, and against canals—to the Committee on Railroads and Canals.

By Mr. DOCKERY: Memorial of Ben Loan Post, No. 33, Department of Missouri, asking for an increase of pensions in certain cases—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HISCOCK: Petition of the New York Commercial Exchange, asking that macaroni and other farinaceous goods be placed back on the duty list—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MONEY: Petition of citizens of Mississippi, for educational aid from the Government—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. MOREY: Petition of W. A. Paxon and others, of Jamestown, Ohio, for relief for the sufferers by the recent tornado in Ohio—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. MORRISON: Memorial of Alex. Guin and others, relative to the Chinese restriction act—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, memorial from citizens of Lombard, Ill., for the reduction of war-tariff taxes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. PRYOR: Petition of Solomon Andrews and others and of Robert Figg and others, for the erection of public buildings at Huntsville, Ala.—severally to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SINGLETON: Petition of W. L. McLean, W. A. Drennan, and others, in favor of the Senate educational bill—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. STRUBLE: Two petitions from citizens of Iowa, asking for the forfeiture of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in the construction of railroads, &c.—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. TILLMAN: Memorial of sundry citizens of Hampton County, South Carolina, asking for an appropriation in aid of education, &c.—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. VAN EATON: Petition of numerous colored citizens of Amite County, Mississippi; of J. T. Tomkin and F. A. Gibson, superintendent of education, and many other citizens of Mississippi, for aid to education—to the same committee.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 5, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Journal in respect of the reconsideration of the bill (H. R. 450) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa," is incorrect in not stating that the Senate reconsidered the vote on the third reading of the bill as well as on its passage. The Journal if there be no objection will be amended accordingly. If there be no objection the Journal as amended will stand approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Anton Baertsch, late private Company K, Twenty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, a resident of the National Soldiers' Home at Milwaukee, Wis., praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Dudley Post, No. 28, Grand Army of the Republic, Arlington, Vt., praying the enactment of the legislation in regard to pensions recommended by the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Philip Schatzle, a naturalized American citizen, now residing in Lower Bavaria, Germany, praying for benevolent support by the Government of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Admiral Du Pont Post, No. 24, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Pennsylvania, by James A. Clark, commander, and Charles K. Fox, adjutant, praying that a pension of $8 a month be granted to every Union soldier and sailor who served sixty days or more in the late war of the rebellion, and who under existing laws are not entitled to that or a greater sum; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of a large number of citizens of El Dorado, Kans., praying that the Nez Percé Indians may be removed from the Indian Territory to their former home in Idaho. As the bill for the relief of those Indians has been reported, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a petition of the Grape-Growers' Association of Saint Helena, Cal., praying that the duty on brandies and wines may not be reduced and that the tariff on raisins may be restored; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the board of supervisors and other citizens of Mono County, California, praying that an error in running the boundary line between the States of California and Nevada, by which the counties of Mono, El Dorado, and Alpine, of the former State, suffered a loss of territory, may be corrected, and a new survey of the said boundary line be made by the proper officers of the United States Government; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Eastern Ohio, praying for a restoration of the duty on wool; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of McKendree Mustin Post, No. 319, Grand Army of the Republic, Mendon, Ohio; a petition of Hazlett Post, No. 81, Grand Army of the Republic, Zanesville, Ohio; and a petition of the Colonel Matthias H. Bartilson Post, No. 407, Grand Army of the Republic, Gilmore, Ohio, praying for the enactment of such legislation in regard to pensions as is recommended by the committee on pensions of the Grand Army of the Republic; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Andrew E. Johonnot, administrator de bonis non of Dr. William Johonnot, formerly of the army of the Revolution, praying for the payment of certain sums alleged to be due him from the Government of the United States as the representative of Dr. William Johonnot; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the memorial of West & Marshall, publishers of the Sunday News; T. E. Harwood, publisher of the Daily Gazette; and L. E. Weixelbaum, publisher of the Journal, citizens of Springfield, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to copyright news; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2147) regulating the retirement of officers in the United States Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5261) making an appropriation for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5692) to adopt the "Revised International Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea," reported it without amendment.

Mr. VEST. I am also directed by the same committee to report back adversely the bill (S. 201) to establish rules for preventing collisions at sea and on the waters of the United States. It is identical with the bill just reported, and I move its indefinite postponement.

Mr. HOAR. I have not examined the bill, but I should like to have the adverse report stand on the Calendar next to the other bill, so that if there be any reason why the Senate should prefer one bill to the other it may be stated then.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, the bill which I have moved be indefinitely postponed is identical with the House bill. I believe I had the honor to introduce the bill which is reported adversely. We simply took the House bill, which came to us while we were considering the Senate bill, and adopted the House bill.

Mr. HOAR. The two bills are identical?

Mr. VEST. Identical.

Mr. McMILLAN. The House bill is the bill recommended by the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I knew there were several propositions on the subject. I had not seen these two bills, and desired to secure the fair consideration of any one that might be thought desirable hereafter.

Mr. VEST. I will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that I compared the two bills and found them identical; but if the Senator finds any difference he can move to amend the House bill so as to make it correspond to the Senate bill.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; let the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referrred the bill (S. 547) granting a pension to John C. F. Beyland, of New York, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4707) granting a pension to Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S 1657) granting a pension to Louisa V. de Kilpatrick, widow of Maj. Gen. Judson Kilpatrick, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CULLOM. I am also directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1259) granting arrears of pension to W. N. Berkley, to report it adversely, and to move its indefinite postponement, as the party who seeks the arrears of pension can get relief at the office of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, there being no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2148) granting a pension to William A. Penfield; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER introduced a bill (S. 2149) authorizing suits for damages in cases of death caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of a person or corporation in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PIKE introduced a bill (S. 2150) granting a pension to Noah E. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2151) for the relief of William H. Davis, of Oakland, California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 2152) making appropriation for the repair of the custom-house wharf, Charleston, South Carolina; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BUTLER. I suppose the Committee on Commerce is the proper committee to consider the bill, as it is for the repair of the custom-house wharf, a Government wharf, in the City of Charleston. I ask to refer with the bill a letter of the collector of customs of that port, which is also accompanied by estimates as to the cost of the repair and construction. I move that the bill, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2153) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Brockett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2154) to prevent the acquisition of real estate by aliens, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 2155) to restrict to aliens and foreign companies and corporations the ownership of public land and of any land in the Territories; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALLISON. Was not a bill of like character just referred to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The titles are substantially the same.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That bill, I think, is different. However, I do not care to which committee it is referred.

Mr. ALLISON. Neither do I; only we ought to confine the subject to one committee.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I understand that the bill of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] refers to the ownership of land anywhere in the United States, while this bill is principally confined to public lands in the Territories. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2156) granting a pension to Corydon

Millard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 2157) to grant to the Gulf and Chicago Air-Line Railway Company the right to construct bridges over navigable water courses; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 84) providing for the supply of depositories of public documents, with the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and Statutes at Large; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Edwin T. Pilkenton (S. 1718, Forty-seventh Congress) be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1042) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah Linfield;

A bill (H. R. 1798) to amend an act entitled, "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882;

A bill (H. R. 2425) granting a pension to Catharine Henry;

A bill (H. R. 2447) for the relief of Catherine Terry;

A bill (H. R. 2480) granting a pension to Margaret Kearns;

A bill (H. R. 4189) ganting a pension to Caroline Van Norton;

A bill (H. R. 4191) granting a pension to Jane Bracken;

A bill (H. R. 6364) granting a pension to William H. Whitcomb.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed enrolled bill (H. R. 1319) to adjust the accounts of John B. Monteith, deceased; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII. Order of Business 272, being the bill (S. 1477) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, District of Columbia, stands at the head of the Calendar, and will now be read, the time for its being passed over having expired, the Chair understands.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, being Senate bill 1448.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to give notice in this connection (the Senator from Maine may be influenced by it) that I shall feel compelled to call up the Indian appropriation bill to-morrow at the close of the morning business, and I hope the Senator from Maine will try to get the shipping bill out of the way before that time.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator from Maine to withdraw his motion so as to allow me to make a statement which will only take a few minutes and dispose of the matter announced by the Chair for to-day.

Mr. FRYE. After the shipping bill is taken up it can be laid aside informally for that purpose.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I wish to state that the first order of business is what is called the free-bridge bill——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Virginia will suspend for a moment the Chair will ask if there is unanimous consent. Is there objection to the Senator from Virginia making a statement on the subject of the order of business? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not wish to object to the proposition of the Senator from Maine, but the bridge bill is now in such a form as that all the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia have agreed to it; but as there were only two copies of it made, it is desirable to hold it over until to-morrow, so that all may have a better opportunity of examining it as it is now prepared and that the amendments may be printed. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill shall go over until to-morrow and occupy the same position on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the motion of the Senator from Maine is agreed to it will leave the bridge bill precisely where it now stands, at the head of the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That is all I wanted to have understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

The motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MCPHERSON to the amendment of Mr. VEST.

The amendment of Mr. VEST was to add as additional sections the following:

SEC. —. That section 2513 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. —. That from and after the 1st day of January, 1885, any citizen or citizens of the United States may purchase the whole of any steam or sail vessel, no matter where said vessel may have been built, whether within the United States or in a foreign country, or whether said vessel may have been owned in whole or in part by an alien or aliens; and said vessel shall be registered free of duty as to her hull, spars, appliances, outfit, and equipment (including boilers, engines, and machinery, if a steam vessel), as a vessel of the United States, by the collector in any port of entry in the United States to whom application for such registry may be made by said citizen or citizens, in the same manner as though said vessel had been built in the United States.

Provided, That such ship shall be excluded from the coastwise trade.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President, for twenty years past our merchant marine has been gradually but steadily declining. The legislative department of our Government during those years has been constantly discussing the causes which have led to its decline. From year to year those discussions have come up and have ended in nothing. The discussions have been taken up by the public press, by the magazines, but thus far it has resulted only in an attempt to discover the causes of the decline.

Two years ago, as a member of the Commerce Committee of this body, I had the honor of reporting to the Senate a resolution creating a joint committee of the two Houses, with power to sit during the recess and investigate the causes of the decline of the American merchant marine, and also to propose measures for its revival. The committee was appointed and sat for a long time during the recess two years ago, and reported to this body and to the other House what the committee in their judgment believed to be the causes of the decline and also what they believed would be remedies for the evil.

The Commerce Committee of this body took up that report and presented to the last session of the Forty-seventh Congress an extensive bill for the relief of the American merchant marine. That bill passed the Senate and a similar bill passed the other House, but at the close of the session either bill failed to become a law by the two Houses failing to agree on the various amendments which had been made.

At the beginning of this session of Congress the Commerce Committee took up the question where it had left it and prepared and presented to this body another bill very similar to that which was presented to the last Congress, but in the judgment of the committee improved in many respects. This bill has to do only with propositions which tend to revive the American merchant marine. We no longer propose to continue the discussion as to what has led to its decline. That contest has been going on quite long enough, one side of the Chamber charging that the great destruction, the great decline of the American merchant marine was caused by the late war, while our friends upon the other side have not been willing to acknowledge that their prowess did so much to destroy it as we have held upon this side. Doubtless it may be well for the time being to pass over the causes which have led to the decline and to bring ourselves to the consideration of those measures which it is believed will tend to its revival and its advancement.

The bill which is now under consideration had, I believe, the unanimous support of the committee, particularly the support of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] who has spoken here upon it, and I confess that I was greatly surprised when I found the Senator from Missouri ridiculing and denouncing this measure as inadequate and of no avail. In the speech which he delivered he spoke of the pending bill in the following language:

To assume that the measure reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will, by remedying the present maritime system of the United States as to all these minor details in sailing a ship, remove the deadly blight upon our merchant marine is equivalent to the empiricism that mistakes some cutaneous eruption for the organic disease which is sapping the life of a patient, and seeks with cuticura and moderate doses of sulphur to bring back health and vitality.

This is the language which the Senator from Missouri uses in regard to the measure, in the formation of which he had no small part. He took part with the joint committee in investigating the causes of the decline of our marine, he took part in all the discussions which grew out of that investigation, and he has taken a very prominent part in the making up of the measure which we now have before us.

But while the Senator thus turns aside with ridicule this measure

he does not fail to present to this body his own panacea for all the evils from which the American merchant marine has been suffering for the past twenty years, and he sums it up in one assertion, in one declaration, and that is simply "free ships."

If the American citizen, he says, be permitted to purchase ships where he can buy them the cheapest, then the American merchant marine will be revived; it will then be rapidly restored to the position which it occupied during the years in the decade from 1850 to 1860. I am surprised that the Senator should have come to this conclusion, for certainly during the investigations which were had by the joint committee we received no such information from any of the practical ship-owners or any of the great and practical merchants of this country. I say almost without exception the leading shipping merchants who came before the committee said one and all that "free ships" would be no remedy whatever for the evils which were then existing. This was particularly true of the president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, Mr. Houston, who came before that committee and gave his testimony in regard to this question. Let us see for a moment what he said in regard to it. When asked his opinion upon the free-ship question, he said:

Mr. HOUSTON. I consider it would be very bad policy for the Government of the United States or the people to attempt to carry on its commerce in foreign-built ships, for the reason that unless you build ships here you would never be able to support repair-shops and founderies, to make repairs as are required to be made from time to time. Unless you have ships to build you can not sustain your ship-yards; you can not separate the two.

Mr. VEST. Is it not a fact that Germany bought her iron steamships from Great Britain and repaired them in her own yards?

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe that is not entirely so; but Germany is so near England it is easy for her to repair her ships there. There were some large French steamers running to the United States, built in England, and when they wanted to change the character of the ships they had them lengthened and sent them to England's yards.

And so on in many places Mr. Houston, who is one of the best managers of our foreign ship interest in this country, and who has conducted the Pacific Mail out of its troubles into smooth waters, gave most unequivocal evidence before the committee that in his judgment "free ships" would be no remedy, and that "free ships" were not even desirable for this country, for he held, as I have read, that the necessity of having ship-yards and being able to build our own iron ships was of greater importance to the country than the ability to be able to buy our ships for 10 or 15 per cent. less in some foreign market.

Mr. Houston told the committee at that time that he had been sent abroad by his company a few months before to investigate in regard to the cost of iron steamships in England as compared with the cost in the United States, and he found that the cost in the United States was from 12 to 15 per cent. more than in England, and consequently his company decided to have ships built here instead of abroad. Not only is this the testimony of this gentleman, but the Senator from Missouri took occasion to read largely from the statements made by Mr. Griscom, of Philadelphia, who is the manager of the Philadelphia line which has been running four American ships under the American flag and six ships under the English flag, and who is also manager of the Red Star line which runs from New York to Antwerp under the Belgian flag. Let us see what Mr. Griscom himself says in regard to the proposed remedy of the Senator from Missouri. I read from a letter written by Mr. Griscom to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]:

307 WALNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA, January 29, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: After reflecting upon my talk with Senators MILLER and VEST I have concluded to send you some copies of a pamphlet (in the preparation of which I assisted) which was presented and read before the Congressional committee of 1882, and which presents generally my views on the shipping question, substantially those presented to those gentlemen last week. If after reading this carefully they will propound questions to me I will cheerfully answer them orally or in writing.

The argument of this pamphlet was based upon our personal experience in this business, and can be supported by facts in such shape as may be desired.

It must be accepted as a fact in any effort to reach a true solution of this problem that while the first cost of a foreign ship is less than one built here, which increases the difficulty, still the continued greater cost of running as against the foreign competitor is the important factor after all, and will make the admission of free ships fail as a remedy. Of this I am confident from my experience of the business.

The owners of the Red Star line will yield to no other American citizen in public spirit and loyalty to our flag, but in this commercial question their own financial safety would prevent them from availing of the passage of a free-ship law to resume our flag, unless this greater cost of running was equalized by some general policy by our Government. This is the practical exposition of the problem stripped of everything but the commercial surroundings, and which must be met by Government aid of some kind. My views of the correct method are embraced in the inclosed form of a bill, modeled after the French law. The French Government, after trying free ships for an indefinite period, have had to enact this law as the only solution, and it would appear we would be unwise not to profit by their experience.

They have for half a century seen England supply them with free ships and then put on subsidized lines against them in every direction, until with free ships they have been beaten on every contested route. That such would be our experience if we expected to find a remedy there no thinking man can doubt. Liberal mail compensation would probably be a step in the proper direction, but it is altogether too limited in its application to generally restore our commerce.

England has adopted this plan, and with the cheapest labor in the world to mine the ore and coal and construct and run the ship she has wondrously succeeded; but we are differently situated.

We have ore and coal and skilled labor for both constructing and running, but we must, to successfully compete, have general Government aid to offset the dearer cost of running. That is the whole question, excepting one important consideration, the greater value of capital in this country. Therefore, to overcome the greater cost of running and the higher value of capital here, our remedy, to be successful, must be more searching than that adopted by Great Britain, and so the proposed bill inclosed endeavors to be.

I do not wish to weary you, so I cease here. At your service, or your brother Senators', to pursue the matter in any manner you may think best, I am, my dear sir,

Yours, very truly,

C. A. GRISCOM.

Hon. W. J. SEWELL,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

There, Mr. President, we have the testimony of one of the most successful shipmasters in this country. Would it not be well for the theorists in this country, would it not be well for the theorists in this body to listen to the words of wisdom which came from a practical business man who understands this question thoroughly and has tested it in all its various aspects as a business proposition? He tells us plainly and conclusively that "free ships" will not solve the problem; that if "free ships" were given to his company to-day they would not transfer their line of steamers that runs under the Belgian flag to the American flag, because they could not afford to run it at the increased cost and expense involved; and I believe since that letter was written and since this discussion commenced here (I have at least seen it stated in the press) the four American ships of the Philadelphia line which were flying the American flag have been transferred and put under the English flag and are to-day sailing under it.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. He reads a letter from Mr. Griscom, who commends in very fine terms the French system, the bounty system enacted a few years ago by the French Chambers. Now, I ask the Senator if the French Government does not pay a bounty to foreign vessels that are brought under the French flag; not as large a bounty as it does French-built vessels, but if it does not pay a bounty to foreign-built vessels that are brought under the French flag? Is not that the law of France to-day?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I do not so understand it. The French law, as I understand it, pays first a bounty for the building of the vessels in French ship-yards. The result has been that a number of English ship-builders have transferred their plant from England to France and are there to-day building ships. The law pays a large bounty first for the building of ships in France, and then it pays a bounty of 30 cents a ton for every thousand miles run by these ships in the merchant marine in France. Not only does Mr. Griscom recommend the French system, but he also approves in very strong terms of that proposition in our bill which proposes to give the steamers adequate pay for the carrying of the mails.

I say then, Mr. President, that in my judgment it would be well for this body to lay aside theories, to lay aside mere fine-sounding phrases and rhetoric in regard to "free ships," and to take the counsels of men like Mr. Griscom and Mr. Houston, the president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, take their experience, which has been learned at great cost to themselves and their associates, and base upon their judgment and upon the judgment of other large ship-owners and ship-masters in this country some measures of relief. If we are to be constantly dealing with mere theories and sophistry the American merchant marine will continue to dwindle and pass away.

Neither can I find any reason for adopting the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to give us "free ships" in connection with our general tariff system. I am unable to understand why we should protect manufactures of all kinds in this country, manufactures of iron, of brass, of steel, of cottons, of woolens, and of every variety, and that when we come to a ship, the great cost of which is labor, we should abandon protection. More than 90 per cent. of the entire cost of every iron going steamship in the world is made up of labor, taking the ore from the mine and the coal from the mine and converting them first into pig-iron and then into bar-iron and steel plates out of which the ship is made. So long as we maintain our present system, so long at least we should maintain a fair tariff upon ships.

For one, I am willing to say here, and to make this proposition if it should meet with favor on the other side, that instead of the present navigation laws, which prevent any ship from having an American registry unless it be built in America, I shall be entirely willing to provide that ships may be imported like other manufactured articles, simply putting upon them a fair rate of duty, either so much per ton of registry or a certain percentage ad valorem upon their cost, and that would put them on a par with all other manufactures in this country and protect the labor which is used in their production.

Mr. BECK. In connection with that proposition, will the Senator allow me to ask him to explain to the Senate how we could put them on an equality then with their foreign competitors to whom we have by treaty given the same rights as our own people? Under our tariff protection one American is competing with another, and all are protected alike; but how are you going to import a ship under a tariff-tax to compete under a high duty with the cheap free ships of the German, the Frenchman, and the Englishman? How can our men compete if they have to pay that additional cost? That is the difficulty I see about it.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The recommendation of Mr. Griscom is that we shall adopt the bounty system, and the recommendation of Mr. Houston is that we should allow a liberal pay for the carrving of foreign mails. Certainly we can not expect that our shipping can live in free and open competition with that of Great Britain or France or Germany, whose labor costs them from 50 to 60 per cent. less than it does in our merchant marine. Unless the Government is willing to do something, unless the Government is willing to spend some money upon it in the way of bounties or subsidies, if you choose to use that offensive word, then there can be no question but that the decline of the American merchant marine must go on. If it is of not enough value to our country to foster it and to pay for it, then we can not have it. There can be no question about that.

In regard to the protection which should be given to building of ships, let us look for a moment at what the cost of a ship is made up of; here is the amount of material used in the construction of a 4,000-ton iron steamship:

	Pounds.
Plates	2,535,649
Angles	750,687
Beams	289,386
Rivets	126,405
Forgings and bars	270,726

of iron consumed in the hull. The engine is made up as follows:

	Pounds.
Iron castings	746,252
Brass castings	52,769
Lead	5,231
Sheet copper	49,816
Boiler-plate	506,723
Bar-iron	383,209
Rivets	39,944

The amount of lumber consumed is 786,462 square feet.

Here we see what it is that goes to make up an iron ship. We have in this country all the industries which produce every one of these items. We have them in abundance, we can produce them as good as they are produced in foreign countries; but every Senator knows that they can not be produced as cheaply here as they can be in England, simply because of the increased cost of labor. If iron steamships are to be imported free, then certainly none can be built in this country and none will be built; and as we know that wooden ships are slowly but surely passing away, if ships are admitted free into this country it will not be twenty-five years before there will not exist in this country a single ship-yard worthy of the name, one that would be able in cases of emergency to build a 4,000, 5,000, or 6,000 ton ship.

If you will go back to the debates which were had when our navigation laws were passed, you will find that the founders of our Government and those who took part in those discussions gave as the chief reason for the navigation laws and for the prevention of any ship having an American registry unless it was built in America, that ship-yards capable of turning out naval vessels were as important to the defense of this country as fortifications upon our seacoast, and as guns, and armies, and navies. They believed it to be wise to encourage the building of ships in this country. Then ships were built of wood, and we could build them as cheap as or more cheaply than any other nation in the world. But now the condition of affairs is changed. All great and important vessels either for the merchant marine or navies must be built of iron or steel, and if they are to be built in this country there must be some protection of the manufacturers who produce the material, there must be some protection of the labor that is employed in it, there must be some protection to the ship-builders themselves.

Let us look for a moment at the amount of labor put into a 4,000-ton ship. I have here the number of days' work consumed, which are accurate, as the figures are taken from the books of a ship-builder:

	Days' work.
Platers, calkers, riveters, planers, and filers	58,750
Carpenters	7 104
Joiners	12,207
Painters	4,374
Total days' work on hull of a 4,000-ton ship	82,435
Machinists, boiler-makers, pattern-makers, and molders	108,500

If you pass your "free-ship" amendment, for every 4,000-ton ship that is built you are to give 190,935 days' labor to the mechanics who are ship-builders upon the Clyde, and you are to take that amount of labor away from American laborers and American shipwrights.

I am unable to find any sufficient reason for repealing the navigation laws in regard to the admission of foreign ships to American registry, but, as I have before stated, in order that there may be some settlement of this question and in order that there may be harmony running through all our laws in regard to the importation of foreign manufactures, I am for one entirely willing to consent that an amendment imposing a proper duty upon ships shall be passed, and then if any American citizen prefers to buy a foreign ship he may do so, simply paying a duty as all other importers are compelled to do.

I believe, in short, Mr. President, that the remedy proposed by the Senator from Missouri is totally inadequate, that it can do us no good whatever; that to say to an American capitalist to-day "You may buy your ship where you can buy it the cheapest, and then put it under the American flag and take it and sail it in competition with English ships, with French ships, and with German ships, and ships of all other nations" is equivalent to inviting him to sink his money in the deepest sea, for certainly it can not be done without some further Government aid. I believe that the bill now under consideration presents many aids, and if it passed into a law will do very much to increase and build up the American merchant marine. Without going into the details of the bill, as they have already been explained by the Senator from Maine, let me say that I believe the one section which provides for compensation for the carrying of the mails to be worth more than all the residue of the bill, to be worth more than any and all the suggestions which have been made in regard to our merchant marine. I find in yesterday's New York Times an interview with Mr. Houston, whose testimony I have referred to given before the joint commission; he has been interviewed on this question, and he speaks knowingly upon it. He says in regard to this mail pay that if this section of the bill goes into effect, in his judgment, it will increase the American merchant marine 100 per cent. in the next ten years.

That is the judgment of the president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company as to the results which will grow out of the adoption of this section. The Senator from Missouri, who I believe substantially approved of this section in the committee, seems partially to retire from that indorsement, or at least he desired to connect with it something which he called the British system. I do not know why it is that this British mania is running all through the country and has even got into the Senate and is to affect our legislation here. There seems to be a desire in our fiscal legislation, in everything pertaining to our tariff and shipping legislation, to be able to say that this is the British law and that this is the British system. The Senator from Missouri said he was entirely willing to accept the section in regard to mail-pay if we would put it in force in the way that Great Britain puts it in force. Let me read his words. Speaking of the mail-pay subsidy, he said:

> That Great Britain has paid liberally for ocean mail service is certainly true, and her vast colonial system has made this outlay absolutely necessary, but she has never given sums of money out of hand and as naked subsidies, as is charged by the subsidy advocates of the United States.
> The rule adopted by the English Government has always been to advertise all her ocean mail service to the lowest bidder and to admit the world to become bidders. A striking instance of this is found in the history of the Peninsular and Oriental Company.

That language is very strong, it is very clear, and it is very emphatic. In view of the facts as they are given to us by history and by executive documents, I scarcely know how to understand it. He says here:

> The rule adopted by the English Government has always been to advertise all her ocean mail service to the lowest bidder, and to admit the world to become bidders.

In short, to take all other nations into her mail contract system. The ease and grace with which the Senator from Missouri skims over the facts which underlie this great question without disturbing them is astonishing. To my mind the Senator at some time in his brilliant career can not have been less than an admiral of a merchant-marine fleet on the Missouri or the Mississippi. As I read the history of the English contracts I find it absolutely and unqualifiedly opposed to the statement of the Senator. I am unable to understand just what he means by this broad assertion that England has always let her foreign mail service to the lowest bidder and has admitted all the nations of the world into her biddings. Let us look for a moment at what are the facts in regard to this.

Substantially her mail subsidy system began with the building of the Cunard line. A proposition was made for carrying the mails from Liverpool to New York. Cunard came in with his company with four 1,200-ton ships in 1840. These cost to build about $200,000 each, making the total cost of the line $800,000. For the service of carrying the mail on these four ships between Liverpool and New York the Cunard line received the first year $413,000. The next year, finding that the service did not pay, that it was not profitable to the company, the British Government increased it to $550,000—70 per cent. upon the whole cost of the ships. This increase went on. The year after it was increased to $705,666, in 1846. Then other ships were put on of larger tonnage, and the subsidy was still further increased.

About this time the United States adopted a similar system and subsidized the Collins line, but it led to acrimonious debates in Congress, and serious contest, and finally the subsidy was withdrawn and the line went down. From that day to this we have scarcely sailed a steamer under the American flag from New York to Liverpool. We have maintained the Pacific Mail, we have maintained a few lines to the West Indies, and here and there we have sent out a ship, but the failure of Congress to support the Collins line as against the Cunard line was one of the most serious blows which has ever been struck at the American merchant marine.

The contract with the Peninsular and Oriental line was much more of a subsidy even than that which was given to the Cunard line. It went still further; it guaranteed to the company at least 6 per cent. dividends. It gave them at one time a subsidy of £400,000, or about $2,000,000, and then provided that in case the earnings of the company were not sufficient to make a dividend of 6 per cent. on the stock of the company the subsidy should be increased to a sum sufficient to do that, provided, however, that in no case should the subsidy exceed £500,000. That contract provided also—and I will not take the time of the Senate now to read it—that in case the earnings of the company exceeded 8 per cent. then the Government should receive one-fourth of all the excess above 8 per cent.

It made similar contracts with the Royal Mail Steamship line to the West Indies and Brazil and to the eastern coast of South America. It made a similar contract with a company running to the western coast of South America by way of the Isthmus. It can not be said that at any time there has been anything like free or open competition permitted upon the part of the British Government. On the other hand, the British Government put this matter of mail subsidies for the assistance of their merchant marine into the hands of their board of admiralty. It left them free to do almost anything that they found necessary or saw fit to do at the time, and whatever reports they have made to Parliament have always, so far as I know, been confirmed.

Now let us look at one of these contracts which the Senator tells us have been open to the bidding of the world and have always been let to the lowest bidder. I read from the report of the postmaster-general of Great Britain of 1878, the official document:

The arrangements for the conveyance of mails from this country to the United States have been again the subject of negotiation.

Not of letting or contract.

Toward the end of last year the owners of the three principal lines of steam-vessels engaged in the transatlantic trade represented to the post-office that, owing to diminished receipts from other sources, they could no longer consent to carry mails for the amount of sea-postage which had been paid to them for the service during the previous eleven months, the sum thus received not constituting in their opinion a fair contribution toward their working expenses, including those incurred through the ships having to wait for the mails at Queenstown, often for many hours. Finding that it would be impossible to maintain a really efficient mail service without their co-operation, I eventually arranged—with the Cunard, Inman, and White Star companies to increase the rate of payment from 2*s.* 4*d.* to 4*s.* a pound for letters, and from 2*d.* to 4*d.* a pound for printed papers and patterns.

An increase of almost 100 per cent. made by the Postmaster-General upon a negotiation with the Cunard, White Star, and Inman lines, without any letting, without any bidding, without any competition of any kind whatever, and for what purpose? Simply because these companies had found that for that year the general business of freight and passengers had run down and they were not able to make their expenses. The board of admiralty, represented by the postmaster-general, with the treasury of England back of them, came to the assistance of these companies in 1878 and increased their mail-pay upon printed matter 100 per cent. and upon letters almost 100 per cent. That, we are told, is the free-bidding and contract system of England. The fact is that the English Government has stood behind her steamships as a guarantor for the past fifty years, and whenever a line has met with disaster, whenever its business has fallen off, the British treasury has been opened and more money has been poured into the treasury of the company in order that it might continue its business and compete with other lines. He goes on to say further:

The contract with the Pacific Steam Navigation Company for the conveyance of mails from this country to the west coast of South America has been renewed from the 1st of July, 1878, on greatly reduced terms; and in anticipation that Chili and perhaps some of the other states of South America will shortly apply for admission into the General Postal Union, I have agreed with the Pacific Company for the conveyance of the outward mails only, leaving the countries on the other side to provide for the conveyance of their mails to England.

Is there anything of free competition and letting all the nations of the world into this business? Not at all. Let us look a little further at the report of the British postmaster-general in regard to these contracts and see how free they are. Here is the report for the next year, 1879. It says:

The contract of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company for the conveyance of West India mails being about to terminate on the 31st December next, I have entered into a new contract with the company for another term of years, the services to be performed being similar to those under the present contract, but with an increase of speed (from eleven to eleven and one-half knots an hour) on the main line between this country and St. Thomas, and between this country and Barbados. The subsidy is to be £30,000 a year, or £6,759 less than before.

I have also entered into a new contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company for the conveyance of mails to India and China for a further period of eight years from the 1st February, 1880—at the reduced subsidy of £370,000 a year, being £60,000 less than the sum now paid.

That contract is still running, having four years to run—

So much for the free letting of contracts by the English Government. Here is also the report of 1880, in which the British postmaster-general says in regard to the contracts for the foreign mails:

The new contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company for conveyance of India and China mails, which was announced in the last report, came into operation on the 1st of February, 1880. It provides for services at increased rates of speed between Brindisi and Alexandria, Suez and Bombay, and Suez and Shanghai; and the whole of the mails for these lines being now forwarded via Brindisi, the subsidiary line of packets between Southampton and Suez has been withdrawn.

At one time the board of admiralty opened some bids for the foreign mails to general competition. The results were not satisfactory. They were not satisfactory to the English people nor to the English Parliament, and it was at once abandoned, and it has never been, up to the present time, reopened, and to-day there is no such thing as free competition in the foreign mail service of Great Britain. Let me read a little from the debates of Parliament by Mr. Crawford in regard to the proposed opening of some of the mail lettings to open competition with the whole world. First, in regard to benefits arising from postal communication, Mr. Crawford says:

Whenever postal communication had been extended the commerce has invariably been attracted; in fact, the conveyance of the mails has proved a most efficient agency for increasing our trade in all parts of the world.

I for one hold that there are considerations to be taken into account in this matter which are wholly apart from the question of the profit and loss arising upon the accounts of the post-office. The difference is not considerable; but, whatever it is, that difference represents the whole cost to this country of the means by which not only the commercial but the social and political connection between this country and the world is kept up.

Further on he says:

Now, what I desire to do on this occasion is to protest in the name of the interest of the country and of commerce, and in justice to our companies, against the ships of the Messageries Imperiales—or of any other foreign company being employed in the conveyance of our mails. You may carry the principle of economy too far; such a course of proceeding would be free trade gone mad.

These remarks by Mr. Crawford were received with loud cheers in the House of Commons. In short, the attempt to open their service to the French and other lines for open competition was denounced in Parliament and was abandoned. Further on Mr. Crawford said:

I am convinced that the subject has not been sufficiently considered, for what would be the position of this country in the event of a war or any interruption of existing relations taking place? Supposing the Messageries Imperiales, or any other foreign company, be awarded the contract for our mail service, what would be the position of our commerce in the event of our being unfortunately engaged in hostilities with the country with whose people the contract has been entered into, or even in the event of that country being at war with some other? [" Hear!" " Hear!"]

I am of opinion that there is a question of grave national policy involved in our maintaining these great lines; and the French seeing this, it has been a part of their policy for years past to construct a commercial marine of their own, propelled by steam, which shall enable them to compete with the large companies of this country.

The French have seen what the Peninsular and Oriental Company's ships did in the Crimean war. They then carried upward of 60,000 men from this country, 2,000 officers, and between 11,000 and 12,000 horses. We know, also, what the Peninsular and Oriental Company did at the time of the Indian mutiny. Where should we have been if its vessels had not been in existence then to take our troops and military stores? [" Hear!" " Hear!"] We know, too, what was done by another company in the "Trent" affair. We know how 10,000 men were sent out to Canada by the Cunard line of steamers and other vessels at almost a day's notice.

And many of the Senators here will not forget that the service then rendered to Great Britain by the Cunard line was partly due to the mail-pay which this Government had been paying to that line after it gave up the Collins line. We had been building up that great company with its great fleet of ships, and when we were in trouble, then this company, which had been benefited by our bounty, of course came to the assistance of the home government, as it had a right to do, and, as Mr. Crawford says, almost upon a day's notice, they shipped 10,000 men to Canada by that line.

Mr. President, I have here in this report memoranda of nearly all the contracts entered into by the Kingdom of Great Britain for the carrying of its foreign mails. In almost every instance, and I think in every instance, at all events in all I have examined, there is this clause:

The admiralty shall have power to purchase or charter any or all of the vessels in case of war.

That is put into all their contracts. Could that clause be put into a contract with a foreign company if we were to open our mail-lettings to foreign steamships? Not at all, and I am surprised that the Senator from Missouri should have made the assertion that he desired that our mail-lettings, if we were to have them, should be open to the whole world, as he says the lettings of Great Britain are.

Mr. VEST. What I said was this: while I favored an increase of ocean mail-pay, I wanted the American citizen to be permitted to buy the best ships to carry the mail where he pleased. I want the Senator to point me any clause in any contract ever made by the British Government in which they required that the mails should be carried under those contracts in an English-built ship. I want him to point me to that clause, if he can find a single one, in which a British subject is compelled to take an English-built ship in order to carry the mails. That is what you propose to do now in our country.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Of course I shall not be able to point out any such clause as that, because her laws are different. Great Britain allows her subjects to import ships from wherever they please; but her contracts are made with British subjects and not with all the world, as the Senator from Missouri in his broad language has stated, and I think he must admit that he was mistaken so far as that is concerned.

Mr. VEST. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I assert the fact to be beyond any question that England did give a contract to carry her mails to a German company, and that she has now contracts with other than English subjects. There is no law of Great Britain which prohibits it. What the admiralty has done is another question. I speak of her general legislation.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. It matters not what the law is; this matter, as I have stated, is turned over almost absolutely to the board of admiralty; they make their contracts with their home companies. They have at times, and I believe do now, allow the Hamburg line, which stops at Plymouth, to take the English mails; they allow that company sea-postage, the same as we do from New York, but so far as I know they have no regular contract with them beyond that. There may be throughout the broad dominions of Great Britain, surrounding the whole world, some place in the Orient where they allow their mails to be carried under some other flag than their own; but if so I know not where it is. At all events their great service, which is performed by the Cunard, the Inman, and the White Star lines between the United States and Liverpool, by the Peninsular and Oriental line, which carries the mails to the entire eastern half of the world, and their Royal Mail line, which carries the mails to the West Indies and South America, are all powerful British corporations which have been in existence most of them for fifty years, and have carried the English mails continuously from the time of their organization down to the present time, and Great Britain has paid these various lines of which I have spoken, and a few others, since the beginning of steam navigation, for carrying the mails and for guaranteeing dividends upon their stock, in round numbers, $250,000,000; and we are asked now to put our marine in open competition with this marine which has been built up by fifty years of continuous, far-sighted, watchful care of the British Government and the British admiralty. Mr. President, you might as well take the lambs from a flock and put them in with ravening wolves as to think for a moment that the steam merchant marine of the United States can to-day successfully compete for the carrying trade of the world if it is to have no bounty from the Government, if it is to have no proper and sufficient pay for carrying the mails. It can not be done.

I want to call the attention of the Senate a little further to some matters pertaining to these free and open contracts of which the Senator talks so much, and by which he says there is no prohibition that the mails shall not be carried in foreign ships, which is not denied. At one time the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company came into trouble on account of great loss of property in ships by reason of hurricanes. What did they do? They applied to the board of admiralty at once for a continuation of the contract, just what Cunard and the White Star and the Inman line did, as I have shown, in 1878, when they found their usual business falling off; they applied to the postmaster-general for an increase in the pay for carrying the mails, and the postmaster-general increased their pay just about 100 per cent. Let me read a letter from the secretary of that company to the British Government in 1867:

ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY, 55 MOORGATE STREET,
London, E. C., 20 November, 1867.

SIR: Her Majesty's Government have, without doubt, become aware of the serious disaster and consequent heavy loss which has befallen this company through the results of the recent hurricane at and near St. Thomas.

Full particulars of this event have not yet reached the directors of this company, but they know that four ships, which originally cost £181,926, have been wrecked, and that two others have been dismasted, and a large amount of stores, buildings, and other property in the harbor and on shore destroyed.

To replace properly these vessels and property an expenditure of not much less than £250,000 will be requisite.

The court of directors have had under their most anxious consideration the course which, under these circumstances, they ought, both in the interest of the public service and of their proprietary, to take; and it will be manifest to Her Majesty's Government that with contracts only having two (and to a smaller extent, three) years to run it would be unwise in the court to incur a large capital expenditure, especially in the way of construction of new ships. Such new vessels could not be placed on the station for at least a year to come, and thus might only be employed for a little more than twelve months.

The only course, therefore, available for the directors, in view of the termination of the present contract, would be the expensive and unsatisfactory one of chartering vessels for the service.

Under these circumstances, and feeling that the severe blow which has fallen on a company distinguished for the punctuality of its service, and its readiness to meet the wishes of Her Majesty's Government at all times, will give it a valid claim for consideration, the court of directors have resolved to ask Her Majesty's Government to grant the company a five years' extension of its present contract, i. e., to the end of 1872 certain, and thenceforward to be at two years' notice. For a portion of the service this would be only four years' extension, but the directors conceive that it would be more convenient to the government and to the company that the contracts for the whole service should become terminable simultaneously.

He continues giving statistics in regard to the line, &c. This is signed by J. M. Lloyd, secretary of the company. This went to the British Government, and here is a copy of the memorandum that was made:

Write to secretary of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company that, under the circumstances mentioned in his letter, and which they had already become acquainted with, my lords are disposed to entertain the proposition of the directors. They are, however, of opinion that it may be a question whether an extension of the term of contract should not be accompanied with a reduction of the subsidy, and in this view they have instructed the postmaster-general to cause an examination of the company's books, to be immediately undertaken in accordance with the concluding paragraph of her majesty's letter.

My lords reserve for further consideration whether any other conditions should be imposed upon the company when the contract is renewed.

In accordance with that direction from the treasury, a Mr. Scudamore was appointed as an expert to examine the company's books and to report. The proceeding was simply this: The Royal Steam Packet Company had met with immense losses by hurricanes; had four vessels shipwrecked and much of its property destroyed. It at once goes to the board of admiralty and asks that it may have its contract, which is about to expire, extended for five years on the present terms in order to have encouragement to replace the property and go on. It is met more than half way by the government. The treasury department at once says it is inclined to entertain the proposition. It appoints an expert to go and examine the company's books to see how much money they have made in the past, and how much they have lost, and see what the necessities are, and, in short, report whether it will be necessary for the government to continue the subsidy in order that the line may go on. This expert makes a full report of the condition of the company, which I have here before me, but I will not detain the Senate to read the whole of it, because most of it is dry details in regard to the expenses of running and maintaining the line; but let me call your attention to its conclusions. It appears that this expert had already before this made a similar examination of the Peninsular and Oriental Company when they had made an application to the government for a continuance of their subsidy, and therefore he was very competent to make the examination. He says:

I have examined the accounts of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, and beg to submit the following observations:

1. The circumstances and position of the company resemble in many striking particulars those of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, and afford a strong confirmation of the opinion which I expressed in my report on the affairs of that company.

In the first place the ratio of each principal item of expenditure to the total expenditure is, in the case of both companies, so nearly the same as to warrant the belief that both are conducted upon sound and well-recognized principles, and that the reverses which both have sustained are due to external causes only.

2. In the second place, the external causes of misfortune have been the same in both cases.

Further on he says:

3. With both companies a subsidy is absolutely necessary to the maintenance of the service required from them.

I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to that language. He tells us that nothing like a subsidy has ever been given to an English mail steamship for the purpose of maintaining the service, but only proper compensation for carrying the mails.

In my report upon the accounts of the Peninsular and Oriental Company I showed that the revenue, exclusive of subsidy, which the company expected to earn in the performance of the services required from them would cover only 85 per cent. of the expenditure proper to those services.

That is outside of the mail pay. The Peninsular and Oriental Company had made only 85 per cent. of its running expenses. The government had guaranteed 6 per cent. dividend on all its stock and made it up by a subsidy.

The actual revenue, exclusive of subsidy, of the Royal Mail Company in the year 1864, the period of their greatest prosperity, amounted to 90 per cent. of their expenditure, but in the following year it fell to 85 per cent., and in the next to 79 per cent., whilst in the present year it will be barely 70 per cent. of their expenditure.

Here was a great line of steamers running from Great Britain to the Orient which was earning only 70 per cent. of its expenses, and the British Government stepped in and put its hand into its treasury to pay the difference and to pay a dividend of 6 per cent. on the stock of the company. That is the way Great Britain has maintained and encouraged and built up her merchant marine.

It is clear then that in the case of the Royal Mail Company, as in that of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, the ordinary revenue of the company has in no case sufficed to meet and is now very much below the expenses of the services which they have to perform.

4. Having offered these general observations upon the points of resemblance in the circumstances of the two companies, I come now to examine more closely the condition of the Royal Mail Company.

Then he goes into a detail of the accounts of the ships and expenses, costs, &c., and the partial final summing up is this:

7. As the directors have asked for an extension of their contracts, it must be presumed that they have reasonable grounds for expecting such a revival of trade as will enable them once more to earn a dividend; but it is at the same time clear, I think, that they would not agree, and would not be justified in agreeing to any immediate reduction of the subsidies being made a condition of the desired extension.

In the present year they have just made both ends meet, and if their subsidies be reduced their income will not at present cover their expenditure. While, however, I am of opinion that their affairs will not admit of any immediate reduction in the amount of their subsidies, I think that if their contracts were extended they might fairly be required, in the event of their profits, during the extended term of contract being raised, by revival of trade or other causes, above a stipulated amount to share the excess with the government.

In short, he recommends the continuance or extension of the contract for five years on the old terms, simply saying that in case it should be found that they are making exorbitant profits above 6 or 8 per cent., then they might be compelled to divide the difference with the government. In short, from the beginning to the end the English Government has been a partner in all her great foreign steamship lines carrying her mails, a silent partner, but one with unlimited funds, and which has ever stood ready to back up all the enterprises, to pay all the losses, and to give fair profits on the capital invested. This course has been followed systematically and thoroughly for the past fifty years, and it is I believe chiefly to this that England owes her great superiority on the ocean. It is to this I believe that she owes the greater part of her foreign trade, for wherever her steamships have gone with her mails, there they have carried the British merchant; and British manufactures built up British trade, until England has monopolized the larger part of the trade of the world. This is the way in which it has been done. I might go on almost without limit reciting and reading to the Senate contracts of this kind showing that instead of the British Government being a hard master and letting her contracts to the lowest bidder she has always stood ready to listen to the complaints of the companies, has appointed experts to examine their books to discover whether they were correct in their demands upon the government, and whenever it has been shown that they needed an increased subsidy, whenever it has been shown that they needed the helping hand of the government, that hand has been reached out and has sustained them.

If we had followed this course, if the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives instead of striking down the subsidy to the Collins line, as they did, had continued that and had done one-tenth part of what the British Government has done in this direction, to-day the American merchant marine and particularly its steamship service would not be in the deplorable condition in which it is. But whenever the question has been raised here it has been met with denunciation, it has been decried as "subsidy," and the press of the country has opposed it. Thus it has gone on from year to year and nothing has been done.

We come now with a bill which proposes that fair compensation, limited compensation, shall be paid for the carrying of the mails in American steamships. It provides that they shall be carried by the lowest bidder at a price not to exceed $1 per mile. This is much less, as I could show, than has been paid by the British Government to her principal lines, and it is not even sufficient to carry on this service unless it shall be found that American lines can be established which will receive pay also from the countries to which they carry the mails; and doubtless this can be done. A few years ago it will be remembered that an American line was started to Brazil. It was started with a subsidy from the Brazilian Government of $100,000 per annum. It was the outgrowth of the visit of the Emperor of Brazil to this country in 1876 to the Centennial Exposition. The Brazilian Government, believing that the United States Government would meet them half way and would also vote proper mail pay to any line which might be established from this country to Brazil, passed an act giving a subsidy of $100,000. The line was started, but nothing was ever given by the Government of the United States; and finally the Brazilian Government, disgusted with the treatment which it had received from us, withdrew its subsidy and the line failed and stopped. We all know the result of that. If that line could have been continued, or if another line could now be started to Brazil and to the Central and South American ports, there can be but little doubt what the result would be on the commerce of the United States. A careful examination of the British reports will show that wherever Great Britain has established and maintained prompt mail communication by her steamship lines there, almost invariably the balance of trade has been in favor of England, and she has sold more to that country than she has taken from it, and in that way she has been more than recompensed for all that she has paid for her mail service. On the contrary, if you will take a look at the reports of our Government you will find that to those countries where there is no direct mail communication or where the mail communication is only through English channels or through foreign countries, there the balance of trade is greatly against us and we are the losers by it.

Let us look at the trade between the United States and the South American states. From Brazil we imported two years ago to the value of $44,488,459. We exported to Brazil the paltry sum of $9,159,330. From British Guiana we imported $5,946,429; to British Guiana we exported only $1,973,422, and so on through the various countries, Peru, Uruguay, Chili, Venezuela, &c. The total stands thus: Our imports from all the South American countries were $76,736,983. Our exports to the same countries were only $28,927,097. Look at the returns of the commerce of Great Britain with those same countries; the grand totals are as follows: Great Britain imported from the aforenamed countries of South America $92,664,494, and exported to them $93,761,865, thus paying for all her imports in her own manufactured goods.

Mr. President, there can be no doubt but that if we had direct mail communication to-day with Central America and with all the South American states this balance of trade against us of about fifty millions would be entirely wiped out, that this difference would be paid for in products of our own labor and in the products of our farms. The South American countries are large importers of wheat, of provisions, and of manufactured goods, particularly of cotton goods of the common grades. How is the trade now done with South America? Almost entirely through British channels. If the American minister desires to go to Brazil to-day he will take steamer to Liverpool and from Liverpool to Brazil. If you desire to send a letter you send it the same way. The commerce is carried on through British ships that sail from Liverpool to Brazil loaded with British manufactures. They are there disposed of, the ship loaded with coffee, or with sugar, or with other tropical products, and the steamer comes to New York, there disposes of its cargo, takes on a cargo of grain, wheat, or flour, or corn, and carries it to Liverpool, thus making it a triangular transaction, but England constantly holding in her own hands the trade of all those South American markets.

I could read to you from this same report in regard to this contract with the Royal Mail Packet Company in this examination which was made, from which I have quoted so largely, the expert reported to the board of admiralty that the company should not be allowed to make its voyages to South America via New York.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am somewhat confused in my own mind with respect to the Senator's argument. I suppose he has made it plain; yet at the same time I fail to discover the force and effect of it. May I ask him, do the British Government subsidize any British ships between the ports of the United States and South America? I speak of vessels sailing exclusively between the ports of the United States and the ports of South America. If they do not subsidize them, why can not American ships enter into competition with British ships successfully between the United States ports and the South American ports?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I can not speak of all the ships that sail out of England, because their numbers are too great; but I was speaking of the case of the Royal Mail Packet Company, which runs from Liverpool to many of the South American ports, particularly to the ports of Brazil. They receive a large pay for carrying the mails from Liverpool to Brazil, and the line is not directly between the United States and Brazil at all. If the gentleman wanted to go to Brazil and was in a hurry, he would sail at once to Liverpool and go from there by the Royal Mail Packet Company.

Mr. McPHERSON. But the fact remains the same, I submit, that there are lines running between the port of New York and South America; for instance, the Atlas line commenced with two steamers and have increased their tonnage to thirteen steamers, most of which have been paid for out of the profits of the line itself. My authority for this statement is the president of the Atlas line, Mr. Forward, once mayor of the city of Liverpool. One of the principal owners is Mr. Forward. I suppose the Senator from New York wishes to do something to revive American commerce, and I take by way of illustration a steamship line sailing under the British flag from the ports of the United States directly to South America, and ask the Senator why can not an American line compete between our own ports and South America with the British line?

One word more, if the Senator please, and I will not interrupt him further. The bill which has been reported from the committee, if I understand correctly the Senator from Maine who has charge of it, is to strike off the shackles and place us on exact equality with other nations in respect to tonnage and in respect to all other matters. Then why can not an American line compete with a British line?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. If the Senator had listened to the arguments of the Senator from Missouri on the other side of this question he would have had a complete and perfect answer to that question, because that answer was given in the correspondence which he read from Mr. Griscom, who described the condition of affairs in running the Red Star line from New York to Antwerp under the flag of Belgium and running the line from Philadelphia to Liverpool under the American flag. The difference against the American ships in the four run from Philadelphia amounted to $60,000 a year, or $15,000 on each ship, for wages alone. That was the difference between the wages paid to American seamen under the American flag and the wages paid under the British flag or under any foreign flag. Of course what is true in the case of the Red Star line from New York to Antwerp and what is true of the line from Philadelphia to Liverpool would be equally true of a British line running from New York to Brazil under the English flag. Her pay and her expenses would be proportionately less than those of a line under the American flag.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield a moment longer in that connection?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. I understand the argument of the Senator from Missouri, as also the argument which the Senator from New York now advances, replying as he does to the Senator from Missouri, but we are met by the bill reported from the committee, which both the Senator from New York and myself indorse and support, which provides for doing away with that difference. There is no invidious distinction, there can be none, under the bill reported by the Senator from Maine. What, then, remains to be done?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I will endeavor, as far as possible, to answer the question of the Senator. He says that the bill proposes to do away with this difference in wages. There is an amendment to be offered to this bill coming from the Senator who has it in charge which proposes to change our law, which now requires that all seamen upon American ships shall be discharged when the ship arrives at its home port, when the voyage is terminated that then the seaman shall be discharged and a new crew shipped. It is now proposed to change the law so that a contract may be made for the round trip, or for any definite period of time, the same as in the English service; but I think the Senator will find that you can not get men to ship under the American flag, American seamen, and receive anything less than American wages.

Let us suppose a case. Let us suppose that there is an American steamship sailing regularly from New York to Liverpool under the American flag. When she starts out upon her first trip she goes with American officers and with a crew which has been shipped in New York at the regular going wages in New York, which are substantially the same as those paid in the coastwise trade and which are about 60 per cent. higher than the wages paid in Liverpool or in any port in Europe. When the vessel has reached Liverpool we will suppose that a portion of her crew are disabled, that the master finds it necessary to take in some men. He takes in a few new men, English sailors, Norwegians, or whatever they may be, at the going price in Liverpool, which is 60 per cent. lower than he is paying the rest of his crew. Does anybody believe that when that crew has returned to New York those men working side by side, one receiving 60 per cent. less than the other, will be satisfied? Does any one believe that it will be possible to continue them in service for any length of time? Does he not believe that in nine cases out of ten, when they have arrived at New York they will desert and attempt to ship in other ships where they can get full American wages? There is no question about it; and while in a few cases a ship might take advantage of low wages in Europe, yet it nine cases out of ten, in my judgment, it will do no good whatever. The fact is that the American flag the world over means higher wages to the American laboring man. It is for these higher wages that half a million of the laboring men of Europe came upon our soil last year. They came because they knew they would receive higher wages than they were receiving at home. Whenever a foreigner sets his foot upon our shores he expects to receive the benefits which come from our system of government. You may go to Castle Garden, where all the immigrants are landed, and you will find hundreds of men, farm laborers, who never in all their lives received more than £5 per year for their service, and I will venture to say that every one of them in less than thirty days will be working on American farms for £5 per month. I know farmers who have gone to Castle Garden expecting to get cheap farm laborers; they have paid their fare from New York into the central part of the State and have put them upon their farms, and in less than thirty days they have repudiated their contracts and demanded the going wages of the farmers about them. These they have always received and always will receive; it can not be prevented.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator from New York now permit me to suppose a case, he having supposed one, and he having supposed almost an impossible one?

Suppose the American ship-owner discharges all the American crew when he reaches the port of Liverpool, and hires for a month or a year, or a term of years, as is not an uncommon thing for English ships to do. I have the authority of an officer of the White Star Steamship line for saying that, on one of its ships on which I made a passage, every member of the crew almost had been there for eighteen months. Now he hires that crew, a British crew, if you please, a German crew, a Scotch crew, an Irish crew; he hires them at the prevailing wages paid there. If the American ship-owner is to be handicapped by $20 a month extra because he deems it necessary, or expedient even, to employ an American crew, he might just as well quit the ocean carrying. He is confronted by competition upon the ocean, and he must meet the competition on equal terms and not on unequal terms.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President, that is all we ask—equal terms. It is not possible to get that from the American Congress.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from New Jersey asked a question which I should like to answer.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to have it answered.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I yield.

Mr. FRYE. About six years ago there was a line started between the United States and Rio de Janeiro, an exceedingly important communication, absolutely necessary for our manufacturers to send any goods to Rio de Janeiro. Dom Pedro proposed to pay that line $100,000 a year for carrying his mails direct from Rio de Janeiro to New York. The United States paid that line for carrying the mail from New York to Rio de Janeiro about $4,000, which would make in all $104,000 a year. The United States would pay no more. The result was that Dom Pedro withdrew his $100,000 a year, and all that that line of ships received for carrying the mail was $4,000. The Royal Steamship line to Brazil received $1,500,000 a year for carrying the English mail to Brazil, and the Brazilian Government paid about $800,000 more to the same vessels, making over $2,000,000 paid for carrying the mails.

I have in my desk, sent to me by the Senator from California only a few days ago, a statement as to the line touching at New Zealand from California. We pay that line, I think, about $2,000 a year, or perhaps only $1,000 a year, for carrying the mail, while New Zealand pays that line some $75,000 for carrying their mail. New Zealand has just notified that line that it will no longer pay that $75,000 if the United States pays but $1,000. There is no sense in it, and they have notified the line that they will take off the pay. Under this bill you establish a line between here and Rio de Janeiro, and pay that line only a fair price, not $1,500,000 a year, nothing of that kind, no subsidy of any kind, only what any fair man would say was a fair and reasonable price, just exactly what you pay your coastwise steamers, and your stages, and your railroads, so much a mile. Brazil will meet you half way and pay an equal amount, and you will be able to sustain a line between New York and Rio de Janeiro. Without a fair and decent pay you can not sustain it. That is my answer to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator from Maine has reported to the Senate a bill in which he proposes to give adequate compensation for the transportation of the mail. I do not approve of the act of a great Government which meets an American ship, takes the ship-owner by the throat, and says to him, "You can not leave the American dock until you put the American mails on board," and then robs him of the compensation to which he is entitled for carrying them. I approve of no such policy. No great government can afford to make its citizens work for less than adequate compensation. Is 3 cents per mile adequate compensation, as was paid to the American Steamship Company for carrying the mails across the ocean? Is 7 cents a mile adequate compensation to the Pacific Mail line for carrying the United States mail? No, sir; by no means. As the Senator from Maine very justly stated in his speech the other day, the Government of the United States had made a million dollars and covered it into the Treasury out of the profits of the robbery they perpetrated upon their own citizens. I have no sympathy with any such course as that. I will support the bill that the Senator from Maine has reported, gladly and enthusiastically; but I go further.

Mr. FRYE. I beg pardon of the Senator from New York for having interrupted him.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Just how far the section in the bill which permits the shipmaster to make a contract with the sailors for any length of time they may choose will go to relieving the difficulties which have been discussed remains to be seen. In my judgment it will do but very little, and if it is to bring about a condition of affairs which the Senator from New Jersey indicates that it may bring about, that is to say, that all steamships sailing under the American flag to foreign ports will be manned entirely by foreigners and not by American citizens, I have no sympathy with it; for one of the chief aims, as I understand it, of the Government giving this money to increase our mercantile marine, to aid it and to build it up, is to give to us a class of seamen and officers who will be prepared in case of war or in any emergency to be taken into the naval service of the United States. If the proposed amendment of the law is to lead only to the employment of foreigners upon all our ships, then for one I shall hope that the amendment may fail.

I do not believe it possible that you can sail an American ship under an American flag without paying American wages. If the American ship, in the case supposed by the Senator from New Jersey, should sail into Liverpool and there discharge its entire crew of American sailors and reship a crew entirely of English sailors at English wages, I do not believe that it would be possible for that ship to hold its sailors when they returned to New York. I believe that within a short period and within a very few trips they would all desert, and that the ship would be compelled to come back to shipping its crews in New York and to paying the New York or American wages. That is my belief; but nevertheless as the bill proposes so far as it can to relieve us from that situation, and to leave the shipmasters free to make their contracts for any time that they may see fit, I am willing that the experiment should be made. I hope that it will not result in the condition of affairs described by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment, not for a speech, but only to make a suggestion?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am afraid the matter is not fully understood. I was informed by Mr. Forward, ex-mayor of the city of Liverpool, the president of the Atlas line, whose ships sail to the different ports of South America, that he paid his crews all alike. I asked him if he paid more than was paid in England for the like service. He said: "Yes; slightly more, because of the unhealthiness of the ports to which they run as compared with the general business of English shipping." He found no difficulty in shipping his men; they were Americans and they were of all nationalities, and he paid them but very little more than was paid by the shipmasters in England for the same service.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I have no information in regard to that, and I submit to the Senator himself that speaking upon the matter of the wages of seamen in the different lines we should be very accurate and we should have the exaet figures. The figures have been given by the Senator from Missouri in regard to the Red Star line to Antwerp and in regard to the British line owned by Americans running from Philadelphia, and in both cases the figures show that the wages paid under the American flag are about 60 per cent. more than the wages paid under the foreign flag. I can not suppose that the Atlas Company or any other company of English shippers would run a line from New York to Brazil and pay full American wages. I have no doubt that their wages are substantially the same as the wages paid in Liverpool or Rio de Janeiro or any other foreign port.

From my conversation with Mr. Griscom, whose letters I have read here, I have this memorandum: The Belgian line, which is owned by Americans, which has a charter in Belgium, receives a subsidy from the Belgian Government of $100,000 per annum and freedom from all port and light-house charges, which amount to $25,000 more. This American line, sailing under the Belgian flag, receives a bonus of $125,000 from Belgium. The wages paid upon an American ship for the ordinary seaman is $35 per month. Upon the Belgian line for the same grade of seamen the wages are $20 per month. This amounted upon the four American ships to $60,000 per annum, or $15,000 upon each ship. The wages were greater than they were upon the four English ships. That, it will be seen, is equivalent to 3 per cent. upon the entire cost of the four ships, which was $2,000,000. The difference in wages under the American flag upon this line of which we have heard so much is just 3 per cent. upon the entire cost of the line. It will be seen that it would be impossible in a close business, as the shipping business now is, that any man should live under such disadvantages.

What is the remedy? One of the remedies is that suggested, of which we have just spoken, in which the terms of contract by the seamen are to be at will and for any length of time. But I claim that the principal item and the only item of any value which will lead to the building up of our merchant marine is that clause which provides for proper compensation for the carrying of the mails. I believe that if the bill is passed with that clause in it in twelve months we will have at least half a dozen new steamship lines running to the various ports in South America, in the West Indies, and in Central America. They will go there to bring back sugar and coffee and dye-woods and other raw materials which are found in the tropical countries, and of necessity the owners of those lines will seek to carry freight back. They will attempt to make a sale in those countries of our own products. They will attempt to introduce our manufactured goods. They will be compelled to do this, for no line of steamers running to South America and having no return freight to South America from this country could live even with a large subsidy from the Government. The result will be that instead of a balance of trade being against us of more than $50,000,000 in South America, in less than two years it will be all wiped out, and we will be paying for our coffee and sugar with our flour, our wheat, our bacon, and the other products of our farms.

It is this trade that we want. It is this trade which I believe the bill will give us, and I trust that the Senators upon the other side will be willing to take the bill as it is, leaving out the contested proposition of free ships, knowing that it will be impossible for us to agree concerning it. The bill has been made without touching that question at all. It relieves American ships from many of the burdens which now come upon it. It relieves us of nearly all the fees of American consuls in foreign ports, which is no small item. It relieves the shipmasters principally from the expense of what are called extra wages in case of dismissal or discharge in a foreign port; it relieves them from the hospital tax, and it reduces many of the burdens which are now placed upon them. In the judgment of the best shipmasters and merchants in this country if the bill can pass it will within ten years more than double the present foreign commerce of our country under our own flag.

Certainly we can not expect any great increase unless something of this kind is done. The competition is very great. There are to-day a large number of iron steamships tied up upon the Clyde and at other points because there are no cargoes to carry. If our ships are to go out into the commerce of the world they must go with some backing from the Government. They must go with some promise of aid and some promise that it will be continuous. It must not be for a twelvemonth. These contracts, instead of being made for four years as provided in the bill, ought to be made for at least ten years, as the English Government has made its contracts for long periods of time. It is only in this way that capital can be induced to go into the business. Certainly American capital, which can be so profitably used in our railroad enterprises, in steamships upon our interior rivers, in manufacturing, in farming, and in cattle-raising, can not be induced to invest itself on the unstable seas unless there is more than a fair prospect of success, and without this aid I believe nothing whatever will be done.

Speaking of the competition which must necessarily come when our ships go into this foreign trade in competition with England, let me refer once more to the effort which was made to establish the American line to Brazil. When those ships were put on the freight on coffee to New York was $14 per ton. The ships had no sooner commenced running than the British lines in competition reduced the rate to $5 a ton, almost two-thirds. As soon as the line had failed and had been withdrawn the rates went back again. Our ship merchants know that this competition is great and severe, and unless we are willing to give some aid we can not expect that they will invest their money in it.

The Senator from Missouri, in closing his argument the other day, declared that our tariff system is one of the chief reasons for the failure of our mercantile marine. Let me read what he said:

> The great obstacle to the restoration of our shipping interest lies in the protective system, of which the navigation laws are a part. The high protection and exclusive tariff has stimulated production to an abnormal degree, and has put up the price of labor and also increased the cost of living. Our ships which go out upon the ocean to compete with those of other nations are handicapped by an excess in first cost, and by the fact that they are loaded when they go out, but have nothing to bring back.

I regret that the Senator is not now in his seat, for certainly this statement in regard to the amount of our foreign trade and the statement that the ships that go out loaded bring nothing back can not be borne out by the returns of the foreign commerce of this country. I make the broad statement, without fear of successful contradiction, that the foreign trade of this country, both exports and imports, has always been the greatest under a protective tariff. I say I make that broad statement without fear of successful contradiction. It may seem paradoxical; nevertheless the reports of the foreign commerce of this country for the past fifty years will bear me out in the assertion. Why has it been so? Because the protective-tariff system has made our people rich; it has made our farmers rich; it has enabled our farmers to grow large quantities of grain for exportation; it has enabled our people to be large consumers of foreign manufactured goods of the finer grades which we do not yet make. The result has been that under our protective system the foreign trade of the country has constantly and rapidly grown in volume. Except that there is a lull in business now, it has never been greater than for the past two or three years, and instead of there being any lack of tonnage, and instead of there being any lack of merchandise and of produce to go out, and any lack of return cargoes, the business of to-day is nearly ten times what it was when the American merchant marine was at its highest point. Let us look a little at the figures and see how near the Senator from Missouri is right or how far he is wrong. I have just read his language when he said:

> Our ships which go out upon the ocean to compete with those of other nations are handicapped by an excess in first cost, and by the fact that they are loaded when they go out, but have nothing to bring back.

In 1835 the exports from this country amounted to $100,459,481; our imports in that year were $136,764,295. In 1850 we had grown a little in our foreign trade, which was under substantially free trade or a tariff for revenue. In 1850 our exports were only $134,900,233; our imports that year were $173,509,526. In 1860 the country had grown, and our exports that year were $316,242,423; our imports were a little more, $353,616,119. During the first years of the war our foreign trade diminished, but in 1870 our exports were $376,616,473 and our imports were $435,958,408. In 1880 the grand total is as follows of our foreign trade: Exports, $823,946,353; and our imports had risen to the enormous sum of $667,954,746. This was under what our friend sees fit to call a high protective-tariff system, which had been then in existence for twenty years. The next year, 1881, our exports were a little larger, but only a little. The exports were $883,925,947, and our imports were a little less, $642,664,628.

Thus it will be seen that the growth in our exports and imports has been something phenomenal since the close of the war, and to-day, with the exception of the year 1881, the foreign trade of this country for the past year was much greater than ever before and was about eight times what it was in 1835. It will be seen from these figures that the tariff instead of reducing the amount of our foreign trade has vastly increased it. It has given us an immense surplus of wheat, of corn, and of various farm products for exportation. It has changed the face of the country. It has reduced farming to a science. It has introduced all the modern machinery of agriculture, and it now has rendered it possible for ten men to produce upon a farm more than a hundred men could have done twenty-five years ago. Thus it is that we are enabled to feed our own fifty or sixty million people and have this large surplus to export every year. It has brought money into our pockets, and it has made us able to consume more of the luxuries of Europe, more of its fine manufactures and of its art manufactures, than ever before, and to-day our foreign trade, both export and import, is fully ten times what it was when the American merchant marine was carrying 85 per cent. of our entire foreign commerce.

No; instead of the tariff having been the cause of our decline, it has, so far as it has affected it at all, been directly in the opposite direction. It has increased the foreign trade, and if the American Congress had maintained a continuous policy of protection to its foreign shipping trade, as the English Government has done, barring the losses which we made in the war, the merchant marine of America to-day would be in the proportion that it was before the war. But England has followed one continuous and unvarying course. From the beginning of steam navigation down to the present day she has never failed to protect and build up her steam shipping trade. She has done this knowing and realizing full well that wherever the royal mail steamship went there it carried the English merchant and the English goods and there it created commerce for England. By so doing it has helped to build up the workshops of England, it has enabled England to reach every foreign market direct through her own channels and through her own merchants.

Any one who will to-day travel in South America, in Central America, or in Mexico will at once see under how great disadvantages the American manufacturer labors if he should desire to introduce his goods into those countries. The entire importing and exporting trade of all those countries is in the hands of European merchants. The European lines come regularly to their ports, and if they desire foreign goods they can obtain them in less than half the time from England that they can from the United States. Under such circumstances it can not be expected that we shall have much if any trade with them. The result is that we are to-day necessarily buying all the raw products of South America and selling them almost nothing in return. There is but one way in my judgment by which this can be changed. That is to give to the American flag, to American merchant steamships, such compensation for carrying the mails as will enable them to go into competition with foreign steamship lines and maintain themselves; and wherever the American steamship shall go there it will carry the American merchant, there it will carry American goods, and there it will finally establish a great commerce for us.

It can not be expected, in my judgment, that this thing shall be done in a day. There must be a persistent and a determined effort, and there must be a settled policy by Congress upon which the merchants and business men of this country can rely. It is because we have to-day no policy, because there has been no promise given to the merchants or to our business men, that up to the present time we have done nothing in this great field.

Let us, then, legislate somewhat in the interest of the business men of this country. Let us do something by our votes here to build up this industry, if it be worth anything. I know that some of my friends on the other side (or at all events some of those who furnish the ideas for the free-trade agitation in this country) have told the country over and over again that it made no difference to this country who did its carrying, provided it was done by those who would do it the cheapest. That undoubtedly is the logical conclusion of free trade—undoubtedly that is correct if free trade is to rule—but I do not believe that even those who are termed free-traders here will be willing to accept that proposition and to stand upon that. Knowing that it is not in the interest and that it has never been the policy of this country to maintain a large navy or a large army, believing that it is for the best interest of the country and for the protection of the country that we should rely chiefly in times of trouble upon the militia for our Army and upon the American merchant marine for men for the Navy, it seems to me that it is wise at this time to expend some of our surplus revenue in giving encouragement to American shipping. Instead of looking about to see how we can reduce the revenue, instead of desiring to abolish the internal revenue or to cut down the tariff, would it not be well to do what England and what other countries have done, and give some encouragement to American shipping by adopting the clause in regard to carrying the mails? But I would be glad to go much further. I would be glad to go to the extent substantially of the French law, of paying a direct bounty to all American ships in proportion to the number of miles run per ton. I believe with Mr. Griscom and with Mr. Houston that that is necessary if you are rapidly to revive American shipping.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me just there to settle a question of fact between him and myself?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. I understood the Senator to say that the French law, which he now lauds so much, did not give a bounty to foreign mail ships. I believe I am correct in regard to the Senator's statement.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I think the Senator is not quite right as to my statement. I said that as I understood the law it gave first a large bounty for all ships to be built in France, and then it gave a bounty to all ships run under the French flag.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senator now if he is willing to adopt the French system and incorporate it in our statute. The French law which Mr. Griscom alludes to and which the Senator approves gives a bounty to all French-built ships. Then it gives half the same bounty to all foreign ships brought under the French flag.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Of course the Senator sees the difference in the situation. Before we can arrive at that we should have to repeal the navigation laws in regard to ships, and we are not now discussing that part of the question.

Mr. VEST. That is what I am trying to do; but I want to show that the French system which the Senator approves of does admit foreign-built vessels, and not only admits them but gives half the bounty to them that it gives to their own vessels. If the Senator will turn to page 226 of the report of the special committee of which both he and myself were members he will find a translation of the French act.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I have no doubt as to the correctness of the statement.

Mr. VEST. The French act says:

> For foreign-built vessels the bounty is reduced to one-half of the above assigned amount.

Mr. Griscom himself, in the letter which I read some two weeks since, in discussing this question of the merchant marine, concludes with his remedy in these words:

> 1. Adopt the French bounty system, or one approximating it.
> 2. Admit for five years foreign-built vessels for the foreign trade to American registry.

The only difference between Mr. Griscom and myself is that I want the ships admitted without limitation as to time, and he for five years.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The difference in the situation is this: France for twenty or more years has been going on under a free-ship law allowing ships of any nation to be registered under her flag. For more than twenty years she has been doing that; she has been subsidizing her steamship lines and she has found out that under that she was not making the advancement that she ought to make. Believing that it was necessary that she should be a ship-building country if she was to be a ship-sailing country, she passed the law of which so much has been said, which gives a large bounty for all ships built in France and then it gives another large bounty for the sailing of ships, and it gives, as the Senator has said, one-half the bounty for all the ships which are under her flag, no matter where they come from. As the greater part of the ships now under the French flag were purchased from England or elsewhere, of course it would not be just to exclude them (as they are now owned by Frenchmen) from coming in for the benefits of the act; but we are entirely in a different condition. We have no ships to-day flying the American flag except such as were built in America. I am desirous of following, as I said before, substantially the French system. That has been recommended to us by several commercial bodies, and I believe I can state that, so far as my memory now serves me, no important commercial body in the United States in making their recommendations to our committee of investigation or to the Committee on Commerce have ever recommended free ships as a remedy for the trouble.

The Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco recommended a drawback system, which is equivalent to a bounty for building; and some association in Philadelphia recommended substantially the French system, which has been recommended by Mr. Griscom, of which I have spoken; and so all over the country various commercial bodies, largely chambers of commerce, have presented their views. In nearly every case they have approved of all the items that are contained in this bill, and I believe I am correct in stating now that not a single one of them ever officially recommended the passage of a free-ship law.

Now I submit to the judgment of the Senate and to the judgment of the Senator from Missouri, with this state of facts, with all the great shipping merchants, all the great ship-owners of this country saying to us distinctly, over their own signatures, that "free ships" would be of no benefit and would not relieve us of the trouble, and the great commercial bodies of this country not advising it, is it wise that we shall at this time attempt to pass any such measure? And shall we not take the measures which we believe to be wise and which have been recommended by all these leading representative men of the country, shall we not enact them into law and see what can be done? As I was saying before the Senator from Missouri interrupted me, I believe it would be wise to take some of this large surplus of which we hear so much and use it as a fund to encourage and advance the American merchant marine. This measure which we have proposed in regard to mail-pay provides simply that we may expend in this service what we receive from the foreign mail service. It amounts in round numbers to about a million and a half. Instead of that we ought to be able to pay out in this way certainly as much as England is paying to-day after she has expended $250,000,000 in this service. Can we expect that our citizens can compete with her if we do not give them equal encouragement and equal aid? I think not.

Let me call the attention of the Senate for a moment to some of the other subsidies that are now paid by other governments to their merchant marine for carrying the mails. It is mail-pay; I call it a subsidy. I think the contracts which I have read made by the British Government with the Peninsular and Oriental and Royal Mail Steam Packet Companies, and with Cunard and others, prove that they are subsidies in the strict sense of the word, that they are given for the purpose of guaranteeing a dividend on the stock of the company and without much consideration as to the real service performed by the company. France to-day pays——

Mr. McPHERSON. Before the Senator proceeds to that branch of the question I should like to ask him does he consider that the $100,000 given by the Belgian Government to the so-called Belgian line is a subsidy?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. It is a subsidy in this sense: I suppose the company take whatever mails the Belgian Government see fit to put upon the line; but the amount of mails carried, I am informed, is very small comparatively. If the pay was made to correspond with our pay, that is the sea postage, the same as we pay to the Cunard line, and the Inman line, it would amount to a very small sum, nothing like a hundred thousand dollars, and probably not even $5,000.

Mr. McPHERSON. But it is $100,000 for carrying the Belgian mail.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. And as an inducement for the line to be under the Belgian flag.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Now, under the bill reported by the Senator from Maine, if I understand it aright, it will grant a very great increase by the United States Government over what the Belgian Government pays; in other words, say that it is 4,000 miles from New York to Antwerp—they will receive pay under this bill at the rate of $1 per mile, or $4.000 a trip. It will be remembered, however, that that is but one way. The United States mails go from the United States to Belgium. When they start from Belgium this way, it is the Belgium mail. Consider that they run a weekly line, that being the condition on which the $100,000 is paid now by the Belgian Government. Then we shall be paying the Belgian line $200,000. Is that a subsidy, or is it only a just and fair compensation for carrying the mails?

My point is this: Will the so-called American line, once so called, now the Belgian line, turn around and come under the American flag for $200,000 subsidy, as against the $100,000 Belgian subsidy?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Of course I can not answer that question; Mr. Griscom could answer it much better than I could. How many ships there are in the Red Star line I do not know; but if there are six or eight or ten the difference in wages would certainly use up the entire $200,000, and there would be no inducement to come under the American flag.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Suppose they do not pay the wages?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I hope the Senator does not believe that the wages of American seamen are controlled by the present law, or that they are going to be changed by it. It is impossible to do that. There is no sort of legislation which can be devised or brought in here which will materially affect the wages of American seamen. It may be possible, as the Senator has suggested, that we could get along entirely without American seamen, and that our ships could run under the American flag with foreign seamen; but it is not for that kind of a mercantile marine that I am laboring. I am not trying to help that kind of a mercantile marine which shall consist first of a ship built by English labor, from English iron and English cordage and English lumber, and then to be run by English sailors, and the only thing American about it to be the stars and stripes at the masthead. I do not care to have such a mercantile marine as that. If we can not build our own ships here out of American iron and American labor, and if we can not man them by sturdy, hearty American seamen, then we had better adopt the policy of the theoretical free-traders and say that it matters not who does our carrying trade so that it is done at the cheapest possible rate; and if that is all that is to come out of this bill—English ships and English sailors under the American flag—I care nothing about it; I want none of it.

But I was arguing that instead of simply cutting down our revenue we had better devote some of it to the building up of an American marine which would be in fact auxiliary to our Navy in case we should need it, and for that purpose I was going to call the attention of the Senate to what is now being paid by foreign governments for this kind of service for which we propose to pay under this section of the bill.

Recapitulation of nations that are to-day paying subsidies to shipping and the amounts paid thereto.

France	$6,477,000
Great Britain	3,750,000
Italy	3,228,000
Brazil	1,704,000
The Australasian colonies	1,500,000
Austria	1,030,000
Russia	1,650,000
Sweden and Norway	175,000
Mexico	806,000

The little Republic of Mexico, with scarcely a port upon her borders into which a ship can get, paid last year over $800,000 for carrying her foreign mails.

Canada	$200,000

And that reminds me of what I should have stated in connection with this attempted establishment of a line from New York to Brazil under the American flag. When the United States Government refused to give any subsidy and to meet Brazil half-way, agents of Canada went to Brazil and offered to that government that if they would extend the subsidy to a Canadian line the Canadian Government would meet it half-way, and the result was that when our line died a Canadian line took its place and is running to-day, and the Canadian Government pays it something over $100,000 as a subsidy for carrying the mails, and Brazil pays the same amount. Canada pays all told $200,000.

Germany	69,000
Spain	1,000,000
Belgium	250,000
Holland	363,000
Hungary	75,000
	22,867,000
The United States, to American ships (postage) a	43,000
Total, with United States postage	22,910,000

a The United States, to foreign ships, $230,000.

That is what we have to meet. Nearly $23,000,000 is paid out every year by the principal governments of the world for the maintenance of their steamship lines. Great Britain has continuously followed her system of subsidizing her steamship lines for the avowed purpose of maintaining British commerce, to make a market for British manufactures, and to bring back to Great Britain all the raw materials of the world in order that they may be manufactured in her workshops and give labor to her people.

This bill will give for this service about one million and a half dollars. Perhaps it is all that it is wise to attempt to do at the present time; but I am satisfied that if we are to expect any large development of our merchant marine it must be through much larger and more generous appropriations than this bill proposes.

I hope, Mr. President, that we shall be enabled to pass this bill substantially as it came from the committee, and that the question of "free ships" may be left in the condition where in the judgment of the best sailing-masters and best merchants of this country it should be left, where it is, save this, that as I have said before, I am entirely willing to meet the question of free ships on the ground of the tariff and to so far amend our navigation laws as to provide that any American can import any ship from abroad upon paying what may be considered to be a fair tariff upon it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If I had any ambition to enter into a discussion of this bill, I should have certainly done so prior to the time when the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] took the floor and practically exhausted the whole subject. Anything I could say would be a repetition of what they have already said better than I can.

I quite agree with the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] in this report. I think there is no provision in the bill he has reported, at least I have been able to find none, to which I can object, and for one I desire to thank that Senator. His committee deserves the thanks of the Senate and the thanks of the people of the whole country for the intelligent manner in which they have reported to the Senate a bill embodying so many reforms in the navigation laws as this bill does. But there is one distinguished member of the committee, the honorable Senator from Missouri, who wishes to go further, and his ideas have found expression in an amendment to this bill now before the Senate. I wish to say that I am in sympathy with the Senator's amendment, subject to certain restrictions which I now propose to offer; my convictions are that the Senator who has offered the amendment will not disagree with me materially in regard to the restrictions I propose.

I wish to offer some amendments to his amendment, and will not undertake any extended remarks on the bill itself, for certainly it would be unwise to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing a bill which, so far as I know, will receive the almost unanimous support of the Senate. I had the honor on Friday of submitting an amendment, which is now before the Senate, to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri; but as I wish to add to that amendment, I will send to the Secretary's desk the list of amendments, including the one already offered, which I desire at the proper time shall receive consideration.

The first amendment I offer is in line 8 of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri; I think there is an omission unintended by the Senator. I wish to insert after the word "iron," in line 8, the words "or steel;" in line 12, after the word "equipment," I wish to insert "or repair." I wish to strike out the word "five," in line 2 of the second section of the amendment, and insert "seven."

The reason I wish to do this, if permitted to discuss the matter now—and I shall be very brief about it—is, that the Senator will observe that in the first section of his amendment and in the last line he proposes to admit materials free of duty after the 1st day of January, 1885. Owing to the complete appliances upon the other side of the ocean a steamship can be constructed in much less time there than it can be here with our imperfect and meager appliances.

I wish to give a sufficient length of time between the importation of the raw material and the time required to build and market the ship, so that our ship-builders can compete upon a given day with the ship-builders of any other nation in the world. In other words, if an English ship-builder can build a ship in six months and can supply the American demand in six months from the 1st day of January, 1885, and the American ship-builder can not do it under eighteen months, I propose to restrict the American purchaser of a foreign ship to the eighteen months, giving the twelve months' difference to our ship-builders to manufacture and market their ships in competition with the ship-builder on the other side.

I do not know that I should not be satisfied with the 1st of May, 1886, but certainly there ought to be a discrimination as to the time, for a foreign ship-builder can be prepared with his ship on the 2d day of January, 1885, to market in the American market, while the American ship-builder can not avail himself of the cheap material until the 1st day of January, 1885. Therefore it is that I suggest this amendment.

Another amendment which I have already had the honor to offer is at the end of section 2 of the Senator's amendment to add:

Provided, That such ships shall be excluded from the coastwise trade.

I have another amendment, in line 4 of section 2 of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, after the word "vessel," to insert:

Not less than 3,000 tons net measurement.

In this regard I am more liberal in support of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri than the amendment agreed to in the House bill. This amendment I think the Senator should be willing to accept.

There is another amendment that I propose to offer to section 1 of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, lines 9 and 10, to strike out "engines, boiler plates and tubes, and machinery." I strike these words out for the purpose of inserting the following:

Boiler plates, tubes, flues of all descriptions, furnaces, pig-iron, and yellow-metal for castings, iron and steel blooms, shaft forgings not turned or fitted, and all other material, metallic or otherwise, used in the construction of marine boilers and engines.

In other words, I enlarge upon the idea of the Senator from Missouri as to the number of enumerated articles to be admitted free of duty, but I restrict the importation of the engine and the machinery, and for this reason: If you admit engines and machinery under this sweeping clause, you in fact admit the importation of an engine complete in all its parts, ready for service, ready to be dropped into the hold of the ship, which will be used in the coastwise protected trade. I make no hesitation in saying that I favor protecting the American ship-builder in the protected trade. The coastwise traffic is a protected traffic, and I would continue to protect that branch of our commerce. Again, I will do no act which will tend directly or indirectly to prevent the intelligence, the ingenuity, the enterprise of our people making suitable advancement in the construction of marine engines.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. How long does the Senator from New Jersey think that any protection could be maintained for the coastwise trade after by our laws we had thrown open the foreign trade to the American citizen who might buy ships abroad for that trade? How long would it be before the American citizen who had bought his ship abroad with American money, under our laws, would claim that he should be admitted to all the trade that any American citizens might engage in? The British coasting trade is thrown open, and when Great Britain, after protecting her ship-yards and shipping interests, saw that she had arrived at a point where she could compete with the world, threw open her shipping laws to the world, she also opened the coasting trade as well. How long does the Senator believe it would be before we should be obliged to do that?

Mr. MCPHERSON. The question is a very easy one to answer. We should retain it just exactly as long as we retain the laws on the statute-book that protect it. The navigation laws now on our statute-book have been there since 1790; this is 1884—almost a century.

Mr. HALE. But the Senator proposes now to change those navigation laws.

Mr. MCPHERSON. As to the foreign trade only, and not to the coastwise trade.

Mr. HALE. And when he breaks in, what logic is there, if you will admit free ships to engage in the foreign trade, in preventing their engaging also in the coastwise trade?

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the American people will not buy ships at all, any reform of the navigation laws will be of no avail. There was one period in the history of this country when we did a large part of the commerce of the world. Why do we not do it now? The era in which we succeeded was an era of wooden ships, and they exist to-day only in history. The era with which we have to deal to-day is an era of iron ships with the screw propeller and with the compound-engine. That is the thing which has driven American commerce from the ocean. People say the Alabama did it. That was an incident and not the cause of the decline of American shipping. If the Alabama and her consorts had never existed, the condition of things would be very little different from what they are to-day.

But, as I maintain, the American people to-day are disposed to enter the field of commerce; they have ceased to invest their money in domestic enterprises, largely protected as they have been by the legislation of Congress, and to-day they are seeking new fields for their capital. If that were not so, we might make it just as free as the sunlight and the air, and no money, no energy would seek to engage in commercial pursuits. I maintain that the American people to-day are ready to engage in this business, but how? Only by removing every shackle to the foreign commerce of the country. But the moment you start your ship upon the ocean you have no protection then. There the stream of commerce unceasingly flows, you run upon nature's highway with no protection but nature's God, and that God treats all alike and favors "the other fellow" as much as you.

I am in favor of protection to our domestic commerce, but as to our foreign commerce I would make it just as free as the competition which confronts us and the ocean upon which it sails. Our ships traverse the same waters, buffet the same billows, carry the same cargoes from the same ports and to the same ports. There is no protection there; it is "the survival of the fittest." I would place American capital and the American citizen on an exact equality with all the world.

If the Government chooses to step in and pay a bounty to the American ship-owner, if he finds he can not run his ship without it, well and good; but for one I propose to try—not a subsidy, because I am opposed to a continuous subsidy for anything—I propose to make the right to engage in foreign commerce as free as the American Congress can make it, and then if we fail I do not know but that I should be open to conviction in support of Government aid; but I prefer to try other remedies first.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from New Jersey is in favor of preserving the ship-yards of the United States, I understand him to say.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am.

Mr. FRYE. Let me recall the Senator's attention to a fact in history. When England began to pay her subsidies fifty years ago Portugal on the ocean was almost her equal. England persuaded Portugal to stop building ships and to buy ships—the same thing that the Senator is contending for to-day, and yet he is honestly in favor of the ship-yards, I have no doubt. What was the result to Portugal? To-day she is not fit to be mentioned on the ocean. What was the result to the ship-yards of Portugal? When the United States steamer Nipsic only a short time ago fell into difficulty on the coast of Portugal—that was only a year ago—she was compelled to go to England and send a man to England with her in order to have the head of a part of her machinery fixed. There was not a ship-yard in the whole of Portugal where it could be done. Now does not the Senator fear that if we have "free ships" in ten years the same result may happen in the United States—that we could not get that sort of work done in the United States?

Mr. MCPHERSON. How did England influence Portugal?

Mr. FRYE. By cajoling her as she cajoles every nation she lays her finger on. England never made a treaty with the United States of America that she did not control us and beat us. She never made a treaty with any other country on the face of the earth that she did not get the advantage.

Mr. MCPHERSON. With all due respect to the Senator from Maine, I will not undertake to answer that supposition. Cajolery has but little weight with serious men.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me a moment to reply to his question?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I want to answer the question how England influenced Portugal. Everybody who has in any way been familiar with the course of European influence for the last forty or fifty years knows that English councils in reference to Portugal have been almost entirely supreme. She has been the influencing power over Portugal in all matters relating not only internally to Portugal but in reference to her association in European politics. That is the way England influenced Portugal.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will not entertain for a moment any illustration which compares an old, rotten, effete, third-rate power with a young, vigorous, enterprising people like our own; and in reply to the Senator from Maine I will say that the principle on which I propose to act is the only principle that can save our ship-yards from death, the only one that will preserve them from entire annihilation. I would stimulate among the people of our country an endeavor, an effort to engage in the shipping trade of the country. I would make ships as cheap to them as I could, even if they went abroad to buy them. I would not handicap an American by $100,000 extra cost upon the price of his ship. I would not handicap him by the hundred and one things which to-day handicap the American ship-owner; but I would say to him: "Go out into the world; compete with the world." I would answer it exactly as the American steamship line from Philadelphia has answered every question the honorable Senator raises. That was a line of steamships established by American enterprise, built up by American capital. Behind it stood the most powerful railroad corporation upon this continent, feeding it day after day and week after week, giving it all the business it could do at current rates, and yet it died. The American Government, under its laws, said to the American steamship line: "Pull down your flag or leave the ocean!" and they pulled down their flag and went under the Belgian flag.

Why, Mr. President, the whole answer is found in that one fact alone. Take twenty horses and start them in a race; the strongest and the fleetest will always win; but when you overload that horse, handicap him far beyond the others, the probability is that he will bite the dust. That is the condition of our foreign commerce to-day. Therefore it is that I support the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, provided the amendments I have had the honor to offer are incorporated in it. But I have still another amendment to offer.

Mr. FRYE. Before the Senator proceeds further I wish to ask him another question.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I did not expect to be drawn into a discussion, and I did not rise for the purpose. But go on; I will hear you.

Mr. FRYE. We are all talking for information. Here is a free-material clause, so called, to which the Senator offers an amendment striking out engines and boilers and machinery; but he leaves in the free-material clause plates, angles, beams, and bars, and all that sort of thing. Now, let me say to the Senator that there are in the United States only four ship-forges, one in New Hampshire, one in Trenton, one in Paterson, and one in New York, fit for the large shafting. If that large shafting is admitted free into the United States under the free-material clause, what will become of these four forges, costing from $150,000 to $250,000 each? If it destroys them, as it will, and then you have a war with England, what are you going to do for your large castings for your vessels in the war?

Again, every iron-ship yard in the United States, besides its forge, the plate-iron shop at great expense—absolutely necessary—has the angle shop; it has the beam shop; it has the bar shop and the furnace-room. Make the free-material clause a law, and your angle shop, your beam shop, your bar shop, and plate-iron shop and forges are rendered unnecessary. Suppose you lose them, and then there is a war with England, and you want to build your own ships; your ship-yards have none of the appliances necessary to work with and you are practically disabled.

Now, I want to call the Senator's attention to another thing. If you want to build a 4,000-ton ship under the free-material clause you sit down and make all your specifications for every single thing that is going into that ship; all you reserve to yourself is to put her together. It takes four months from the time you serve your order upon the English ship-builder for you to have those materials landed in your yards. There is four months' delay. It takes an expenditure of $400,000 at least for those materials. That expenditure is a cash expenditure. You have not the credit in England that you have at home, and banks there will not credit you as they do at home. So that is a cash expenditure. The Senator knows that a contract for a 4,000-ton ship here to-day is ordinarily 5 per cent. cash when the contract is drawn; 10 per cent. when the keel is laid; 10 per cent. more when she is half up, when her frame is in the yard; 10 per cent. when she is half plated; 10 per cent. when she is full plated. So the payments are coming on gradually in this business, and it enables a man without a large capital beyond his plant to go ahead and build his ship. How is the Senator going to obviate the difficulty, which he will see at once arises there, if he is compelled to make one order for $400,000 to go into that ship? Does not the Senator see lots of difficulties in a free-material clause when the material is a complete manufacture and not material; everything about it is ready but the ship.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator from Maine has stated his proposition very fairly. It is entitled to an equally fair answer.

As to the Senator's proposition—what will become of the manufactories which are to-day manufacturing the component parts of a ship, if you admit the component parts free of duty as is proposed—while the Senator is right in presenting the supposition in that form I do not admit and can not admit his conclusions. I aver most strenuously that the only way to save the American ship-yards is by making foreign commerce free and inspiring and stimulating endeavor to make them go into the foreign commerce. Even the repairs alone upon the increased foreign commerce would be vastly more profitable than the business they are doing to-day. Look at it. Here a few years ago we had a full-fledged line of American steamers from the port of Philadelphia. To-day not one of them floats the American flag. There is the answer again.

Unlike the honorable Senator from Maine, I am the friend of the ship-yards, and more the friend of the ship-yards than the honorable Senator can possibly be under his system. I say to the American ship-maker, "Protect the American market; protect the American ship-builder upon every line within the jurisdiction of the United States." I say again to the American ship-builder, "If you stand in the way of American enterprise and American capital sharing a part of the world's progress, then down goes your shop; for myself I will not stand by it an hour."

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator is right, it only shows what fools all our American ship-builders are, for they differ with him, I believe every one of them.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That does not prove that I am a fool.

Mr. FRYE. No, I said it proved that they were. I would not charge that upon the Senator by any manner of means.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Now, Mr. President, I will send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have my amendments read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The Chair understands that the question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey on the last legislative day which is one of those named. The others will be taken up in their order.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I would prefer that they be taken up in their regular order, and that unanimous consent be given to have this amendment read at this time for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from New Jersey temporarily withdraws the other amendment?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I withdraw that and offer it in another form. I desire the Secretary to read the last amendment. The others have been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment referred to will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the first section of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], in lines 9 and 10, it is proposed to strike out "engines, boiler plates and tubes, and machinery," and to insert in lieu thereof:

Boiler-plates, tubes, flues of all descriptions, furnaces, pig-iron, and yellow-metal for castings, iron and steel blooms, shaft forgings, not turned or fitted, and all other material, metallic or otherwise, used in the construction of marine boilers and engines.

Mr. MCPHERSON. My amendment is much more liberal than the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, and at the same time I have struck out from his amendment the completed engines and machinery. Why? Because under his amendment the completed engines and machinery can be used in the protected coastwise trade, which I propose to prevent, and thus protect the American ship-builder to this extent.

With the consent of the Senate I should like to read for its information a letter which I received this morning from a very distinguished ship-builder in this country, Mr. Cramp, of the firm of Cramp & Sons. It will be understood that Mr. Cramp does not agree in any sense or form with this proposed legislation in regard to free ships, but as to a particular feature of the bill he has written me a letter calling my attention to what he is pleased to term the unjust feature of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, and gives his reasons, which I should like to read.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to call your attention to the peculiar language of the free-material clause or first section of Senator VEST's amendment to the shipping bill now pending in the Senate. It will be observed that after enumerating certain materials used in construction of hulls and boilers, the amendment proposes to include "engines * * * and machinery" in the free-material list. Accepting Senator VEST's own interpretation of the intent of his amendment in good faith, to wit, that it is designed to equalize as far as possible the conditions of competition between American and foreign ship-builders that would necessarily result from the opening of our registry to foreign-built ships, I am compelled to regard this proposition to admit "engines * * * and machinery" among so-called "free materials" as an error of judgment, arising from an imperfect knowledge or insufficient survey of the subject.

The logic of Senator VEST's speech, as of all the speeches in advocacy of free ships and free materials, is that the admission of the latter duty free is designed to promote the interests of American builders by cheapening an important element of construction. This logic to a certain extent holds good if the proper definition of the word "materials" be adhered to. But "engines * * * and machinery," as designated in the amendment, are in no sense "materials," as that term would be understood in the trade. They are, on the contrary, indispensable and absolute parts of the complete ship itself, involving in their particular fabrication a mass of "materials" quite as important and, in ships designed for superior speed, as costly as the "materials" that enter into the construction of the hull. If the author of this clause really meant to provide for the importation of "engines * * * and machinery" duty free as part of a list of "free materials," there is no reason why he should not have taken the only remaining step and added the word "hulls," because the hull is no more a part of the complete ship than the engine is, and the one belongs as appropriately in a list of "materials" as the other does.

But if the honorable Senator meant simply to provide for the admission of materials for the construction of engines and machinery duty free in the same manner as for the admission of materials for the construction of hulls, which he has enumerated properly and described clearly, then the phraseology of his amendment requires considerable alteration in order to convey his intent accurately. I would therefore suggest, assuming that his purpose is to aid and not to destroy the industry of marine-engine building in this country—

The amendment he proposes is practically the same amendment I have offered.

This modification is absolutely required, if it be the honorable Senator's design to put "materials" for engine construction upon the same footing with "materials" for hull-building, which he has done in the preceding clause of his amendment.

I am free to say that if the free-material clause as it now stands should become a law, including as it does "engines and machinery" without qualification, the industry of marine-engine building would necessarily cease to exist in this country, as the honorable Senator himself must see at a glance if he will take the trouble to examine the conditions of competition to which American builders would be subjected.

And in this respect I speak not only of "engines and machinery" for ships in the foreign trade, but for those employed in the coastwise traffic—and on our inland waters as well, because the amendment admitting "engines and machinery" duty free says simply that they shall be for the use of "vessels," and does not specify, define, or limit the class, nature, or employment of the "vessels" contemplated.

Under these circumstances I respectfully request that you will call the attention of the honorable Senator to this evident defect in his amendment either by exhibiting this letter to him personally or causing it to be read for the information of the Senate, or both.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. H. CRAMP,
President of Wm. Cramp & Sons.

Hon. J. R. MCPHERSON,
United States Senator.

With respect to the engines, if my amendment is agreed to it will place all materials in a certain degree of preparation in the hands of the American ship-builder for use. If the amendment of the Senator from Missouri prevails without striking out the engines and machinery the foreign engines may be brought here and placed with perfect propriety and right under the law in the coastwise trade of the country, and in that trade I shall insist so long as it has the protection of our laws the ship-builders also shall have some protection in building the ships that engage in it. However, if the Senator from Missouri wishes to permit completed engines or machinery to come here duty free to engage in the foreign trade, as a matter of principle I can not object to that; but I do object to the free scope which he gives to his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to strike out and insert certain words in lines 9 and 10 of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it has been very absurdly contended here by several gentlemen that the existing tariff laws prevent our having any foreign shipping. I must say myself that I can not discover that there is any difference so far as the tariff laws are concerned which discriminate between American shipping and foreign shipping. An American vessel to-day is at liberty to go and take on a cargo at Liverpool and take it to India, and return to the same port again with India cotton or with wheat. There is not a particle of difference so far as the tariff laws are concerned. I admit that a protective tariff has a great tendency to raise the wages of all kinds of labor here; and is it the purpose of any gentleman on this floor to declare that they wish to lower the wages of labor in this country? It must be conceded by everybody that with the present scale of wages in this country a foreign ship or a home ship can not be run by American sailors even if the vessel were to be given to the parties who desired to embark in the business. There is an important difference in the wages to be paid and also in the provisions and comforts provided.

Mr. President, there is no sort of doubt that there are other things besides the protective tariff that raise wages in this country. We give a bounty to every American citizen and to every foreigner who will come here of one hundred and sixty acres of land as long as our public lands may last; and while our public land system prevails, men who can go on our prairies and take one hundred and sixty acres of land will do that in preference to enlisting as common sailors on any vessel, whether engaged in the home or in foreign trade, and these one hundred and sixty acres of land in five or ten years, instead of being worth only $1.25 per acre, if they should have to pay that for it, will be worth $20 to $25 an acre. So long as there is an opening for the young, healthy, and athletic men upon the Atlantic or Pacific shores they will not enter into the business of sailors upon vessels when they can so much better engage in a more profitable business. It is quite absurd, therefore, to suppose that we can by allowing free ships to come here restore the shipping that we formerly had.

Again, Mr. President, at the present time this business is vastly overdone abroad. Less than a week ago I saw by the papers that the shipowners of Great Britain had agreed among themselves to lay up one-fourth part of all their shipping and that those engaged in the business should make a common pool and pay their fair share to the vessels laid up. Now, in case we were to allow foreign vessels to come in free, of course this quarter part of the shipping of Great Britain that is to-day idle would be offered here at a much less price than was probably its first cost; and then when the general depression of trade which now prevails all over the world should have passed away and ship-building again should be resumed, here in the United States ship-building would have become a lost art, and England, having the ready means, would at once supply whatever the demand might be.

Mr. President, the way that England has maintained her supremacy in the way of foreign trade has been a very expensive one. In the memory of all of us they recently had a war in New Zealand, another in Southern Africa, and not long ago the war in Afghanistan, and about forty years ago one in India for the reason that China found her laws evaded by the introduction of opium and the Chinese made a confiscation of opium introduced to the amount of about $2,000,000. England thereupon made war upon China and subdued her, and subjected one of her largest cities to be looted by the men and officers, and then imposed a treaty upon China by which five of her ports were to admit opium and subjected her to $20,000,000 of fine, with the permanent cession of Hong-Kong, and to-day that trade is kept up by Great Britain in consequence of that treaty; and England, or which is the same thing the Indian Government, derives an income of over $50,000,000 from this trade in opium in China, a trade that is ruinous to the physique of a great many of the Chinese, a trade that is constantly increasing. The moral sense of the world was shocked by this transaction, and those in power were very sternly assailed in consequence by Mr. Gladstone, but the latter gentleman has made no move to release China from this most pernicious contract.

The expense of protection so far as Great Britain is concerned upon her foreign trade is almost as much as the entire cost for the support of our Government. They keep in the Mediterranean a large fleet of ships, and they keep ten or twelve thousand soldiers at Gibraltar and Malta. They keep an immense fleet near Australia, in the Chinese seas and in India and all over the world. These fleets of vessels are supported for the sole purpose of keeping up her foreign trade. It is an immense expenditure on the part of the Government of Great Britain.

Mr. President, I look upon this question as very important to the United States. If we are to abandon the business of making our own ships, what are we to do in case of a war with any other power? Are we to go abroad to buy our ships? Of course it takes some little time to build an iron or a steel ship, and for the purposes of defense, whatever the cost might be, the last thing we ought to surrender should be the building of American ships.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I am sorry that my friend the chairman of the Finance Committee should have dragged the tariff into this discussion.

Mr. MORRILL. I did it in reply to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. He can not divest himself of a bad habit. I suppose, therefore, I shall have to apologize for him. It may be, however, that there is a good deal more of tariff taxation in this matter than would appear at first blush, because the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER,] as well as both the Senators from Maine, seems to regard the effort to allow ships to come in free as being destructive in part of the protective system. Indeed, I believe the Senator from New York presided over the great protective-tariff convention in New York which declared that "the American people intend hereafter to keep this market for themselves," that "the tariff must be protective"—that protection, I presume, must extend to ships, no matter in what business they are engaged, or the harmony of the system will be destroyed. I asked the Senator from New York this morning while he was presenting his very learned argument how he could protect by a tariff ships engaged in the foreign trade. He failed to answer. Of course it can not be done under our treaty stipulations. We inaugurated the system of equal and reciprocity rights in the ocean-carrying trade. On the 24th of May, 1828, the Congress of the United States passed a law directing the President of the United States to remove all discriminating duties as to tonnage and cargoes from the vessels of all nations that would do the same thing in regard to our vessels and their cargoes. All of the nations of the world have accepted our proposition, Spain only excepted, and we have made treaties with them all based upon these principles.

The ships that we use in the foreign trade must go out on the ocean highways of the world and compete on absolutely equal terms with the ships of other nations to whom we have by treaty granted the same rights that our own ships have. We can grant no discriminating duties to the cargoes of our ships; we can impose no tonnage dues upon foreign vessels that are not imposed upon our own. All the suggestions that I hear are being made elsewhere (I can not say at the other end of the Capitol perhaps) as well as here—that one of the modes of disposing of this difficulty is to allow American vessels to bring in goods at 10 per cent. or 5 per cent. less tariff taxes than are allowed upon goods brought in foreign ships—are neither possible nor admissible until every treaty with foreign powers is annulled. The ships that we use on the high seas have to meet with the competition of foreign nations upon terms of absolute equality. Protection can not reach beyond our shores. If we ought to reserve our markets for ourselves, other nations on the same principle ought to reserve theirs to themselves, and that ends trade and commerce.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Do I understand the Senator to say—I ask only for information—that under the "most favored nation" clause the United States Government can not discriminate in favor of her own ships?

Mr. BECK. I do, but not altogether under "the most favored nation" clause.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Under any treaty stipulation?

Mr. BECK. Yes. I will read the act of May 24, 1828, where we first made the proposition, which was accepted by other nations:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That upon satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States by the government of any foreign nation that no discriminating duties of tonnage or impost are imposed or levied in the ports of the said nation upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon the produce, manufactures, or merchandise imported in the same from the United States, or from any foreign country, the President is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation, declaring that the foreign discriminating duties of tonnage and impost within the United States are, and shall be, suspended and discontinued so far as respects the vessels of the said foreign nation, and the produce, manufactures, or merchandise imported into the United States in the same from the said foreign nation, or from any other foreign country; the said suspension to take effect from the time of such notification being given to the President of the United States, and to continue so long as the reciprocal exemption of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, and their cargoes, as aforesaid, shall be continued, and no longer.

Every foreign nation, Spain alone excepted, so far as I am advised, has accepted that proposal made by Congress and has made its laws conform to it. In section 2 of the act a special provision was made.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That was not the provision of a treaty?

Mr. BECK. No; it is an act of Congress, which has been complied with by foreign nations, and it has been in many instances embodied in treaties made since that time.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then I have nothing further to say.

Mr. BECK. The act further provides:

SEC. 2. That no other or higher rate of duties shall be imposed or collected on vessels of Prussia, or of her dominions, from whencesoever coming, nor on their cargoes, howsoever composed, than are or may be payable on vessels of the United States, and their cargoes.

That section expressly embraces what is now Germany. Of course, laws and treaties being of the same dignity, the law that is passed subsequently to a treaty and that is acquiesced in by the foreign powers who have the right to accept it stands upon an equal footing with a former treaty and annuls it so far as it varies from it.

The propositions that I submitted the other day when I argued that question were—I repeat them now—that we have given to all the nations of the world the right to trade with us in ships they can buy anywhere upon exactly the same terms that we can trade in our own ships; we have prohibited Congress, until we annul all our treaty stipulations, from giving to American ships any aid by way of discriminating or tonnage duties. It is conceded that we can not build ships here as cheaply as they are built elsewhere. Therefore we compete at great disadvantage. All have agreed to the truth of these propositions so far as I have heard in this debate. Then there is but one of two courses left: we have either to tax this whole people to raise subsidies to pay to American-built ships, or we have to permit an American to buy ships as all his competitors do, because he can not pay $300,000 for his ship and compete upon equal terms with an Englishman, a Frenchman, a German, or a Mexican, who pays $200,000 for a similar ship. That is too obvious to require argument.

The Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] asked why not require them to pay the tariff duties that all other machinery pays? When you do that you handicap the American ship-owner in the foreign trade to the extent of the duties he has been required to pay, because you have enhanced the price of his ship that much beyond what his competitor has had to pay for his ship. The Senator from New York had to admit that, and he proposes to pay an additional subsidy in the shape of mail contracts so as to make up for it. It has resolved itself into this: That we must either subsidize the American ocean carrier so as to equalize him or we must allow him to have free ships to begin with, because he can not run upon the ocean in competition with men who by treaty have the right to buy the ships anywhere as cheaply as they can and carry their goods upon the same terms that our citizens do in their ships unless the people of the United States are taxed to make the difference in cost up to him in money outside of his trade.

The suggestions I made the other day were presented carefully to see if anybody could answer them. Nobody has yet; nobody can. England to-day is building nearly all the ships for the foreign nations engaged in our trade. How is she going to be helped by allowing an American citizen to buy ships from her just as the Frenchman, the German, or the Mexican does now? Only so many ships are needed, no matter who owns them, and England is building them and running most of them. We are to-day supporting for her 100,000 sailors and their families in our carrying trade. How is she going to be benefited by our doing that carrying trade ourselves and having the 100,000 sailors under the command of American officers and under the control of the United States to do our bidding and not hers in case of strife between us and her? No man can say that England will be benefited, or that she desires the United States, her great natural commercial rival, to occupy her natural position upon the high seas and to deprive her of her commercial supremacy.

Again I said we are building no ships for the foreign trade now, and we can not. How is the American ship-builder injured by a law that deprives foreign nations of the monopoly they now have in the American ocean-carrying trade? They have it and they will maintain it for all time to come unless we do something to take control of it ourselves. There are, I repeat, only so many ships necessary to do the carrying trade of the world that can be built or that will be built. We are building none of them; England is building nearly all of them. We are to-day prostrate and defenseless, without a ship, a sailor, or a gun. Ninety-five per cent. of the few sailors we have to-day are foreigners, and they are, as I said, foreigners of the most worthless character who can not get employment in the first-class ships of their own nationalities. I have here the pay-list of the Alaska, one of the leading ships of the Guion line, for the month before last. It is as follows:

Pay-roll of British steamship Alaska, of Guion line, between Liverpool and New York. Salaries paid monthly—given in English money, which can easily be calculated at $5 to the pound:

Second engineer	17	10	0
Third engineer	13	10	0
Ten fifth engineers, each at £6	60	0	0
Eight firemen, at £5 each	40	0	0
Thirty-eight firemen, at £4 10s. each	176	0	0
First officer	15	0	0
Second officer	10	0	0
Two boatswain's mates, at £5 each	10	0	0
Carpenter's mate	5	0	0
Twenty-six able-bodied seamen, at £4 each	104	0	0
Second steward	8	0	0
Third steward	7	0	0
Eight stewards, at £4 each	32	0	0
Seven stewards, at £3 10s. each	24	0	0
Seventy stewards, at £3 each	210	0	0
Four stewardesses, at £3 each	12	0	0
One steward	6	0	0
One steward	5	0	0
Three boys, at £2 each	6	0	0

Three cooks, at £5 each	15	0	0
One cook, at	3	15	0
Baker	8	0	0

Whole crew between 230 and 240.
Amount of wages about £1,150, or $5,750, monthly.

That pay-roll shows what the English people pay in the Guion steamship line to the officers and crew of the Alaska. It compares favorably with the wages that are said to be paid by the Philadelphia line in the table given by the Senator from Maine. I think that the Alaska pays higher wages to her officers, and almost as high wages to her sailors, as are paid by the Philadelphia line, though I have not compared them—$250 a month to the captain, $125 to the first engineer, and so on through the list, seems to me to be liberal wages.

It is said, why not pass the bill as it came from the committee; all agree that the provisions are right as far as they go? I agree that the three months' wages, that the compulsory order now existing to discharge sailors when they land on the American coast, and that many other things of that sort ought to have been repealed long ago and ought to be now. We can pass those provisions at any moment, I suppose, unanimously through the Senate; but what is the use of stopping there if it is our object to establish an American merchant marine or to do anything really looking in that direction? Why should we stop with simply repealing some of the smaller burdens when we admit that after we have done all we can and given free, cheap ships and material and reduced every tax down to the lowest possible point and relieved every burden as far as it can be done, even then it is hardly possible to compete with foreign nations on the high seas, considering the start they have got of us? Why should we, I say, content ourselves with doing a few little things that will not restore the merchant marine and not take the indispensable step necessary to even make a start?

I have no doubt, as the Senator from Missouri has said more than once, if the patient were suffering with a disease almost necessarily fatal, that it would relieve him a little to pare his corns, but that would do very little toward saving his life. The little relief that is proposed by the uncontroverted provisions of the bill are all good, all beneficial, but they fail to reach the root of the evil. I insist further that the proposition to give mail-pay does not reach it. What are we seeking to do? That is the first question. We are seeking to revive the carrying trade for our exports and imports in American ships; we are seeking to carry the grain, the cattle, the provisions, the great exports of America to all parts of the world, and especially to people of Europe who want them. Is anybody anywhere complaining of the want of mail facilities? Is the country suffering because the mails of the United States can not reach their destination? Of course not. Is it proposed to subsidize a steamship line to carry mails across the Atlantic? Senators say that they do not expect to do that. Then what are you going to do? Who are you going to relieve by granting mail-pay for lines to Brazil and to the other southern American countries? You are simply going to give a subsidy to the few men who build ships, and to endeavor to tempt somebody to run ships to South America in a trade which is unprofitable now by granting a subsidy in the form of a mail contract. The men of this country, the men of the West, the men I represent, desire to have American ships in which they can carry their wheat, their corn, their cattle, their provisions, their supplies to the markets that want them.

The countries with whom we have treaty relations attend to their own mails. I have before me the annual report of the Treasury Department on the foreign commerce of the United States from the Bureau of Statistics, in which a very instructive table is presented. [Exhibiting.] I hope Senators will look at it. It is accessible to all. The red lines exhibit the value and amount of the commerce of the United States with the principal foreign countries for the year ending June 30, 1882, on a scale of thirty-two one-hundredths of an inch, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland extends over two feet; the dependencies of Great Britain extend from four to eight and ten inches, and the countries we are now seeking to establish mail relations with, except Brazil, extend from a quarter of an inch to an inch or so. That is the extent of the trade the proposed mail contracts will enable us to reach. It is so small that you can hardly see it in the line of comparison. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] does not pretend that the mail subsidy will enable us to reach the great trade that the mass of the people of the United States desire and need. I can not put that table in the RECORD; I wish I could; there would be no trouble in understanding it if that could be done.

"Mail contracts" is a very convenient name. I am willing to pay for all the service rendered by all steamships everywhere in carrying mails. It is said that England pays immense sums of money for carrying mails. Of course she does, but she does not pay one-half for mails that we do. We are paying this year $47,000,000 for carrying the mails of the United States. England does not pay half of it; she does not pay a third of it.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator is a little in error; he is thinking of the grand total of the Post-Office appropriation bill, and not of the amount paid for carrying the mails. Of the amount appropriated about $13,000,000 are paid for carrying the mails on railroads, about $6,000,000 for carrying them on the star routes, and about $600,000 on steamboat routes.

Mr. BECK. That makes about $20,000,000.

Mr. PLUMB. About $20,000,000, and the balance is paid in the expenses of the Post-Office Department in a variety of ways, the salaries of postmasters chiefly.

Mr. BECK. The salaries of postmasters and many other things, but the whole cost of the mail service is $46,000,000.

Mr. PLUMB. It will be about $49,000,000 this year, I think—between $48,000,000 and $49,000,000.

Mr. BECK. Very well. The whole of the packet service of England is I believe less than $3,500,000. Our people live on a great continent. England, Scotland, Ireland, and all the little islands attached contain only 121,000 square miles, while Texas alone has 276,000; but England has to supply her people with mails in India, in Canada, in the West Indies. Everywhere in the world she has her naval stations, her coaling stations, her depots for supplies, and she has to send to those points through her mail just as we have to send to Arizona, to Montana, and Wyoming, everywhere, where it costs us perhaps ten dollars to send letters for every dollar we get back. But each country has to supply its people with mail facilities as best it can, properly, rightfully, and of course as economically as possible. I am not complaining of the cost of the service of either country; each has to use the instrumentalities best adapted to accomplish the end. We use mostly railways; England has to use ships on the ocean to reach her people.

It is said that we pay immense sums on our coastwise trade for mail service. Of course we do. We have a great coast of ten or twelve thousand miles. Railroads can not reach it in very many places. The bays, the rivers, the places along the coast have to be reached by the ships in the coastwise trade, and we require the ships engaged in that trade to go into the little harbors and stop at every place where there is a post-office, whether they have trade or passengers or not, in fog, or rain, or storm, and deliver the mails to our people. We pay them for doing that. But it is proposed to give a million and a half by this bill, under the pretense that we are obliged to carry mails to Brazil and other South American countries which take care of their own mails, where we have but little trade and no people. It is simply a pretense to grant a subsidy—we may as well call it by the proper name. Who is complaining about South American mail service? We are asked, Is there any petition sent here for free ships? Is there any petition here from Brazil, from any South American country complaining that they can not get their mails? No. They get the mails, I presume, and get them promptly. England has to use more steamship service than the United States because she has more ocean to traverse to reach her distant possessions. Her people are scattered over the face of the earth and she supplies them. Our people are scattered over the great Territories of the United States, and we supply them as best we can. That is all there is of the mails.

Just here let me remark, as I see the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in his seat, that I heard him use an argument the other day that struck me as very singular. He announced to us that if we allowed foreign ships to be registered under the American flag, if ever war ensued between England and any other foreign nation we should have all the English commercial fleet registered as part of ours. Let me read his language. The Senator's colleague [Mr. FRYE] in his interrogatory to me the other day expressed the same idea. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] remarked:

> Let me tell the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky what will happen if this amendment passes. The very first time that war breaks out in Europe, the very first time that European complications involve Great Britain and she is drawn irresistibly into conflict (and if her marine is safe she is drawn more easily into conflict), what would happen? Her whole sailing force, her whole mercantile marine, would at once in the name of factors and agents and partners be put under the American flag, and while the war continued would be kept under the American flag, and the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky would behold this amazing spectacle, that the carrying trade of the world would continue to be done by British ships under the American flag, owned by British subjects, who would be really the controlling power, in the name of citizens here as partners and agents and factors, and all the earnings of this great trade would be absorbed by the owners of that carrying trade and expended in Great Britain and not a dollar derived by us from the emergency.

I turn as an answer to that to the statutes of the United States, which we do not propose to change, in reference to allowing ships built abroad being registered here. Without reading the provisions, because they are long, they provide in substance that all vessels registered in the United States shall be wholly owned by citizens and be commanded by citizens of the United States. All the officers of vessels of the United States shall in all cases be citizens of the United States; in short, they shall be wholly owned, wholly officered, and commanded alone by citizens.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What is the date of that act?

Mr. BECK. It is in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What is the act?

Mr. BECK. The act was passed in December, 1792.

Mr. HALE. Title 48.

Mr. BECK. Title 48, section 4131. Section 4133 provides that if any naturalized citizen owns any part of a registered vessel and resides two years in the country from whence he came his right to any part of that ship shall be forfeited, and that no man who is not a citizen shall under any circumstances have any right or interest in her. Section 4143 provides that the man who seeks for the registration shall make oath to all these facts, namely: that the vessel is wholly owned in the United States, wholly officered by citizens of the United States. And if in any regard that oath is false, the vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture shall be forfeited to the United States. Section 4191 provides that "every person who knowingly makes, utters, or publishes any false sea letter, Mediterranean passport"—for we keep that up, to take passports against the pirates in Algiers, in the Revised Statutes to-day—or certificate of registry, he shall be liable to a penalty of not more than $5,000, and, if an officer of the United States, shall thenceforth be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the authority of the United States.

In the face of those provisions, that no ship that is admitted to an American registry shall be owned even in part by a foreign citizen; that it shall not be owned even by a naturalized citizen unless he remains all the time in the United States; that he shall swear that these facts are true, and if they are not true the vessel shall be forfeited, and the man shall be fined $5,000 and be forever incapable of holding any office of honor, profit, and trust in the United States (which I suppose to any Republican gentleman would be the severest penalty that could be inflicted), how is it possible that the Senator from Maine could assert that all the English ships would at once, in case of war between herself and a foreign nation, be transferred to the American flag? Have we enough American officers, have we enough American captains, now to take possession of and command the whole British commercial marine? Can we run them all as our own under false pretenses? Is it to be assumed that every man who wants a ship is going to be guilty of perjury in order to get control of her? In order to make that statement at all reasonable, you must assume that there is no virtue left in the country.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? If there is nothing in this description of property different from any other, why should the exception be maintained with respect to this description of property?

Mr. BECK. I do not think it ought, but that is the law now, and it is under the law that the Senator from Maine was arguing the question.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I have a very plain and to me conclusive answer to the Senator from Kentucky, but I will not now, in the midst of what he is saying, if I can have the floor after he has yielded it, make an answer.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection. I have nothing special to say, and therefore you can speak as long as you like now. I will give way for any length of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I did not make my statement the other day that one result of free ships bought in British ship-yards would be that in case of war the British merchant marine would be put under our flag and get the benefits of it without a full consideration of our registration laws. I know something about the registration laws of the United States as touching American vessels and foreign vessels. As a representative for years of a people interested in navigation, I have had occasion from time to time to know the force and operation of the registration laws applied to vessels. I know how easy it is to avoid the registry laws applied to vessels. I know how easy it would be for the owners of British mercantile ships in case of a war in which Great Britain was interested to put their ships in the hands of American citizens here and yet retain the benefit of them.

Let me tell the Senator from Kentucky how easy it is. There is not a single provision of our registration laws applied to vessels in chapter 1 of title 48 of the Revised Statutes, whether in relation to penalties, in relation to oaths, or in relation to punishment, that is not absolutely met and done away with by a conveyance of the vessel to an American citizen. There is not a custom-house where the registration papers are offered that can go behind the bill of sale or conveyance. Let war break out to-morrow between England and France or between England and Germany, and let her commerce be in peril on the high seas, and at once, under the free-ship amendment urged by the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky, every English owner of an English steamship carrying the trade and commerce of the world upon its waters, by a conveyance absolute in terms to an agent or a partner or a factor in New York city, an American citizen, is entitled to have that vessel registered as an American ship.

In the name of good sense what is the object of free ships and of a free-ship law unless it is that where a British ship is bought and brought here it shall be put under the registration under oath? The terms of the law are answered; there is an absolute saving of the ship or a portion of the ship. It is presented to the American custom-house for registration, and with it is an oath that the person to whom the conveyance is made is the owner. No custom-house can go behind that; and at once when she enters into our marine then of course she may be manned by American seamen, she may be commanded by a United States captain; but when the earnings are received, when the freight-money is received by the agent and the partner and the factor in New York city, what power of law is there to prevent his remitting it by a check to the owner in Great Britain? There is nothing that you can enact that will prevent that.

I see the law of registration of ships avoided every day with reference to taxation. Everybody knows that where, for instance, in a certain municipal community the taxation of a ship is 2 or 3 per cent. it is transferred to an agent or a partner in Boston. The bill of sale is sent to Boston; it is presented to the custom-house; there is an oath that the Boston party is the owner; the custom-house receives it and it is recorded there, and it stands on the record as a Boston ship from that day and is reckoned and is subject to Boston taxation and not to the taxation in Lewiston, or Ellsworth, or Bangor; and the moment that the earnings of that ship are received they are transferred to the actual owner. That is done every day, and it is a technical conformity to the law.

Let me give the Senator from Kentucky an instance, I do not know whether he knows it, showing how easily this is done. I see that from his reading of the registry laws he believes it can not be done. From my experience I know something more about those laws than he. When our war broke out and when British bottoms were sought because England was neutral, though the British registry laws are even stronger than ours, in order to avoid the dangers of sailing under our flag thousands and thousands of tons of our shipping were put into the hands of British citizens in order to get British registration, although the real actual interest remained in our citizens. Whatever they earned they got during the war, and when the war ended those same American citizens turned around and urged as a reason why we should let those ships back, that while they had technically conformed to the British registration, had put them under the British flag, had sold them there and got the benefit of British neutrality, they had earned the freights and sent them home to America to be spent here, and they appealed to us to let those ships back under our flag when the war had ceased because they had adopted the British registration laws.

It is clear to me (if the Senator lives long enough he will see it as I see it now) that if you admit free ships of foreign build to all the benefits of our flag, whenever a war breaks out in which England is involved, I repeat, you will find the British mercantile marine put under our flag, under bills of sale and conveyances that can not be assailed, under bills of sale and conveyances that no custom-house can go behind, under bills of sale and conveyances that make an impregnable title on the record, and when they are so recorded and come under the operation of American laws and earn the freights of the world during that war in which Great Britain is engaged, the money will unerringly go back to Great Britain in checks, will be sent over there and there spent; and the Senator from Kentucky can not prevent it, I can not prevent it, except in one way, and that is to maintain our navigation laws as they are, so that whenever war does break out and America sees the opportunity that Great Britain saw in 1861 and when Great Britain then is menaced by the fear of the commercial world to put the freights into American bottoms, we may at once take the place that she has occupied, just as Great Britain took the place that we had occupied before. That is the answer to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. BECK. I will yield in a moment.

Mr. FRYE. I only wanted to give the Senator one additional matter to answer.

Mr. BECK. I think the Senator from Maine would perhaps have a fuller answer if he would allow me to make the suggestion now; but just as he pleases.

Mr. FRYE. I only wanted to read a statute.

Mr. BECK. The Senator's colleague [Mr. HALE] has attempted to answer what I said, and as I construe it it means that men will perjure themselves, and perjury will circumvent all laws. What he says is done can not be done honestly, but his point is that men will perjure themselves, and that by perjury they can avoid all the provisions of the statutes that I have read.

Mr. HALE. It is not such perjury as any one could be held in the courts of law for. The title——

Mr. BECK. It might not be held in a court of law under a Republican administration; I do not believe it could be; but we are seeking to reverse that as well.

Mr. HALE. Nobody would ever think even of prosecuting such a case under a Democratic administration.

Mr. BECK. Under a Democratic administration nobody would ever think of such perjuries as the Senator from Maine suggests are now an every-day occurrence.

Mr. HALE. It is not perjury.

Mr. BECK. It is so near it that it requires a man with a microscope or something else to see the difference between that and perjury.

Mr. HALE. The title passes when the bill of sale is made. The question is not raised. No custom-house can raise it. The legal title passes. The logical effect undoubtedly is an avoidance of the law, but if the Senator believes that the time has come when the commercial world will not do that in custom-house matters then he has a different view of it from what I have.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to prevent the colleague of the Senator from Maine from saying what he desires now.

Mr. FRYE. I simply want to show the Senator another instance my colleague did not mention where there is no perjury and no necessity for it. Section 4137 of the Revised Statutes provides:

> Registers for vessels owned by any incorporated company may be issued in the name of the president or secretary of such company; and such register shall not be vacated or affected by sales of any shares of stock in such company.

An incorporated company may own fifty ships in the name of the president and secretary, and every single share of that incorporated company may be sold but one, and here there is no limitation even upon that, and the registered vessels of that corporation shall not be affected. Now, turn over one step further.

Mr. BAYARD. How is it when foreign ships are running on American lines?

Mr. FRYE. I do not know what the foreign law is in relation to that. Take another section. These are registered ships, you remember, and it is provided that they shall not be affected by the sales of stocks in incorporated companies. Now read section 4313:

> Enrollments and licenses for vessels owned by any incorporated company may be issued in the name of the president or secretary of such company; and such enrollments or licenses shall not be vacated or affected by any sale of shares of stock in such company.

There is room for the English marine without taking any oaths whatsoever.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BECK. I will yield, of course.

Mr. VOORHEES. Oh, no; I wanted the floor in my own right. I thought the Senator from Kentucky had yielded the floor.

Mr. BECK. No; I beg pardon of the Senator from Indiana. I was simply allowing the Senators from Maine to explain what they meant, and yet at last after the explanation of both the Senators it is painfully apparent that no English ship could without perjury ever become a registered ship of the United States unless it was wholly owned by citizens of the United States and solely officered by citizens of the United States, and that neither a corporation nor an individual could without perjury obtain for her that privilege; and if the fact turned out to be that he knew that any statement he swore to was untrue the vessel would be forfeited and he would be fined $5,000 and be ever after incapable of holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the United States.

It was because those facts are apparent upon the face of the statutes that I said it was an amazing statement for the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to make the other day; indeed his colleague [Mr. FRYE] made substantially the same statement. I suppose that if we did obtain ships from England by any collusion or fraud of that sort and obtained them at cheap rates, there would be no power ever to take them away from us anymore. I do not suppose that a citizen of England could ever sue in any court of the United States to deprive the American citizen of the property he had thus obtained upon the ground that they had colluded together in order to violate or avoid the registry laws. The condition of the defendant would be the better in that case. The obtaining of a cheap ship would certainly not do anybody any harm, especially if the owner had to enter into a contest with men who buy the cheapest ships they can.

It is not necessary to answer the suggestions that have been made about worthless ships being thrown upon our hands. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] answered that absolutely well when he said that this was the first time he had ever heard that Congress had so to legislate as to keep us from being cheated by anybody else. If our people are not competent to know what they want, if they are not competent to protect themselves against the imposition of worthless ships upon them at prices higher than they are worth, then we are not the sagacious people that we have always claimed to be. When we go into a trade with anybody, individually or collectively, I assume we do not need a guardian. I have heard before the committees of the Senate, I have heard before the Finance Committee of the Senate, ship-builders come and present long lists of worthless ships. I heard it said on this floor a day or two ago that there was a large number of worthless ships now on the Clyde and elsewhere ready to be imposed upon our people at any moment if we had a right to buy them. It is an insult to the intelligence of our people to suppose that we should buy ships we did not want or should pay prices beyond what the ships were worth.

It seems to be conceded that one of two things has to be done; we have either got to admit ships free of duty in order to compete with foreign nations in the right to buy cheap ships, or we have to subsidize the men who run our ships. The proposition now made to subsidize through mail contracts (while as I said I am willing to pay fair prices for mail contracts) does not strike me favorably at present. I may have to vote for it; I do not know. I am willing to do anything to aid the shipping interest; but whom are you subsidizing when you pay for mail contracts large amounts of money, a million and a half a year to carry mails to Brazil that nobody wants, and when it is admitted that we do not propose to use any ships on the line we are subsidizing to carry any of our freights to Europe, where nearly all our exports are purchased from us, I do not think we are doing much good. We are really subsidizing the ship-builder and not the man who runs the ship. We are giving a subsidy to the man who builds a ship on the Delaware, or on the Hudson, or somewhere else. We are holding out an inducement to the man who carries the mails to buy his ship at home, and we say that he shall not have that mail contract, he shall not have that subsidy, unless he buys the ship from some man who is building it on the Delaware, or on the Hudson, or somewhere else in the United States.

Is the United States interested as a people that any man on the Delaware, on the Hudson, or anywhere else shall have a price paid to him by the man who proposes to carry the mails more than the ship is worth? Of course not. If we are interested at all, we are interested in having the mails carried and only that. Then why not let the man who carries your mails buy the ship to carry them as cheaply as he can, and if he can not, after he has done that, carry them as cheaply as other people, pay him some subsidy, some bounty, some allowance to enable him to do it, and thus enable him to compete with other people.

Did you ever hear of aid being given to a mail line by stage, by wagon, by railroad, by anything, to the man who built the locomotive, the wagon, or the stage? The Government does not pay the man who builds the wagons, the locomotives, or the stage-coaches. The interest of the Government is that the citizens shall get the mail, and if there is any doubt about the citizen getting the mail the Government will pay the man who carries it something extra to help him deliver it.

This bill does not propose to do that. It proposes to compel the man who carries the mail to buy the ship in which he carries it from somebody in this country who is going to charge him $100,000 more for that ship than he can buy it for elsewhere, and you are going to pay money out of the Treasury of the United States so as to make it an inducement to him to pay that hundred thousand dollars to the man who builds the ship in which he carries the mail more than the ship is worth and more than he is offered it for elsewhere; and you call that aiding in carrying the mails of the United States! If the real purpose is to aid in carrying the mails of the United States to the point that you desire to get the mails, and they are not amply provided for now, would it not be proper to give the man who is going to carry the mails the right to buy the ships cheaply just as you would allow any other mail-carrier to buy the cheapest wagon, the cheapest stage-coach, the cheapest railroad train, or the cheapest horse, and then put the money raised by taxation into the hands of the man who carries the mail and does the work for the Government? Instead of that this bill says, "No, we will not give anything for carrying our mails unless the mail-carrier will go to one of three or four firms on the Delaware or the Hudson and pay them 30 or 40 per cent. more for the thing with which you are going to carry it than it can be bought for elsewhere." You are subsidizing the wagon, the vehicle, and not subsidizing the men who carry the intelligence. That is all wrong.

But it is said again that if we allow our people to bring in free ships, while it is true we are building none now, we will break up an American trade. I have before me the report of Mr. Lynch, made in 1870, where exactly the same arguments were made that are made now, where the same logic was used, where the remedy proposed was that we should give subsidies. We gave subsidies to the Pacific mail, to the Brazilian mail, to Mr. Roach, Mr. Garrison, Mr. Irwin, and the others, and we should have had a great American marine built up long ago. Fourteen years have passed since then. We were carrying 33 per cent. of the American carrying trade then; we are now carrying 15½ per cent.

What did these subsidies amount to? Nothing. I have the speech before me now which I referred to the other day, made by Mr. Chandler, of Michigan—one of the ablest men we had in the Senate, and by no means purchasable with "British gold," the last man I suppose that anybody would have thought of buying; for if there was ever a man who wooled the British lion he was the man—in which he denounced the whole subsidy system, and declared that he was willing to vote for free ships at least for three years to allow our people to get a start. That speech can be found in the Globe of May 28, 1870. I hope gentlemen on the other side will read it, and I would especially commend it to one of the Senators from Maine. It ought to receive some consideration from him.

But the great argument at last seems to be that we are going to interfere with the coastwise trade by this amendment. Senators must recollect that the coastwise trade is an absolute monopoly. I do not propose to interfere with it in this bill; nobody does. We have agreed to an amendment to exclude it from all the provisions of the bill, but gentlemen still say you mean hereafter to do it. I confess that I regard the coastwise trade as a great wrong upon all the people of this country, except that it has this one quality, it does train some sailors. The only wars we shall ever have hereafter will be on the high seas, and we shall need the services of sailors, and we have sailors in training in the coastwise trade, and we have them nowhere else. We could not control smuggling, we could not control many things without a coastwise trade; therefore it has an advantage over many other of the protected interests in that regard. It is providing defenses for the country, and we can afford to pay for it. But when gentlemen talk, as was done the other day, about Mr. Roach beginning a poor man and now having a plant of $2,000,000, of other gentlemen who began poor and now are rich, and about this being a most prosperous trade, let me ask how can it be otherwise than prosperous? It is not only a monopoly, but it is a monopoly absolute. Other protected interests are not absolute, they are protected but they can be competed with. You do not prohibit a man from introducing a locomotive built in England, Germany, or France, or a machine of any kind. Men can get them at some price whenever the monopoly becomes too oppressive, but a foreign ship can not be bought at all.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BECK. Of course.

Mr. HALE. The Senator says he thinks the coastwise trade is unjust in itself and a wrong; that it is a great, I think he said gigantic, monopoly. Does the Senator know of a single section or branch of the coastwise trade of any importance worth considering where there are not rival American lines competing with each other in honest competition, in some cases two, three, four, half a dozen lines, thereby keeping the rates down at a low figure that nobody complains of? So far from the American coastwise trade being a monopoly as against the citizen, as against the shipper who ships his goods in the ships of the coastwise line, it is a business that is astir with competition in every branch and in every part and portion of it. If the Senator will examine he will be surprised to find how under this American competition the rates on the coastwise lines are all kept down, so that it is no monopoly as against the citizen and the shipper. The rates are regulated and there is in no way a monopoly from which anybody suffers.

Mr. BECK. Now, Mr. President, no ships can engage in that trade unless they are built in the United States. There are but five or six ship-yards in the United States along the Atlantic coast now building ships. Combinations between five or six establishments are very easy, and combination and not competition is the rule under which the coasting trade is carried on. Locomotives, as I said, can be brought from abroad if the manufacture here becomes a monopoly. Machinery and almost everything else can be built abroad; nothing is prohibited but the American ship. I believe obscene literature is; but the American ship is the only machine, the only instrumentality of commerce, that is absolutely prohibited. A ship-yard can not be built up in less than from one to three years, and when the monopoly at home becomes oppressive there can be no competition until some new concern springs up to build ships, and during all that period the monopoly is absolute when a combination is made.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I would ask the Senator why that exception has existed so long? What is the reason for it?

Mr. BECK. There is no sense in it. That is the best answer to that.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BECK. Very well.

Mr. FRYE. What does the Senator mean by saying that it takes from a year to three years to build a ship?

Mr. BECK. Because that is the fact.

Mr. FRYE. Why, Mr. President, William Cramp & Sons will take a contract to-day to build six.

Mr. BECK. The Senator did not hear my statement. I said that when the few ship-yards that are now in existence are in combination it would require that time to start a new man and a new business. That is a different proposition.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. As many as you like.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator and I were in the habit of considering statements in years past, and the question I put to him is this: The moment an American ship in the coastwise trade pays more than 6 per cent. profit is there anything in the law to prevent all the capital in the country going where more than 6 per cent. will be paid for it?

Mr. BECK. There is nothing in the law that prevents anybody from going into the coastwise trade.

Mr. DAWES. Then, one more question.

Mr. BECK. Let me answer.

Mr. DAWES. What is the monopoly? There is nothing in the law giving it.

Mr. BECK. I will tell the Senator now, and I hope I shall not be interrupted again till I give him the answer. I said that there are five or six ship-yards in the United States along the Atlantic coast that will build ships; that combination and not competition is the rule in carrying on this business now; that by combination among those five or six yards they can monopolize the building of the ships——

Mr. FRYE. Do they?

Mr. BECK. They do.

Mr. DAWES. Admit that——

Mr. BECK. Wait a minute; I am not through yet. Those ships after they are built are bought by certain combinations as well. The Old Dominion Company controls from Norfolk to Currituck and Albemarle; the Charleston line has a certain range; the Savannah line another; the Galveston line another; and doubtless there are others along the New England coast. Combinations among them are very easy; they can arrange what freights shall be. A discontented farmer or planter who knows that he is paying $3 a ton to get his goods to market when he is beyond the reach of a railroad, and is offered the hauling of those same goods by a German or English or French steamer to New York, Boston, or Philadelphia at $1 a ton instead of $3, can not employ that ship to haul his goods, and he can not in less than two years buy one to do it, and the monopoly is absolute by the combination of four or five companies until the man who lives beyond the range of a railroad all over the coast of the United States is compelled to pay from $1 to $5 per ton more than he is offered to have the same hauling done for him by foreign ships because those ships are not allowed to enter into the trade and he is not allowed to buy them from anybody, except one of three or four of the companies that are in combination with the companies that refuse to haul for him.

Mr. DAWES. If it is not the law that makes this monopoly——

Mr. BECK. The law——

Mr. DAWES. Wait a moment; the Senator will allow me to proceed. If it is not the law that makes this monopoly, but it is skill in combination, I should like to know why that monopoly can not be broken down as well by American capital as by foreign capital?

Mr. BECK. I deny the right of this Congress to give a few men the sole right to build ships for the people of this country.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Wait a moment. I deny the right of the legislative power to say to a man living along the coast of Virginia or North Carolina or South Carolina, who is raising his cotton, his corn, his cattle, his wheat, anything that he has to send abroad, that he shall not either hire or buy a vehicle to carry the wheat, the cattle, or the sugar that he raises to the market where he desires to send it, because Congress has seen fit to give to a few men the absolute power to build the ships, and that he shall not hire or have the hauling done.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me now?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; I will.

Mr. DAWES. It was not the constitutional power to make such a law as the Senator and myself were discussing. I understood the Senator to say that the law did not make the monopoly, and therefore whether the constitutional power to make the law did or did not exist is outside of the question. If the law does not make the monopoly but the monopoly arises from circumstances and combinations outside of the law, I pray the Senator to tell me what the law has to do with the combination?

Mr. BECK. The law that prevents a man from buying any vehicle necessary to carry his goods to market does him injustice. When the law gives a few men the sole right to build those vehicles which he must have or not get the goods to market it puts a man in the power of those few men, and when combinations of wealth parcel out to themselves the whole coast of the country so that nobody else can enter it, then he is at the mercy of that combination.

Now, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts, as he is asking me so many questions, if he was the owner of a thousand acres of public land anywhere on the Atlantic coast so far from a railroad that he could not haul his goods there, whether they were cotton, sugar, wheat, or corn, and he was not allowed either to buy or hire a ship to haul them unless he hired or bought it from one or two men, would he not regard that this Government that passed such a law as to make that condition possible had discriminated against him and in favor of the men who had those privileges? Will he be kind enough to tell me what he thinks of that?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator says when the law gives to a few men the absolute and controlling power to build all the ships it provides a condition of things which he asks me if I would tolerate. I have only to ask him to read the law which gives to a few men the exclusive right to build the ships that enter into the coastwise trade. I say to the Senator that, so far as I know the law, every man, woman, and child in the United States of America, with all the capital unemployed in these United States, can to-day build ships, and everybody else can use them, and everybody abroad can bring capital here and do the same thing. There is no monopoly in it, as the Senator from Maine has said. In the thing itself there is just this: There is a discrimination between our own citizens and foreigners, and that is what hurts the feelings of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. Ah, Mr. President, that last piece of meanness does not excuse the Senator from Massachusetts for failing to answer my question, and with all the coaching of his colleague it is a cunning evasion. The man who raises a bushel of wheat has a right to build a railroad, but a bushel of wheat will not enable him to build it. The law says that nobody but American ship-builders shall build ships, and when the coastwise trade will only employ so many and that trade is occupied, the man who raises a bushel of wheat is as effectually excluded as if he had been prohibited, and no amount of ingenuity can induce the people to believe otherwise. I asked a plain question of the Senator from Massachusetts and he was very careful to avoid it and only had to intimate and insinuate and tell the people of Massachusetts that failing to answer a plain, honest, fairly put question, I was operating in the interest of foreigners against the American people. I have as much at heart the interest of this people as he has, and I was about to say—I will not—I would despise myself if I were capable of insinuating that the Senator from Massachusetts was working in the interest of anybody.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator thinks——

Mr. BECK. I will not yield any more. I ask the Senator to take his seat. Whenever an unworthy fling is made at me I yield no further.

Mr. DAWES. Why, Mr. President, I have only to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky declines to yield.

Mr. BECK. I decline to yield. When a Senator says to me that I am making suggestions against the interests of the people of America I will yield no further to him; but I will yield to anybody else.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BECK. I will.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Senator to base his statement of monopoly upon the fact that ship-building is confined to four or five iron-ship yards on the coast.

Mr. BECK. Practically.

Mr. ALLISON. Practically. I had supposed—and there is where I desire him to set me right if I am not correct—that in our coastwise trade there were engaged a large number of wooden ships built by our wooden-ship builders. I ask him if he has taken that into his account?

Mr. BECK. I understood the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to say the other day that in one establishment in Maine they built more wooden ships than all the others put together. I was speaking of ships engaged in modern commerce, the instrumentalities now in use.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that more than half of our entire coastwise trade is conducted in wooden ships.

Mr. BECK. Let me make another suggestion just here. The little ships that we are building are not the kind of ships used in modern commerce. The annual report of the Register of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, on page 155, shows that all the licensed tonnage we are building averages under twelve tons. Of course that does not go abroad. The average registered steam tonnage, not enrolled but registered—the American steam tonnage now in existence, as may be seen on page 157 of the Register's report, averages under two hundred and seventy tons. Two hundred and seventy tons is the average of the steam registered tonnage of the United States.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator yield to me one moment?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator remember that I read a list myself the other day of over fifty iron steamships averaging 2,000 tons apiece that are in the coastwise trade?

Mr. BECK. The average, if the Senator will observe, on page 157 of the report of the Register of the Treasury, is two hundred and seventy tons, and only 12 per cent., as pages 8 and 9 will show, of the steam tonnage of the United States is registered.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. It is getting late, and if he desires to finish this afternoon I shall not interpose.

Mr. BECK. I had no beginning-point and no finishing-point, and therefore would as soon stop now as anywhere else.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, but if he wishes to discuss the question further I wish to move an executive session in order to give him an opportunity to finish to-morrow.

Mr. BECK. I can do it as well to-morrow.

Mr. FRYE. Before that is done I desire to see if some arrangement can not be made.

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a single question. Is the coastwise trade a protected trade?

Mr. ALLISON. Tolerably well protected.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then if it is a protected trade what difference does it make whether you have an iron ship or any other kind of a ship? What answer is it to the Senator from Kentucky to say that wooden ships are in the coastwise trade?

Mr. ALLISON. No answer at all, except to show him, as I endeavored to do, that the monopoly of four or five iron ship-builders could not affect the prices with reference to the cost of transacting our coastwise business.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to submit a few remarks before the debate closes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Indiana that the Senator from Kentucky gave way for a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thought the Senator from Kentucky had concluded.

Mr. BECK. I will give the Senator from Indiana a chance to make his speech.

Mr. FRYE. There are several appropriation bills, I understand—two at any rate—that are pressing to be heard. Now, this bill has been discussed generally for several days under the movement of the Senator from Kentucky, who objected to my proposition to consider it by sections. I am exceedingly anxious to bring the discussion to a close and have a vote upon the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow at 3 o'clock general debate may close and that we may vote upon the amendments and the bill.

Mr. BECK. I have only this remark to make. I do not know that I shall speak any more; I do not know that I shall speak ten minutes, if I do at all; but I will not consent to debate being cut off on a bill of this importance at any time. I am entirely willing that the agricultural appropriation bill shall be passed in five minutes and the Indian appropriation bill in an hour, but I do not know any more important subject the Senate can consider than this bill. I believe that the proper course is to take up the House bill and so far amend the House bill as the Senate may see fit to amend it, and let whatever bill is passed upon this subject become a law, if we can. I do not believe that can be done in two or three hours.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Kentucky accord to me the usual courtesy accorded to a Senator in charge of a bill and allow me to manage it?

Mr. BECK. I will; but I will expect the courtesy allowed to a Senator to make any suggestion he pleases as to how he would like to vote upon a bill; and when the Senator asks unanimous consent to have a vote at 3 o'clock upon this bill when there is a House bill that can become a law if properly amended, I will claim the privilege of endeavoring to do something practical instead of something impractical.

Mr. FRYE. I had the House bill laid on the table when it came over here from the House for the very purpose of moving when, in my judgment, as the Senator having this bill in charge, the proper time had arrived to take up the House bill.

Mr. BECK. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Kentucky has made two extended and very excellent speeches on this present bill or the general aspect of the whole question. Now I hope he will not object to a time being fixed to-morrow for taking the vote.

Mr. HALE. Will my colleague let me suggest an amendment?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. Or rather make a suggestion which amends his proposition. It is that the general debate close at 3 o'clock to-morrow, taking the bill up on the close of the morning business, which will give nearly three hours for general debate, and that after that it be considered under the five-minute rule, and that a vote finally be taken some time during the session to-morrow. I make this suggestion with the view of getting the bill out of the way. I have an appropriation bill myself in charge that I desire to get through; but this bill has run so long that I think it will be economy of the time of the Senate to let it now be finished before projecting any appropriation bill, for if you cut it short now and let it rest and take it up by and by, there will only be renewed and extended debate, and I think it will be better to finish it now. I hope we can finish it to-morrow. It seems to me by letting the general debate run to 3 o'clock perhaps and probably everybody desiring to speak longer than five minutes will be able to do so, and we shall get it out of the way to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that debate upon this bill cease at 3 o'clock to-morrow——

Mr. FRYE. I modify my proposition as suggested by my colleague.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say a word in that connection. The inability of the Senator from Kentucky to agree to that arrangement puts it somewhat under his own control, as we adjourn with that Senator on the floor. I have been so unfortunate as to twice misunderstand that he had yielded the floor. I should like to know whether he will occupy all the time of the debate to-morrow?

Mr. BECK. I shall behave quite as well as the Senator from Indiana did in the last great debate that was up.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not know what the Senator alludes to at all.

Mr. HALE. I think there will be no objection to the proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. BECK. I object.

Mr. VANCE. I object.

Mr. LOGAN. I think Senators will be in better humor probably when we meet to-morrow. Therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator delay the motion a minute?

Mr. FRYE. I desire to give notice that I shall endeavor—at any rate I shall ask the Senate to conclude this bill to-morrow.

Mr. VOORHEES. I object to anything on this subject unless I know how the time is to be occupied to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate certain House bills for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1798) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, was read twice by its title.

Mr. FARLEY. I ask that the House bill just read lie on the table for the present without being referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks that this House bill lie on the table. If there be no objection, that will be the order.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 1042) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah Sinfield;

A bill (H. R. 2425) granting a pension to Catharine Henry;

A bill (H. R. 2447) for the relief of Catharine Terry;

A bill (H. R. 2480) granting a pension to Margaret Kearns;

A bill (H. R. 4189) granting a pensions to Caroline Van Norton;

A bill (H. R. 4191) granting a pension to Jane Bracken;

A bill (H. R. 5364) granting a pension to William H. Whitcomb.

UNIVERSITY OF MEDICINE.

Mr. CALL. I desire to give notice that at the close of the morning hour on Thursday I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to submit some remarks on the bill (S. 1044) to establish a university of medicine at the capital of the United States, in the District of Columbia, for the advancement of science, and the discovery of improved methods of treatment and cure of disease, pending before the Committee on Education and Labor, and will ask that the committee be discharged from the consideration of the bill for the purpose of submitting those remarks.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LOGAN. I renew my motion.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say to the Senate, especially the Senator from Indiana, that I asked no agreement; I simply gave notice that I should endeavor to have this bill acted upon to-morrow some time.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I ask that my motion be put.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, May 5, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. DUNN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6870) to exclude the public lands in Arkansas from the operation of the laws relating to mineral lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a portion of the proceedings of the House on last Saturday afternoon.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENSIGN L. K. REYNOLDS.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire now to ask the House to do a graceful act of kindness which I have two or three times before endeavored to have done. It is to pass a joint resolution of the Senate to allow Ensign L. K. Reynolds to accept a medal from the Government of Austria for an act of humanity. He has left our shores on the expedition for the relief of Lieutenant Greely and his party, but if we pass this resolution now he can be reached by telegraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will not do that in the absence of gentlemen who have heretofore objected.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have made my arrangements with those gentlemen. The gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY] has consented that the joint resolution be taken up.

Mr. WELLER. I have withdrawn my objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that my friend, after a moment's reflection, will see the impropriety of calling this matter up in the absence of gentlemen who have objected to it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have made my arrangements with them, and they are perfectly content. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY] was here a short time ago.

Mr. WELLER. I saw him.

Mr. HOLMAN. I regret exceedingly to interpose an objection. I am thoroughly and heartily opposed to resolutions of this kind, but still I would not object if gentlemen were present who heretofore have objected to this particular joint resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday afternoon I consulted with some gentlemen who had the Chinese bill in their charge and understood that it would probably not be finished before the end of the day; and as I was not well and supposed there would be no other business transacted, I went home. Just at the close of the day's session, when a motion had been made by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the House adjourn, upon which motion there was developed a vote of 10 in favor and 21 against, there being thirty-one members present, the proceedings which I have caused to be read took place. During the course of the proceedings, as appears by the RECORD, it was stated by my old friend from New York [Mr. COX], "I have made my arrangements with those gentlemen"—that is, gentlemen who had objected to the measure.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this House will certainly see that, while I do not wish any undue prominence in this matter, I had been quite as prominent as any other member on the floor in objecting to the measure, believing it to be wrong, believing that no man who supports and defends the Constitution can vote for that resolution. I think I could go before the Supreme Court of the United States and sustain this declaration that no man who fully supports the Constitution can vote for that joint resolution.

The Constitution of the United States, in reference to this subject, provides two things—and let me say I am not going to make a speech; I shall be very brief; I do not mean to impose upon the House. If allowed to proceed, I shall be through in two or three minutes, but if not I shall occupy an hour, for I have here a resolution which would give me the floor for that time; but I shall get through this statement in a very few moments.

I say the Constitution of the United States provides, first, that "no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States," not even with the consent of Congress; and second, that no person holding office under the United States shall accept any present from any king, prince, or foreign state.

Now, this joint resolution proposes to confer a title of nobility, clear and perfect. I have here the report made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] who is engineering the measure. From this report I read the declaration of the Austrian minister:

Preliminary, confidential, and verbal application having been made concerning that question to the Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Mr. Hunt had declared that the United States Senate would have to grant that permission by special act; that such permission would undoubtedly be given considering the circumstances of the case, and that the Department saw no objection to Lieutenant Reynolds being made a knight of the I. and R. order aforesaid.

"A knight of the imperial and royal order aforesaid!" Was ever anything plainer than that this is a title of nobility? And any member who may vote for it ought to get on his knees before the Almighty and pray forgiveness for having committed perjury; for every member here has taken the oath which, Mr. Speaker, you administered to me "to support and defend the Constitution of the United States."

There are to-day a million of Democratic voters looking at this question. They believe it to be of more importance than any tariff discussion that you can get up; and it will have more influence in the next election. Monarchy and its tendencies here must be put down. That is the first thing in order whether we shall have a tariff or not, the Constitution providing that we shall confer no title of nobility.

Now the gentleman from New York says the Austrian minister has written him a letter on this subject. He seems to be particularly interested in it. All the dudism of this city is in favor of this theory. A young lady, coming home to my neighborhood from New Orleans, after learning I was opposing it, would scarcely speak to me because of my barbarism in adhering to my oath to the Constitution. Men, women, and children are running around here and doing more to carry this thing through than they would do for their eternal salvation. [Laughter and applause.]

What is this all about? If this young man wants honors I will give him a vote of thanks of this House which will entitle him to the floor of the House. I will give him preferment to be rear-admiral; I will introduce a resolution to that effect and advocate it if necessary. But I wish these American officers to love their own mother and to be satisfied with the institutions of their own country, and not to go fishing after these foreign baubles. I wish them to attend to their own country's business and to obey the laws of their own land. If they wish to fish for honors let them cast their lines in the clear waters of American lakes and into our own sparkling streams, and not go bobbing for eels in foreign mud. [Laughter and applause.]

It is said here that I made an agreement with the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to withdraw my opposition to this joint resolution. I did no such thing. The memories of old times with my friend from New York are too strong, of many battle-fields where we stood shoulder to shoulder, to allow me to say one unkind word to him. I have only risen to say if one rose from the dead I would not withdraw my objection to this the strongest evidence we have of the downward career in which we are going toward the perdition of monarchy. I would not withdraw my opposition if all the illustrious dead who sleep on the hillsides of Arlington should rise from their graves and request me to do so. I did not withdraw my objection nor make any arrangement to do so; no, sir; I want my objection to stand.

I stop a gentleman passing me at this instant in the aisle—I speak of my honored friend from the Utica district [Mr. SPRIGGS]—in order to say that before this thing was brought up on Saturday he spoke to me to withdraw my opposition, and he named an eminent clergyman for whom I would travel from this city to New York afoot, as indeed I would for my friend from the Utica district, but I told him then I would not withdraw my opposition.

Now, I have made my explanation. I will not say a single unkind word of my friend from New York [Mr. COX]; but I am misrepresented, and dare not stand before this republican country in the attitude of being in favor of these monarchical tendencies. This is only a pioneer measure. There are fifteen or twenty others coming after, all clamoring for foreign decorations. I am opposed to them. I might quote, with very little change of words, from Oliver Wendell Holmes the language of our country to her gallant young officers seeking worthless titles from foreign despots:

> Come back to your mother, ye children, for shame!
> Who have wandered abroad after baubles of fame;
> With a smile on her face and a sprig in her cap
> She calls you to feast from her bountiful lap.

[Applause.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not really know whether my good friend is in earnest or not; or whether he wishes to display some of that rare rhetoric for which he is so justly celebrated.

In reference to this bill I think anybody would excuse the anxiety I had to have it passed on last Saturday afternoon. The beneficiary, Ensign Reynolds, had gone to the polar region on the Greely relieving expedition. He was to land and did land at Saint John's, en route to the Arctic. There we might have reached him by telegraph with this elegant courtesy.

So far as misrepresenting my friend here, there was no such intention. It was done in the presence, as I supposed, of two gentlemen who had objected. They were present in the House. They had a right to object, as they had objected before. They did not object, as I had an arrangement with them, to allow me to present the bill. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] withdrew his objection as he will tell you, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY] kindly said to me he had no objection to have the matter brought up and disposed of, provided I would state it was a matter of humanity and that there was no hereditary nobility in the decoration. This I did state. Gentlemen who are absent can not object, or continue previous objections. So that in my statement I did not have my colleague in my mind.

Now, the gentleman from New York, my colleague, argues that this is a title of nobility which is proposed for Ensign Reynolds. I am just informed by my German friend from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] that all over Germany there are knights, so called, of various orders which are not orders of nobility. This "Royal and Imperial Order of Francis Joseph," according to the statement of the Austrian minister, is one of this order. No one in Austria or Hungary believes that such orders are orders of nobility. They are not inhibited by our Constitution. They carry no titular privileges. This order is merely the title of an organization to reward merit. In this country there are certain orders of so-called knighthood. For instance, there are the Knights of Pythias and the Knights of St. Patrick. To this latter order my distinguished friend from New York himself belongs. [Laughter.] There is no knighthood about them, in the sense in which he fancies or discusses the matter.

So far as this matter is concerned, our fathers, in the Constitution, took it into consideration. In section 9, article 1, of that instrument it is declared that "no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state."

Thus provision was made to meet any case of "present emolument or title." This clause required that the consent of Congress must first be had before our citizens accept such decorations from foreign governments. The reason for this clause has gone by; but still we comply with the constitutional obligation, as in this case. In the present case this is only a badge of humanity. It is a recognition of gallant devotion. Congress has already, through the life-saving statute, given Ensign Reynolds more than thanks. He has one medal already.

I see my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] before me. He will concur in my statement, and his Democratic dislike of royalty and nobility will not be questioned. Into this question he has himself had occasion to look closely. When I was chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House and he chairman of the same committee of the Senate I reported some twelve or thirteen several bills allowing our citizens to accept decorations. They passed here, they went to the Senate and met the concurrence of my friend from Connecticut. He recommended the passage of them all, in a general bill covering all such orders and decorations, and which disallowed their display in public. That is now the law. There was no objection to it from any member of the American Democracy. I would rather take his judgment as to what is genuine, old-fashioned State-rights Democratic-Republicanism than the opinion even of my distinguished friend and colleague from New York, or the opinion of any other member.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Ask him if he is in favor of this thing.

Mr. COX, of New York. I know he is in favor of it, without asking him.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. He has not so stated.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is not necessary. I know his views by his action here.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. The gentleman ought not to argue on a false basis.

Mr. COX, of New York. When it comes to debating the question I will meet my friend in a proper way.

He is not opposed, of course, I presume, to granting certain medals for life-saving service. He can not oppose the life-saving system in this country. I have had something to do with that system myself. I still feel the same interest in it as one may feel in his offspring, since I got from this generous House the first appropriation here, some years ago, of $10,000 for establishing a patrol system on the Jersey coast. Since the reorganization of this service in 1871 we have saved 18,334 lives and $23,937,529 worth of property. Have we not cause to feel proud of that service? If there be any exultation in this Congressional life—over any legislative achievement—I would prefer to every other service the part I have taken in organizing our life-saving institution. The giving of medals to our heroes of the sea, lake, gulf, and river, who have risked their own lives for the lives of others, is beyond all other decorations. In this case the honor is enhanced; for the decorative medal is for saving life almost in mid-ocean instead of on our own shores. It is given by a great government for the rescue of eleven of its citizens in the waters of the Azores. In this it is in harmony with our other life-saving legislation.

Our Life-Saving Service, Mr. Speaker, knows no nationality. It is world-wide in its humanities. It saves the life of the Irishman as well as that of the Englishman. No race is alien before its kind offices. It questions no one as to his nationality. I believe in the doctrine that in this as in other regards we should make no invidious discriminations.

Our broad, impartial law blots out all lines of caste. The sacredness of human life is the very genius of this benevolent system. It is worthy of the verse of the Quaker poet:

Still to a stricken brother true,
Whatever clime hath nurtured him;
As stooped to heal the wounded Jew,
The worshiper of Gerizim.

It recognizes, beneath "all disguise, form, place, or name, the man within"—

On man as man, retaining yet,
Howe'er debased, or soiled, or dim,
The crown upon his forehead set,
The immortal gift of God to him."

This young man, Ensign Reynolds, made no discrimination when he leaped into the sea and saved the lives of eleven Hungarians on the bark Olivo. He had no thought about who he saved when, to rescue human life, he braved the elements in the midst of a hurricane. It is for this heroic conduct that he has been honored the world over by societies here and abroad, and especially by the Austrian-Hungarian Government, which has sent this medal in recognition of his unexampled gallantry. It is but a small tribute to the humanity of this naval officer, whom I have never had the pleasure to know, and I think the objection is the most microscopical that could be devised by the human mind.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I want to say a word in reply.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this subject does not present a question of privilege.

Mr. PAYSON. I demand the regular order.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. My name has become connected with this question in such a way that I feel warranted in securing the attention of the House to explain why I had made objection to a consideration of this resolution a few days ago, but since that time have withdrawn my objections thereto. I made my objection in the first instance because I hated monarchy, because I hated every condition, word, or deed that had for its object or purpose the indorsement or establishment of anything monarchical in form or character, such as we find in the Eastern continents. I am opposed to-day to being a party to receiving for any American citizen any token of autocratic royalty which can be construed into an indorsement of the system of government that I hate, but I was importuned by my genial friend from New York [Mr. COX] to remove my objection on the ground that the granting of this medal was purely a question of an award for meritorious, valorous conduct in rescuing lives under circumstances of great peril. To this I could have no objection. I did not remove my objections because I wanted this Congress to grant any favoritism to a monarchical government or to a subject thereof or of this Government, but an award for meritorious conduct in such a case is different. I should not have removed my objection if I had believed for a moment——

Mr. KEIFER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEIFER. I have no objection to the gentleman stating his views upon a subject of that kind when it is properly before this House, but I must object to his doing so on the pretense that it is a question of privilege. I make the point of order that no question of privilege is involved in this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no matter of privilege involved.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. On the point of order I wish to be heard for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is not made against the gentleman from New York but against the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to speak on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read. In order to facilitate the transaction of the public business and prevent its interruption by irrelevant matters, it is absolutely necessary to enforce strictly the provisions of this rule. The Clerk will read Rule IX.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE IX.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of members individually in their representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess.

The SPEAKER. That is the rule, and the Chair thinks that in the interests of orderly legislation this rule should be strictly enforced whenever the point of order is made under it.

Mr. WELLER. Will the Speaker grant me permission to speak to the point of order?

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. Has not the Speaker already decided this question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided it.

Mr. PAYSON. Is it debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not except by unanimous consent.

Mr. PAYSON. Then I make the point of order that the regular order should be proceeded with.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded, which is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

SPECIAL EMBASSY FROM SIAM.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the regular order, that I may make a report.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded by several gentlemen on both sides. Is the demand for the regular order insisted on? If it is not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN].

The regular order was not insisted on.

Mr. WASHBURN. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report for immediate consideration a joint resolution appropriating $10,000 to defray the expenses of the visit of the special embassy of Siam to the United States. I also send to the desk to be read a letter from the President of the United States and a letter from the Secretary of State on the subject of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WELLER. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN. I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection until the letters from the President and the Secretary of State can be read.

Mr. WELLER. I wish to say that I care no more for the President of the United States than I do for the gentleman from Minnesota himself, and I object.

Mr. WASHBURN. I will only say that the resolution is unanimously reported by the Committee on Appropriations, and is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRINTING OF EVIDENCE.

Mr. COBB. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report certain testimony taken by that committee in the investigation of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship-Canal Company, and I move that the evidence be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—O'FERRALL VS. PAUL.

Mr. LOWRY. On behalf of the Committee on Elections I desire to call attention to the contested election of O'Ferrall against Paul, from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia. It will be remembered that on Friday last I gave notice to the House, at the instance of the Committee on Elections, that that case would be called up for action to-day. It is my duty, however, to state that at a meeting of the committee this morning the question was brought to their attention as to whether or not the minority of that committee had had sufficient opportunity to prepare their views for presentation to the House, and upon a suggestion made that a sufficient opportunity had not been afforded for that purpose the committee passed an advisory resolution that the matter be not pressed on the attention of the House to-day, and as a result of that an accommodation was had by which the gentlemen representing the views of the minority agreed that the case might be taken up on Wednesday morning. It was insisted by myself that the matter was not under the control of the committee, that it had passed from our control, and that it was properly a matter for consideration in the House; and in pursuance of the notice heretofore given, I now desire to call that case up for present consideration. I ask for the reading of the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY], from the Committee on Elections, in pursuance of notice heretofore given, calls up for consideration the contested-election case of O'Ferrall vs. Paul, from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I am authorized by the Committee on Elections to state that it is the sense of that committee that this case should not be called up prior to Wednesday morning. The majority report was filed on the 30th of April, but did not come to this House until last Saturday morning. That was the first opportunity the minority of the committee had to examine it, and since that time it has been examined. A minority report has been prepared, which will be filed to-day. In accordance with the sense of the committee I ask that the case be laid over at least until Wednesday, and I ask the gentleman from Indiana to agree to that.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I wish to ask if the minority of the committee have not had as much time for the preparation of their report as the majority?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. In reply to the gentleman from Virginia I will state the views of the majority of the committee were submitted to the full committee some two weeks ago; but when the gentleman from Indiana, who was authorized to make the majority report, prepared it, he gave me notice that he had materially changed the basis of his report.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I will state to the gentleman that makes no difference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. The minority of the committee found it was impossible to make a report until they had had an opportunity of seeing what the views of the majority were. They were not the same views that were presented to the committee. The resolutions were the same, but the basis upon which the conclusions were arrived at were different. I make this suggestion in accordance with the sense of the Committee on Elections, only one vote being in opposition thereto. I think the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw the calling up of the case at this time on the understanding that it will come up on Wednesday morning.

Mr. LOWRY. Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] make some reference to myself? I did not hear what he said.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. My statement was that I hoped the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY], in view of the informal action of the Committee of Elections, would withdraw his request for the present consideration of this election case, with the understanding that it should come up on next Wednesday morning.

Mr. LOWRY. While otherwise I would be very glad to acquiesce and would do so cheerfully on the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER], yet under the circumstances I do not feel at liberty to do so. I have stated to the House the action had this morning by the Committee of Elections. The view that was entertained by that committee was that as a matter of courtesy to the minority it would be proper that they should have an opportunity of seeing the report of the majority before the views of the minority were prepared. I do not understand, however, that that is in accordance with the custom and practice of this House; but that on the contrary the usage or practice has been for the majority to prepare its report and for the minority to prepare their views contemporaneously, and they are brought simultaneously before the House for its action.

Now, applying that rule to this case, the question having been fully canvassed before the committee, the report of the subcommittee having been presented to the full committee some six weeks ago, the full committee took action upon it and adopted the report of the subcommittee. Another case was pending, perhaps more than one, involving some of the same points that are involved in this case. In view of the fact that the case of Massey against Wise was about to be argued, a proposition was made that the report in the case of O'Ferrall against Paul should not be made to the House until after argument had been heard in the case of Massey against Wise.

A limitation was imposed, however, upon that proposition in order that it might not continue this case indefinitely, and the period of suspension was limited to three weeks. That time having expired, some of the members of the committee were still anxious that this case should not be presented to the House until the other case was acted upon by the committee, and in order to obviate any clash between the two cases it was determined upon the part of the majority of the committee to have the report in the case of O'Ferrall against Paul revised, so as to predicate the determination of the case on a point which did not arise and could not arise in the case of Massey against Wise.

That revision having been made, the report was submitted to the House in regular order and brought in here last Saturday morning in printed form, and notice was given that the case would be called up today. Now, according to the usage and practice of the House, as I understand, the case would properly come up for action this morning. According to usage it is not required that the minority of the committee should have an opportunity of inspecting and undertaking to reply to the report of the majority. On the contrary it was expected that they would prepare their views contemporaneously with the preparation of the majority report, though, as I have stated, it was the opinion of the committee that the minority should have an opportunity to prepare their report before the case is called up.

Under these circumstances, and being importuned on all hands by those who feel that the contestant in this case has a right to be seated, and in view of the further fact that a vacancy has existed in the representation of this district for several months past, Judge Paul having resigned upon being appointed to the United States court, and the governor of Virginia having called no election since the resignation of Judge Paul—in view of these and other considerations there is a great anxiety upon the part of those who feel that the district ought to be represented and that Judge O'Ferrall is entitled to the seat that the case shall be acted upon by the House this morning. I therefore feel it is my duty to insist upon action in the case at this time.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I have very great sympathy with the anxiety of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] to have this vacant seat filled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there is nothing before the House now for debate. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] called up the election case in question; the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] suggested an arrangement by which it should go over until Wednesday next. The only question seems to be whether or not an arrangement can be arrived at. The question of consideration has not been raised.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I raise that question now.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I desire to make a suggestion on the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. That is not debatable, but the Chair will hear the gentleman if there is no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it nothing more than proper that the chairman of the Committee on Elections should be permitted to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has said that the gentleman will be heard, if there is no objection.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I desire simply to say that there is a certain courtesy always due to the minority of the House and to the minority of a committee. I think that under the circumstances stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] the minority of the committee ought to have the privilege of presenting their views and having them printed before this case is called up for consideration.

Mr. LOWRY. I think I was somewhat misapprehended by the Chair. In accordance with the statement made by myself to the committee as to the course of action my sense of duty would prompt in the matter I moved that the case be taken up for present consideration. This was with the view of leaving the matter to the determination of the House. I have stated, I think, explicitly the action taken by the committee, as it has been stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], the distinguished chairman of the committee. With the view of discharging my duty, and at the same time bringing the matter before the House, I have made my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he understood the gentleman to decline to accede to the arrangement suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER], which of course would bring the matter before the House, unless the question of consideration were raised. That question is now raised——

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now proceed to consider the contested-election case of O'Ferrall vs. Paul?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 91, noes 70.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 141, nays 98, not voting 83; as follows:

So the House decided to proceed with the consideration of the case.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. WOOD with Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, until the 10th instant.

Mr. MUTCHLER with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania, until the 6th instant.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. CHACE, on all political questions except tariff until further notice.

The following were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. JONES, of Alabama, with Mr. JOHNSON.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, with Mr. VALENTINE.

Mr. GRAVES with Mr. BRIETUNG.

Mr. DORSHEIMER with Mr. MOREY.

Mr. REAGAN with Mr. HOWEY.

Mr. HEMPHILL with Mr. YORK.

Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York, with Mr. CULBERTSON, of Kentucky.

Mr. RIGGS with Mr. KELLOGG.

Mr. BENNETT with Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. PAYNE.

Mr. BELMONT with Mr. BARR.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, with Mr. MCKINLEY.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. HANBACK.

Mr. MULDROW with Mr. GOFF.

The following were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. COX, of New York, with Mr. BELFORD.

Mr. TUCKER with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY], whom I do not now see in his seat.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolutions reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John Paul was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-eighth Congress from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia, and was not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That Charles T. O'Ferrall was duly elected as a Representative from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia to the Forty-eighth Congress, and is entitled to his seat as such.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I want in time, Mr. Speaker, to offer a substitute for those which have been read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be considered the substitute is pending. The gentleman refers of course to the resolution reported by the minority of the committee.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be considered as pending.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I ask for the reading of the report in this case, and shall also at the conclusion of its reading ask that the views of the minority be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report made by the Committee on Elections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LOWRY, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Elections, having fully considered this case, after mature deliberation, report as follows:

Charles T. O'Ferrall and John Paul were opposing candidates for a seat in the Forty-eighth Congress from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia, the former the nominee of the Democratic party, the latter the nominee of the Readjuster or Coalition party, at the November election, 1882. The State board of canvassers made the following returns: For O'Ferrall 11,941; for Paul 12,146; leaving a majority of 205 votes for Mr. Paul.

The latter received the certificate, but never qualified, and sent in his resignation to the governor in August, 1883, on being appointed to the bench of the United States court. No special election having been ordered, the seat has been during the session, and is now, vacant. The record in the case covers about 800 pages, and much of the testimony is irrelevant. We find that 676 votes were cast for the contestee (Paul) in the county of Albemarle, in this district, by persons who were delinquent in payment of their capitation tax for 1881, of which number there is no fair pretense that, as to 557 of them, they had ever paid such capitation tax so as to entitle them to vote under the constitution of Virginia.

The first clause of Article III, section 1, of the constitution of Virginia was, at the date of the election, November 7, 1882, as follows:

"Every male citizen of the United States 21 years old who shall have been a resident of the State twelve months, and of the county, city, or town in which he shall offer to vote three months next preceding any election, and shall have paid to the State before the day of election the capitation tax required by law for the preceding year shall be entitled to vote for members of the general assembly and all officers elected by the people."

Article X, section 5, was and is as follows:

"The general assembly may levy a tax not exceeding $1 per annum on every male citizen who has attained the age of 21 years, which shall be applied exclusively in aid of public free schools; and counties and corporations shall have power to impose a capitation tax, not exceeding 50 cents per annum for all purposes."

Section 5 of an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, entitled "An act for the assessment of taxes on persons, property," &c., approved April 22, 1882, and in force at the time of said election, is as follows:

"Upon every male person, as classified in this schedule, over the age of 21 years, not exempt for bodily infirmity, there shall be a tax of $1 for public free-school purposes."—Virginia Revenue Laws, 1882, page 45.

We base our conclusion that 676 votes were cast by persons delinquent in the payment of their capitation taxes in Albemarle for contestee, and that 557 of these were clearly illegal, upon the following facts:

By section 57, chapter 33, of the Code of Virginia, the commissioners of the revenue were required to state in their assessment-lists the color of all male inhabitants over the age of 21 years. The treasurer, in making his return of delinquents to the auditor of public accounts, gave the color of all delinquents in accordance with the commissioners' books. So that the white delinquents were classified in one list and the colored in another list.

The contestant filed certified copies of the delinquent-lists (white and colored) of Albemarle County. (Record, 75-91.)

These lists showed the names and color of all delinquents for the year 1881—the year for which the capitation tax was required to be paid before the day of the election in question.

There is contention between the parties as to whether the auditor of public accounts of Virginia could appoint certain collectors of delinquent taxes, and whether these collectors and their deputies could then legally collect these delinquent capitation taxes.

Assuming for the purposes of this case that the auditor of public accounts could appoint collectors of delinquent taxes, and that these collectors could appoint deputies (both of which questions are held in reserve), then, under the law, the clerks of the county and corporation courts of the Commonwealth and the special collectors appointed by the auditor and their deputies were the only parties by whom receipts could be issued for delinquent capitation taxes in the various counties and cities.

The principal question on which we rest this case is whether certain tax receipts issued by these collectors (so called) and their deputies were issued without being paid for.

The contestant, to show the number of receipts issued and to whom by both the clerk of Albemarle and special collector, filed a certified list of the names of delinquents for 1881, to whom receipts had been issued by the clerk of Albemarle County. (See record, 73-75.)

After thus ascertaining the names of these parties who had clerk's receipts it followed as a necessary consequence that all delinquents who voted whose names were not on the clerk's list voted on the collector's receipts. Then to ascertain what delinquent voters cast their votes, and upon whose receipts, it was only necessary to compare the poll-books of the county with the delinquent-lists.

Contestant introduced a witness (record, 71) who testified—and whose testimony remained uncontradicted—that he had compared the clerk's list with the poll-books and had designated all the delinquents who voted on the clerk's receipts by the letters "H. B. B." opposite their names on the delinquent-lists; that he then designated all the delinquents who voted and who did not have the clerk's receipts by the name of the precinct at which they voted opposite their name on the delinquent-lists. It was thus found that 676 delinquents voted who did not have the clerk's receipt, and presuming that the judges of election did their duty and required the production of receipts, as required by law, these 676 voted on the collector's receipts. Of this number 655 were colored.

James T. Wayland, a strong and active partisan of the contestee, was appointed a special tax collector of delinquent taxes for Albemarle County by the auditor of public accounts, who belonged to the same party as the contestee, and was a State canvasser of that party. This special tax collector appointed persons whom he called deputies in said county; he issued unlimited numbers of blank receipts for delinquent capitation taxes to these so-called deputies, who were all partisans of the contestee, and these deputies filled these receipts without receiving any money, and delivered them to the voters. These deputies paid no money to the collector for the receipts at any time, either before or after the election; the collector only received, and that in bulk, without being applied to individual cases, for all the receipts issued by him, $125 before the day of election. Each receipt issued represented $1.05, so that, even assuming that this $125 was a valid payment for so many receipts, the said sum of $125 only paid for 119 receipts. There were 676 votes cast upon the receipts issued by this special collector, so that after deducting said 119 receipts there were 557 votes cast upon collectors' receipts for which no money had been paid at the time the votes were cast, or before the day of election, as required by the constitution of Virginia, and therefore these 557 votes were illegal.

The system of appointing these special collectors was inaugurated for political purposes by the auditor of public accounts of the State, who belonged to the party of which the contestee was the nominee; all of his appointees were active partisans of his party, and in many instances the chairman or secretary of the county committee, or a member of the State committee of that party, or an United States internal-revenue officer.

For instance:

ALBEMARLE COUNTY.

(See deposition of James T. Wayland, collector. Record, 20.)

"Question 37th. Please state which of the candidates for Congress from this district you supported at the last election?

"Answer. Good God A'mighty, I thought everybody knew that—John Paul. Put that in great big letters.

"Question 38th. Were you not an active worker for and partisan of said John Paul?

"Answer. Yes; I was."

AUGUSTA COUNTY.

(See deposition of E. L. Curtis, collector. Record, 483.)

"1. Ques. What are your politics?

"Ans. I am a Republican; voted for Paul and Wise."

CITY OF STAUNTON.

(See deposition M. S. Cease, collector. Record, 472.)

"1. Ques. What are your politics, and for whom did you vote?

"Ans. I am a Republican, and voted for Wise and Paul."

BATH COUNTY.

(See deposition Thomas A. Colby, collector. Record, 226.)

"3d. Please state whether or not you voted at the election held on the 7th Nov., 1882; if yea, for whom did you vote?

"Ans. I did vote at said election, and for Wise and Paul.

"4th. Please state whether or not you hold any position of emolument, trust, or profit under the Federal Government; if so, what position.

"Ans. I do; I am district gauger for Alleghany, Bath, and Highland Counties."

FLUVANNA COUNTY.

(See deposition of A. Shepherd. Record, 258.)

"Quest. 3. Did John R. Haden occupy any official station in the organization of either of the political parties; and was he or not a partisan of either of the candidates at that election?

"Answer. He was county chairman of the Readjuster party, a warm friend of Paul and Wise, and he was also delinquent-tax collector."

Haden was the collector for this county.

GOOCHLAND COUNTY.

(See deposition of Dr. A. N. Johnston. Record, 275.)

"14th question. You stated that R. N. Turner, collector of delinquent taxes by appointment of the auditor of public accounts, was present at Snead's Store precinct on the day of election. Please state what part he took in said election then and there, and in the canvass preceding the same, for which party and candidate, and to what extent.

"Ans. Yes, he was present and was quite active in working for Wise and Paul. He issued the delinquent-tax receipts on the ground the day of election. He worked hard during the canvass for Wise and Paul, I think."

(See deposition of A. K. Grim, to whom the collector turned over the delinquent-lists and who issued receipts. Record, 654.)

"Ques. 2d. Were you not a partisan of Paul in the last Congressional election in this district; did you not exert yourself actively to secure his election; and are you not now chairman of the executive committee of the Readjuster party in this county?

"Ans. (1st) I was; (2d) I did; (3d) I am."

ROCKINGHAM COUNTY.

(See deposition of James Sullivan. Record, 319.)

"50. By same. State whether or not Mr. Davis was an active worker and partisan for Mr. Paul in said election.

"Ans. Mr. Davis was, I know, a supporter of the Readjuster ticket; he was an active supporter."

Davis was the collector for this county.

SHENANDOAH COUNTY.

(See deposition of R. L. Roberts, collector. Record, 352.)

"Q. 2. State whether or not you are a member of the State committee of the Readjuster party of the State of Virginia.

"Ans. Yes, sir."

These collectors appointed so-called deputies in pursuance of directions from the officers of the Readjuster party.

(See deposition of L. W. Bunch. Record, 49.)

"Quest. 4. Did you ever see any circular or printed letter of instructions, purporting to be issued and signed by William Mahone, chairman of the Readjuster Republican Coalition party of the State of Virginia; if so, in whose hand was such letter, and what was its purport?

"Ans. I was appointed a canvasser for the senatorial district of Albemarle and Green Counties by the Harrisonburgh convention which nominated Hon. John Paul. I was shown by Dr. John R. Wood a printed circular formulating a plan for the appointment of deputy collectors for each voting precinct for the State of Virginia, for the conducting of the campaign."

All of these so-called deputies were partisans of the contestee. (See Record, 20, 113, 118, 167, 247, 266, 268, 270, 311, 325, 328, 330, 333, 334, 339, 350, 352, 648.)

Receipts were only issued by these collectors and their so-called deputies to Readjuster or Coalition voters.

This system was inaugurated just before each election, and the duties of these collectors ceased immediately after. All the collectors were partisans of the contestee, and their so-called deputies were appointed in obedience to the directions of their leaders. The system was evidently administered, not for the interests of the revenue but as a political machine for the purpose of promoting the interests of the party of which the contestee was the nominee.

But apart from the presumption arising from these facts we refer to the following testimony:

ALBEMARLE COUNTY.

William H. Southall (record 25):

"Quest. 4. Who was said to be the deputy collector of James T. Wayland, the auditor's collector at Ivy?

"Ans. J. Snowden Wood.

"Quest. State whether or not you ever approached said J. Snowden Wood, and offered to pay a capitation tax of a voter, and asked him to give you a receipt therefor, and with what result and what he said.

"Ans. On the evening before the election a voter came to me at the Ivy precinct, and said he had not paid his taxes and had no tax ticket. I suggested to him to go to Mr. Wood, who I understood had Wayland tax tickets, and get one. He did so, but Wood declined to let him have one. I then went to Wood myself and requested that he would let me have one of his tickets, as I understood he had tickets; that I would pay him for it. He acknowledged he had tickets, but that he did not have more than he had use for, and refused to let me have one. The voter who came to me was a white voter, and I told J. Snowden Wood he was a Conservative or Democratic voter."

Wood was one of the collector's deputies. (Record, 19.)

N. C. McGee (record, 58) testified as follows:

"Quest. 5. Did any person offer to vote that day who said he had not paid his taxes, but whose name was on the delinquent-list, and who afterward produced a receipt? If so state circumstances fully.

"Ans. Yes, sir; there were two, I recollect now, Bob Harris and Charles Kenney; two negroes. But they were not allowed to vote. I objected seriously, and remarked to the judges that that was too thin; I could not stand that; the tickets were too easily made. The other white judge then took the colored one out and they had a little consultation. I don't know any further than this.

"Quest. 6 by same. State whether or not either of the judges of election went out with one of the last-mentioned negroes, after he first presented himself and said he had no receipt, and before he returned with a receipt; and if so, do you know where they went?

"Ans. One of the judges went out with Bob Harris. I don't know any further, where they went, what they did, or anything else. The judge who went out was Mr. Snowden Wood."

Wood was a deputy collector. (Record, 19.)

W. S. Coles (record, 68) testified as follows:

"Quest. 2 by same. Please state whether or not you have ever seen a capitation-tax receipt in the hands of any person who voted at Porter's last election, which receipt appeared from its face to have been filled up with the names of several voters successively; and, if so, in whose hands did you see it? What was said about the receipt when it was shown to you, and where is it now?

"Ans. Yes, sir, did; I saw it in the hands of James Jones, a colored man who lives at Warren. I asked him who gave it to him. He told me it was given to him by George Washington Carey, one of the judges of election at Porter's precinct, I think; I don't know where it is now.

"Quest. 3 by same. When did he say it was given to him, whose name was in it when you saw it, and who wrote the name in it, and when was the name written?

"Ans. He said it was given to him on the day of election. James Jones's name was in it when I saw it. Geo. Washington Cary wrote the name in it. It was written on the day of election."

This, though in the nature of hearsay, was not asked to be stricken out. We give effect to it, however, only in connection with the following:

James Jones, colored (record, 733), testified as follows:

"Quest. 2. What time of day did you get to Porter's last election day, and what time did you vote?

"Ans. As near as I can come at it, about 3 o'clock p. m., and voted very late in the evening.

"Quest. 3. Why did not you vote when you first got there?

"Ans. I failed to get my tax ticket; thought Mr. Coles had it there, but found Mr. Coles did not have it.

"Quest. 4. How did you finally come to vote? How did you get your tax ticket?

"Ans. Just before I started to leave George Washington Carey asked me if I had voted. I told him I had not; I failed to get my tax ticket. He told me then to hold on and wait, he thought he had one left, and came to me pretty soon and handed me a tax ticket, and said it was all right. I then went on and voted.

"Quest. 5. Is the George Washington Carey you just spoke of the same man who was one of the judges of election at Porter's that day, and is he white or colored?

"Ans. He is colored, and was one of the judges of election there that day.

"Quest. 6. Did you ever ask George Washington Carey to get your tax ticket for you?

"Ans. No, sir."

James R. Bragg (record, 68) testified that there was a large number of colored voters at his precinct in the morning who did not vote until the evening; that they rushed to the polls very soon after one Branham arrived at the precinct; that Branham acknowledged he brought capitation-tax receipts for a good many; that Branham was a very strong partisan of the contestee, and admitted in his presence he had filled up the receipts after he got them. Branham was a deputy collector.

J. Massie Smith (record, 29), Milton, testified that two colored Republicans were the ticket-holders, and that they went up to the polls with the colored voters, and often gave them their tickets and tax-receipts at the same time.

M. Darrett (record, 29) testified that Samuel B. Yates, a deputy collector, told him he was only collecting from those he knew were going to vote the Readjuster ticket.

Samuel B. Yates, deputy collector (record, 32), testifies:

"Quest. 29. Did you deliver any of these receipts to persons unless you knew or had good reason to believe they would vote for Paul and Wise?

"Ans. No, sir."

Archer Bland, colored (record, 36), testified he got a number of receipts from the collector's office and gave them to the colored supporters of the contestee.

He testified further (record, 37) that receipts were sent for on the day of election from his precinct to another, to one John Alexander, for supporters of contestee. Alexander was a deputy collector. (Record, 19.)

A. B. Parker, colored, a member of county committee of the "Readjuster Republican party" (record, 47), testified that in a meeting of the committee the chairman stated—

"That he proposed to put blank receipts in the hands of deputies or some reliable person at each poll, to be filled on day of election."

Jefferson R. Taylor (record, 59) testified as follows:

"Ques. 4. Please state whether or not you saw any capitation-tax receipts offered in evidence to the judges of election at Keswick that day; if so, by whom were they offered, by whom were they signed, and what was their appearance and condition?

"Ans. I saw several, I can't recollect how many, nor can I recollect the names of the persons offering them with any exactness, except that they were colored men residing in my immediate neighborhood, one of whom, if I recollect rightly, was Ben. Hearns. Hearns and one or two other men approached the polls. I sent a man, who was also a neighbor of theirs, to them to see how they were going to vote. In my hearing they said that they could not vote; that they had not paid their taxes, or hadn't their tax-tickets, I forget which. I kept my eye on them, and in a few minutes I saw them approach the polls with a Readjuster as if they were going to vote. I saw them present to the judges of election, in evidence of their having paid their taxes, tax-tickets which were clean, whereas they were very dirty, unfolded, without a crease, with the collector's name, James Wayland, signed in ink which was perfectly black. The voter's name was filled in in an ink of a greenish hue, which seemed to have been 'Arnold's Writing Fluid' before it had had time to turn black."

AUGUSTA COUNTY.

M. S. Cease, collector of the city of Staunton, and E. L. Curtis, collector of the county of Augusta, testified they issued receipts to Readjusters only. (Record, 469, 480.)

"No Democrats ever applied to them."

FLUVANNA COUNTY.

Isaac O. Perkins, deputy collector (record, 250), testified that he refused to deliver receipts to certain voters because they were regarded as Funders (Democrats).

GOOCHLAND COUNTY.

The evidence in this county showed that these receipts were in the hands of the partisans of the contestee, and no one else at the polls, except one man who had been a Readjuster, and to whom they were sent by mistake, but he left the precinct and did not use them. About seventeen receipts were issued to Democrats because the clerk refused to receive taxes.

PAGE COUNTY.

All the receipts in this county were in the hands of the partisans of the contestee.

ROCKINGHAM COUNTY.

The same in this county. One deputy testified that he would ask a voter whom he would vote for; if he said he intended to vote the Democratic ticket "he would leave him alone;" but if he said he would vote the Readjuster ticket he would give him a receipt. (Record, 677.)

SHENANDOAH COUNTY.

Receipts were issued only to Readjuster voters in this county, except about twenty which were issued to the Democrats, because the county clerk, who was the county chairman of the Readjuster party, refused to receive taxes.

So far as to all these delinquent voters on collectors' receipts as a class the receipts were in the hands of these partisan collectors and their deputies, who either gave them out to the supporters of the contestee or to his partisans, who delivered them to those who would vote for contestee. The surveillance these partisans exercised leaves no doubt in our minds that the receipts were used only by the supporters of the contestee, except in the county of Goochland, where about seventeen, and in the county of Shenandoah, where about twenty were issued to Democrats because the clerks would not receive taxes, but whether used by these Democrats in voting or not does not appear. These latter were paid for when issued, before the day of election. There is no evidence introduced nor attempt made to show that receipts were issued by these collectors to Democrats except the few indicated. It seems to have been a well-arranged and well-understood system inaugurated for the benefit of the party of which contestee was the nominee.

But apart from the manifestly just conclusion that these delinquent voters upon collectors' receipts voted for contestee, we refer to the testimony in Albemarle County alone (for we do not think it is necessary to inquire further) to show for whom the colored vote was cast in that county.

It will be remembered that 655 colored voters voted on the collector's receipts in that county.

ALBEMARLE COUNTY.

Showing how colored vote was cast.

1. A. D. Payne (record, 22) testified that he was at the polls at Charlottesville most of the day of election and that the colored vote was cast for Paul; that he knew this from observing from whom they got their tickets and of whom these ticket-holders were supporters.

2. John Dickerson, colored (record, 23), testified that he canvassed a large portion of the county for Paul; that he held meetings of the colored people and addressed them and conferred with them. He thought after he got through with his canvass they would go solid for Paul.

3. Albert Southall, colored (record, 24), testified that he was at the court-house all day of election; that the colored vote was cast for Paul; that he saw the tickets Paul's supporters were issuing, and he thought all the colored people got these tickets and voted them; that he was at one meeting of the colored people (a club meeting) and they pledged themselves to support Paul; "took it down in writing;" that he was at another meeting which was addressed by a colored man in the interest of Paul.

4. William H. Southall (record, 25) testified that he urged the colored voters at his precinct (Ivy) to vote for O'Ferrall, but only got one to do so; that he was all day at the polls; that there were three colored men on his place who were pretty much supported by him, and he urged them to vote for O'Ferrall, but they positively refused. The colored man who voted for O'Ferrall voted on a clerk's receipt. (Memo.: No question is raised as to clerk's receipts by either party.)

5. J. J. Brown (record, 27) testified that he was well acquainted with the white and colored voters at his precinct (Howardsville); had been registrar there for several years; had ascertained the sentiments and political views of the voters, and that the colored vote was cast for Paul with the exception of two. That frequently, prior to the election, he urged the colored voters to vote the Democratic ticket, but they all refused to do so with the exception of one, who always votes the Democratic ticket.

6. Holmes Bowles, sr., colored (record, 28), testified that he used his influence with his race, and did so just before the election in November, 1882, in the interest of Paul; that he was at his precinct (North Garden) all day of the election, and from his opportunities of knowing and from his work on that day he would say the colored vote was cast for Paul with a few exceptions.

7. M. L. Van Doren (record, 28) testified that he was judge of election (at Carter's Bridge) and present all day; that from his observation at the polls and his general knowledge of the voters and their political affiliations and associations, and his observation of the political workers who gave out ballots at the polls to the colored voters, he would say the colored vote was almost unanimous for Paul.

8. J. Massie Smith (record, 29) testified that he was at the polls all day; that from his observation of the polls, his knowledge of the individual voters, and their political affiliations and associates, and from his observations of the persons who gave out the ballots to the colored voters and went to the polls with them, he would say the colored vote was cast for Paul; that two colored Republicans went up to the polls with nearly all the colored voters and exhibited the tickets of the voters and gave them their tax-receipts.

9. J. C. Childress (record, 33) testified that he was a Republican, and that he had usually exercised a large influence over the colored voters; that at his precinct (Carter's) the colored vote was cast for Paul—"he did not know an exception." That this opinion was formed from his observation at the polls and his conversation with the colored voters just before the election. "They were all for the Readjuster ticket."

10. J. J. Winn (record, 33) testified that he was present at his precinct (Hillsborough) all day of the election, and that from his knowledge of the individual voters and their political associations and affiliations, and his observations at the polls of the persons from whom the colored voters got their ballots, and with whom they came to the polls, he would say the colored vote was cast for Paul.

11. Jonathan Browning (record, 41) testified that he was present at the polls election day, at his precinct (Scottsville); that the colored vote was cast for Paul, with one exception; that he was well acquainted with the people in his section, and stated that the colored vote was cast for Paul from his knowledge of the voters and their political affiliations and associates, and his observation of the persons from whom the colored voters got their ballots, and by whom they were escorted to the polls, and from his experience in canvassing among them in the interest of candidates.

12. Rev. M. T. Lewis, colored (record, 54), testified that the colored vote was cast for Paul; that there was more enthusiasm and interest manifested for him than he had known for years. He saw a number of Paul tickets voted by them at Charlottesville.

13. Wm. E. Jackson (record, 55) testified that he worked assiduously at his precinct (Wingfield's) for Paul; that up to 3.30 or 4 o'clock he was the only person who issued tickets, and all he issued were for Paul.

14. John Anderson (record, 56) testified that at his precinct (Keswick), from his observation of the voting, and from his knowledge of the voters and the persons who gave them their tickets and went up to the polls with them, he would say the colored vote was cast for Paul; that he knew the ticket-issuers for Paul. He was at the polls all day and took a good deal of interest.

15. N. C. McGee (record, 57) testified that he was at Ivy precinct all day as one of the judges; that judging from his observation at the polls and of whom the colored voters got their ballots and by whom they were accompanied to the polls, and from his knowledge of the individual voters and their political affiliations and associations, he would say the colored vote was undoubtedly cast for Paul.

16. Jefferson R. Taylor (record, 59) testified:

"Ans. I reside in Albemarle County, Rivanna district. I vote at Keswick precinct; was present from sunrise to sunset on election day at the polls.

"Question 2. From your knowledge of the individual voters at that precinct, and of their political affiliations and associates, and from your observation of the persons from whom the negroes got their ballots, and who came up to the polls with them, for whom would you say the colored vote there was cast; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

"Ans. Paul, almost solidly.

"Question. Please state the facts on which your conclusion is based.

"Ans. I was appointed by the county superintendent of the Conservative party to attend to the interests of the party at Keswick precinct. I was to be, and was, assisted in looking after votes by several other voters at the precinct. Either myself or some of these men who were acting with me, and under my eye, met every colored voter who offered to vote at the precinct. They were also met by men acting for the Readjuster party. I do not remember one instance in which the Readjuster managers failed to take off the colored men who offered to vote, and were met by agents of both parties, to the polls and watch over them until they had voted. They took their tickets from the Readjuster managers, and I suppose voted the Readjuster ticket."

17. Philip Nelson (record, 68) testified that he was at his precinct (Stony Point) the most of the day of election; that from his observation at the polls the colored vote was cast for Paul, with a few exceptions.

18. James R. Bragg (record, 68) testified that he was at his precinct (Lindsay's) on election day.

"Question 2. State whether or not you noticed whether the colored vote at your precinct was controlled at the last election by the partisans of either of the candidates for Congress from this district; and, if so, in the interest of which candidate was the colored vote controlled and cast; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

"Ans. My observation is that is was for Paul. There was a large number of colored voters there in the morning who did not vote until the evening, and rushed to the polls very soon after Mr. N. Branham arrived on the place, who acknowledged that he brought capitation-tax receipts for a good many. He was a partisan of Mr. Paul, and a very strong one."

19. Capt. J. A. Early (record, 69) testified:

"1st Question by contestant's counsel. Please state your residence and voting precinct, and if you were at that precinct on the 7th of November, 1882.

"Answer. Albemarle County; voting precinct, Whitehall. I was.

"2d Ques. by same. State whether or not you noticed whether the colored vote at your precinct was controlled at last election by the partisans of either of the candidates for Congress from this district; and, if so, in the interest of which candidate was the colored vote controlled and cast; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

"Ans. Well, the colored vote was controlled by the friends of Mr. Paul. I do not believe there were but two colored votes cast for O'Ferrall. I know there was two.

Cross-examined by counsel for contestee:

"1st Question. When you speak of the colored vote being controlled by the friends of Paul, what do you mean; that is, how controlled?

"Ans. By seeing Paul's friends, who were the leading politicians, furnish them with tickets."

20. Davis J. Jackson (record, 69) testified:

"1st Q. by counsel for contestant. State your residence and voting precinct, and whether you were at that voting precinct on the 7th of November, 1882, the day of election for Congressman for the 7th district of Virginia?

"Ans. Earlysville is my voting precinct. I live near there in Albemarle County. I was at said election, at said voting-place.

"2d Q. by same. Whom did you support for Congress in that election?

"Ans. Massey and Paul.

"3d Q. by same. For whom did the colored voters at that precinct vote as between Paul and O'Ferrall?

"Ans. Well, I think Paul got the majority.

"4th Q. by same. Did not Paul get nearly the entire colored vote?

"Ans. I think he got the most of them."

21. James Curry, witness for contestee (record, 390), and who voted for contestee, testified on cross-examination:

"Quest. 5. Which side did the colored people at Hilton vote for at the last election; was it for Paul and Wise, or Massey and O'Ferrall?

"Ans. Paul and Wise."

This evidence shows as conclusively as circumstantial evidence could well show that the colored vote was cast with almost perfect unanimity for the contestee, and when it is taken in connection with the fact that 655 colored delinquents voted on collectors' receipts issued only to Readjuster voters, the conclusion naturally follows that these 655 colored delinquents voted for contestee.

What is proof? It is that degree of evidence which convinces the mind and produces belief.

Can any reasonable mind in the light of this evidence fail to believe that these votes were cast for contestee? Is not the weight of evidence on the side of the contestee? In fact, does it not exclude even a reasonable doubt?

There is no evidence nor any attempt to controvert this, and is not that another circumstance which goes to strengthen the belief? In the case of Smith vs. Shelley the last House held that the testimony of two witnesses that 95 to 97½ per cent. of the colored vote of a Congressional district was Republican was sufficient in the absence of controverting testimony. Here are twenty-one witnesses, of both political parties and both colors, who were present at the polls, working in the interest of the respective candidates, or observing as interested parties the movements, actions, and expressions of the voters, and with a knowledge of their political affiliations and associates, who testify that the colored vote of a county (not a Congressional district) was cast with approximate unanimity in a certain direction and for a particular candidate. It was not mere opinion, as in the case of Smith vs. Shelley, but facts drawn from direct observation and participation at the polls, and from knowledge of political proclivities and associations.

Our conclusion is that these 557 persons had not complied with this constitutional provision, and were not therefore qualified to vote, and their votes must be deducted from the vote of the contestee. How, then, will the vote stand?

Returned vote for contestant, O'Ferrall		11,941
Returned vote for contestee, Paul	12,146
Deduct the illegal votes above	557
Majority for contestant, O'Ferrall		352

But in this county Porter's precinct was thrown out by the board of county commissioners for mere irregularity. We think it ought to be counted. It gave contestee 104 majority. Deduct, then, 104 from 352, and it leaves a clear majority of 248 votes for contestant.

The record also contains allegations that many persons voted for contestee in other counties of the district who lacked this qualification; that a large number of persons voted for contestee who had not been assessed; that persons voted for him who were non-residents of the county in which they lived or had not resided in the county the required time; that minors and persons who had been convicted of petit larceny, and thereby disqualified, voted for contestee.

Contestant's majority might be considerably increased by a critical examination of the evidence upon one or more of these grounds, but as it is unnecessary to do this we have refrained from giving an analysis of the testimony. The contestant also alleges that special tax-collectors, all of whom were partisans of contestee, were appointed on the eve of the election in the interests of the contestee without authority of law, and that many persons were enabled by the use of tax-receipts illegally and fraudulently issued by these special tax-collectors to vote for contestee, and that these votes ought to be deducted from his column. But we have not considered it necessary to pass upon the issues of law and fact arising upon these allegations, and expressly withhold our opinion upon them in this case, as the question is directly involved in another case now undetermined before the committee.

It is also claimed by the parties respectively that certain precincts which gave the contestee large majorities and one which gave contestant a majority ought to be excluded, because neither the judges nor clerks, nor any of them, were sworn, as required by the statute of Virginia; but upon this point also, as being one not necessary to be settled in order to the proper determination of this case, we abstain from announcing any conclusion.

We therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That John Paul was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-eighth Congress from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia, and was not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That Charles T. O'Ferrall was duly elected as a Representative from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia to the Forty-eighth Congress, and is entitled to his seat as such.

During the reading of the report the following occurred:

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. I am quite satisfied that a large number of the members of this House have not heard this report, as there is so much confusion in the Hall, and I therefore ask for order so while the report is being read it may be heard.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the report until it was finished.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I now ask leave to present the views of the minority of the committee, and also that it be read to the House at this time.

Mr. LOWRY rose.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Clerk will proceed to read the views of the minority. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LOWRY. Before the reading of the minority report is proceeded with, in order to suit the convenience of gentlemen on both sides of the House, I think it will be desirable to know when discussion, if any take place, will be closed in this case. I therefore inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the other side what time it will be agreeable to them to have fixed for the argument. What time would it be agreeable to the gentleman the vote should be taken?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I can imagine no purpose in that except to give members of this House an opportunity to be absent. I think inasmuch as the views of the minority have never been presented members ought to be here to hear them, and thus they can vote intelligently. An arrangement can be made subsequently, after the discussion has proceeded some time, as to when the vote shall be taken.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to read the views of the minority.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Is it a matter of right to have the views of the minority read?

The SPEAKER. It is not except as a part of some gentleman's remarks. The Chair asked for objection and there was none made.

Mr. HAMMOND. I did not hear it.

The SPEAKER. It is always usual to let the minority present their views.

Mr. HAMMOND. I understand that.

Mr. REED. And it is customary to have them printed. Houses have gone to that extent.

The SPEAKER. It is customary to allow them to be presented and ordered to be printed. In this case the views of the minority are presented in manuscript, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked to have them read. The Chair asked for objection and none was made. The Clerk will proceed to read the views of the minority.

Mr. LOWRY. Before reading the views of the minority, to which I hope there will be no objection, I will, inasmuch as the gentlemen on the other side have not indicated any time when it will be agreeable to them the vote shall be taken, give notice that I shall demand the previous question on this question this afternoon not later than 3 o'clock. I do this, as I have said, in the absence of any communication on the other side as to what would be most agreeable to them.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to read the views of the minority.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHARLES T. O'FERRALL VS. JOHN PAUL.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the following minority report:

The resolutions appended to the report of the Committee on Elections, submitted by Mr. LOWRY, of said committee, received the approval, by a yea-and-nay vote, of six members out of twelve present at the time the vote was taken—two members present declining to vote. Of the absent members, all three had expressed themselves opposed to the resolutions declaring Mr. O'Ferrall elected and entitled to the seat. We state this as showing that at the time said resolutions were adopted by the committee they only had the indorsement of six of the fifteen members.

To arrive at the conclusions embodied in these resolutions the committee, or so much of it as indorses the so-called majority report, are compelled to ignore the well established rules of evidence as practiced and followed by judicial tribunals, and to override well established precedents which have heretofore ordinarily controlled the action of the House in contested-election cases.

The majority report in order to seat Mr. O'Ferrall, the contestant, throws out 557 votes in the county of Albemarle, and deducts the entire 557 from the contestee, Mr. Paul.

The alleged reason for throwing out the 557 votes is that 676 persons in the county of Albemarle, one of the counties in the district, were delinquent in the payment of their capitation tax for 1881, the payment of which was a prerequisite to voting, of which number it is claimed 557 had not paid such tax prior to the election so as to entitle them to vote under the constitution and laws of Virginia.

The only substantial reason for deducting the entire 557 votes from contestee is that the tax collector for Albemarle County, appointed by the State auditor, who had charge of the collection of this delinquent capitation tax, belonged to the same party as contestee, and that all of the persons who cast the 557 votes were colored; and because colored persons and receiving their tax receipts from or through such collector they voted for contestee.

Of the 676 votes alleged to have been cast by delinquents but two of them were called—James Curry, who (on page 390) testifies he paid his own capitation tax before the election and was therefore a qualified voter, and James Jones (page 733) who testifies he belonged to the Massey party.

We state the foregoing as preliminary to submitting our views.

CONTESTEE'S RETURNED MAJORITY 309.

The Virginia State board of canvassers made the following return for the election held in seventh Virginia Congressional district on November 7, 1882:

Majority for Mr. Paul, 205.

The commissioners of election for Albermarle County threw out Porter precinct, in said county, because the poll-books and ballots were delivered to the clerk of the county court in an unsealed condition.

The entire committee are of opinion that it should be counted. It gave contestee 104 majority, which added to the returned majority of contestee makes his majority in the district 309.

A FAIR AND FREE ELECTION.

There is no proof, or indeed any allegation on the part of contestant, but that the elections were honestly and fairly held, and the vote counted and returned precisely as cast. There is no allegation on the part of contestant that the ballot-boxes, or the ballots, or the returns were tampered with.

There is no allegation in the majority report but that all those who voted for Paul were qualified voters, providing they had legally paid to a legal officer the capitation tax of the preceding year.

QUALIFICATIONS OF A VOTER.

The qualifications of a voter in Virginia on November 7, 1882, are defined in the following articles and sections of the constitution and laws of Virginia.

Article 3, section 1, of the constitution of Virginia, was, at the date of the election, November 7, 1882, as follows:

"Every male citizen of the United States, 21 years old, who shall have been a resident of the State twelve months, and of the county, city, or town in which he shall offer to vote three months next preceding any election, and shall have paid to the State before the day of election the capitation tax required by law for the preceding year, shall be entitled to vote for members of the General Assembly and all officers elected by the people."

Article 10, section 5, was and is as follows:

"The General Assembly may levy a tax, not exceeding $1 per annum, on every male citizen who has attained the age of 21 years, which shall be applied exclusively in aid of public free schools; and counties and corporations shall have power to impose a capitation tax, not exceeding 50 cents per annum, for all purposes." (Acts 1876-'77, p. 422.)

Section 5 of an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, entitled "An act for the assessment of taxes on person, property," &c., approved April 22, 1882, and in force at the time of said election, is as follows:

"Upon every male person, as classified in this schedule, over the age of 21 years, not exempt for bodily infirmity, there shall be a tax of $1 for public free school purposes." (Virginia Revenue Laws, 1882, p. 45.)

It is admitted that the capitation tax above specified was properly levied for 1881 in the counties in this district. It is also true that a large number of persons in the several counties in the district did not pay this tax to the treasurers in the several counties and cities, and that in accordance with law the several treasurers made out lists of the delinquents, which after being presented to the courts in the several counties were duly and legally forwarded to the auditor of public accounts, a State officer.

HOW THE DELINQUENT CAPITATION TAX IS COLLECTED.

By the various sections of the revenue laws of Virginia it is provided that as soon as practicable after the 15th day of June of each year the treasurer of each county or city shall make out a list of unpaid taxes, and after being verified by designated officers, such lists are to be filed in the proper court in each county. When the court is satisfied of their correctness, they direct the clerk to certify copies to the State auditor of public accounts. These lists include the unpaid capitation tax. Within sixty days after receiving the said lists, or as soon thereafter as practicable, the auditor of public accounts is to place a certified copy of the delinquent capitation-tax list "in the hands of any sheriff, sergeant, constable, or collector for collection."

Section 29 of this act is as follows:

"A certified copy of the first and third lists heretofore returned (that is, the personal property and capitation lists) shall be placed by the auditor of public accounts, within sixty days after receiving the originals, or as soon thereafter as practicable, in the hands of any sheriff, sergeant, constable, or collector, for collection; the same to be accounted for within one year thereafter—said officer to have the same power of distress as treasurers, and shall account for the same in like manner; and he and his sureties shall be subject to all such remedies as are given to the Commonwealth against treasurers for failure to pay; and his compensation shall not exceed 20 per cent. of the amount collected and paid into his treasury. * * * But in no case shall such delinquent lists be placed for collection in the hands of any officer who has returned the same."

It will be observed that the delinquent capitation-tax list for 1881 could not leave the treasurer's hands until after June 15, 1882, and that it could scarcely reach the auditor before August 1, 1882, and be returned by him to the county collector before October 1, 1882.

It was contended by a portion of the committee, as also by contestant, that the auditor of public accounts of Virginia had no power to appoint collectors to collect these delinquent taxes, and that the receipt by them of such tax did not qualify the delinquent paying the same to vote; but this was so manifestly against the weight of authority that the committee has virtually abandoned this in the revised report filed April 30, 1884.

The expressed object of the law authorizing the assessment of a capitation tax was to raise revenue for the maintenance of public free schools, and the better to enforce its payment by indigent persons its payment was made a prerequisite for voting. The object of the law was to raise revenue. It is not contended but that the money collected by these appointees of the State auditor was paid into the State treasury. A full statement of the amount paid into the State treasury up to February 20, 1883, will be found on pages 207 et seq. of the record. By the law the collectors had one year in which to account.

Even admitting that these collectors were not officers de jure (which we do not), there can be no doubt but that they were at least officers de facto, acting under color of legal authority. We will not multiply authorities on this point, but refer to the case of Thompson vs. Ewing (1 Brewster, 121, and cases therein cited) and The People vs. Cook (14 Barbour, 259).

WHAT CONSTITUTES A VALID PAYMENT OF THE TAX?

It was further contended by a portion of the committee, at the time this case was passed on, that to constitute a valid payment of this delinquent tax it must be paid by the delinquent himself, or by his express authority. We presume this position also has been abandoned.

We contend that if the delinquent's tax was paid by some one, the receipt given, and filled up by the collector or by some one for him and by his express direction and authority, at any time before the day of election, the acceptance of the receipt by the delinquent on the day of election ratified the act of the party paying the tax, and such ratification adopts the act as of the time of its performance.

In Pennsylvania it is provided by constitutional provision that to entitle an elector to vote he must, as a prerequisite, have paid, within two years next preceding the time of the election at which he claims the right to vote, a State or county tax. Under the constitution of 1874, the tax must have been paid at least thirty days before the election. In a contested-election case in Dauphin County, which is reported at length in 11 Philadelphia Reports, 645, the legality of a payment of such tax by an unauthorized person was the question at issue. The court held:

"From the adoption of the constitution of 1790 down to the present time the practice to pay taxes through an agent has always been held as good and valid as when done by the voter in person, and the presentation of the receipt at the polls and claiming the right to vote by virtue of it has always been considered sufficient evidence of the adoption of the agency. It is averred, however, in the petition, and when that is demurred to we must take it to be true, that these voters had their taxes paid without their knowledge or previous authority conferred on the person paying it. We must hold in this as in other cases that a subsequent ratification is equivalent to an original command, according to the legal maxim, Omnis ratihabitio retro trahitur et mandato æquiparatur. * * * The only doubt which can exist on this branch of the cases arises out of the constitutional mandate that the tax must be paid at least thirty days before the election, and whether the voter is obliged to show that he assumed and acknowledged the payment by the agent before that time. On careful consideration we are satisfied that the ratification adopts the act as of the time of its performance. It is thus carried back by relation to that period. Such is the doctrine laid down by ancient and modern writers and by judicial decisions." (See 18 Viner's Abt., title Ratihabitio, pages 157–81, and a host of authorities there cited.)

This opinion was delivered December 26, 1874.

A still later case is that of in re Griffiths, decided in the quarter sessions of Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, and reported in 1 Kulp, 157. The contestant in that case, among other grounds of contest, set up that certain votes should be thrown out because their taxes had been paid by a political committee; but the court held, the testimony showing that the money was paid and the receipts filled out the required time before the day of election, although not delivered until election day to the voter, that such payments were good and valid. After deciding this point the court added:

"It is further urged that there was no appropriation of the money thus paid to the discharge of the tax against the voter for the reason that the payments were not credited on the duplicates. Assume that such appropriation is essential, the evidence in this case seems to show it was made."

After quoting certain evidence of the collector the court adds:

"The receiver is bound to account for it (the tax), and, as we have shown, he would be liable to prosecution if he did not do so. And in this view of the matter it may be doubted whether the tax, having been paid and receipt given, the voters can be disfranchised by the failure of the collector to account for it or to appropriate it as he is bound to do by law."

THE NUMBER OF DELINQUENTS WHERE TAXES WERE PAID IN ALBEMARLE COUNTY.

The majority report bases the election of O'Ferrall on the following proposition, found on page 2 of report:

"We base our conclusion that 676 votes were cast by persons delinquent in the payment of their capitation taxes in Albemarle for contestee, and that 557 of these were clearly illegal."

Under the laws of Virginia, while the appointee of the auditor alone had the power of distress to collect delinquent taxes, the clerk of the county court had authority to receive such tax from any one desiring to pay to him, and his receipt therefor was as valid as that of the collector. Both these officers collected delinquent taxes prior to the election in November, 1882.

James T. Wayland was the collector in this county. On page 18 of the record he says he issued from 500 to 600 tax-receipts filled in with the names of the voters when the receipts left his hands, and that he delivered them to deputies to deliver to the delinquents. (See question and answer 9.) He further says that he actually received in hand prior to the election on account of capitation-tax receipts between $500 and $600. (See question and answer 15.) Because $440 of this amount was in a draft, and not indorsed by the collector until after the election, the subcommittee hold that it was not a good payment. This draft, he says, was received from the 1st to the middle of October, 1882 (see question and answer 27), and was in the hands of his clerk, Mr. Montigue, until the time he indorsed it, about three weeks after the election. The draft was forwarded to the State auditor and cashed November 24, 1882, only seventeen days after the election. (See record, page 207.) In addition to this $440, the collector says he received $125 just before the election. (See question and answer 33, page 19, record.)

In addition to the above, a large number of delinquent-tax receipts were issued by the county clerk of said county. H. B. Bunley, who was the deputy clerk of Albemarle County, testifies (see record, pages 403–405) that he knows of four hundred and twenty tickets issued by the clerk's office. He further says he issued tickets to the value of $150 to Mr. White, the chairman of the Democratic party, and that the money was not paid until after the election. (See questions and answers 18, 19, record 404.) The clerk also admits (question 16, page 404) that the tax receipts in his office lay on his shelf, and that any one coming into the clerk's office had access to them.

The clerk was a supporter of the contestant.

This would make in all about five hundred and thirty tax receipts issued by the county clerk, and possibly as many as six hundred and fifty issued by the collector.

The majority report asserts that of these delinquents 655 were colored persons. We can not better show the manner in which the committee arrived at this than to quote from the majority report, page 2:

"The contestant filed certified copies of the delinquent lists (white and colored) of Albemarle County. (Record 75–91.)

"These lists showed the names and color of all delinquents for the year 1881—the year for which the capitation tax was required to be paid before the day of the election in question."

The contestant, to show the number of receipts issued and to whom by both the clerk of Albemarle and special collector, filed a certified list of the names of delinquents for 1881, to whom receipts had been issued by the clerk of Albemarle County. (See Record, 73–75.)

After thus ascertaining the names of these parties who had clerk's receipts, it followed as a necessary consequence that all delinquents who voted whose names were not on the clerk's list, voted on the collector's receipts. Then, to ascertain what delinquent voters cast their votes, and upon whose receipts, it was only necessary to compare the poll-books of the county with the delinquent lists.

"Contestant introduced a witness (Record 71) who testified—and whose testimony remained uncontradicted—that he had compared the clerk's list with the poll-books and had designated all the delinquents who voted on the clerk's receipts by the letters 'H. B. B.' opposite their names on the delinquent lists; that he then designated all the delinquents who voted and who did not have the clerk's receipts by the name of the precinct at which they voted opposite their names on the delinquent lists. It was thus found that 676 delinquents voted who did not have the clerk's receipt, and presuming that the judges of election did their duty and required the production of receipts, as required by law, these 676 voted on the collector's receipts. Of this number 655 were colored."

The utter unreliability of this testimony arises from the fact that the witness, Bennett T. Gordon, who testified on page 71 of record, did not pretend to know the parties whose names were on the poll-books or on the clerk's list of delinquents. He simply performed a mechanical act which any member of the committee or the House can do by taking up the two lists, and when he finds a name on the poll-lists and a name on the delinquent lists which are the same, check it off, on the assumption that there could not be two men of the same name in the county.

OVER 6,000 NAMES ON THE DELINQUENT-LISTS AND POLL-BOOKS.

There are over 2,000 names of colored persons on the delinquent-lists of Albemarle County, and 4,133 names of white and colored on the poll-books. There is no law in Virginia requiring the election officers to keep a record of the color of voters. Then on the delinquent-lists we find numerous instances where the same name is common to a number of persons. We find three Charles Burleys, three John Browns, one Jack Brown, one John A. Brown, and one John W. Brown, five Nelson Browns, four James Johnsons, and one Jim Johnson, four William Johnsons, five Hy. Johnsons, and one Henry Johnson, three Sam Johnsons and two Samuel Johnsons, and an almost equal repetition is found throughout the alphabet. To assume that a stranger could take two lists, one containing over 4,000 names in twenty different books, and the other over 2,000 names on two lists, neither of which have any distinguishing marks, and from these 6,000 names select the number of colored persons who voted on delinquent-tax receipts and figure them out at 655, is to assume an impossibility. It is not pretended that the election officers kept a record of either the whites or blacks who voted on delinquent-tax receipts. The proof is utterly unreliable. In short, it is no proof whatever, for, as heretofore stated, any member of the committee can take the lists and the twenty poll-books and as correctly arrive at the same conclusion.

We contend that the only reliable and competent evidence is the testimony of the alleged delinquents, or a sworn copy of the list of such as paid their tax, made out by the collector to whom the tax was paid and by whom the receipts were issued. If the latter could not be obtained, then the delinquent voters alone could testify correctly. Every man whose name was on the delinquent-list and who voted is presumed to have had a tax-receipt, and consequently his ballot can not be rejected except upon competent evidence.

It is on the evidence of Bennett T. Gordon, which will be found in the appendix, that the committee found that 655 colored delinquents voted in Albemarle County. The witness Gordon does not pretend that he has any personal acquaintance with any of these 655 men; does not pretend that he has personal knowledge of whether they were delinquent or not; does not pretend that he has personal knowledge of whether they voted or not; does not pretend that he has personal knowledge of whether they are colored or not; does not pretend that he has personal knowledge of whether they are the same men or not. All he testifies is that he finds the name of John Smith on the delinquent county list and the name of John Smith on some poll-list for the same county; therefore the two men are one and the same.

FOR WHOM WERE THESE 655 VOTES CAST?

Unless the House adopts the hypothesis of the majority report, that Bennett T. Gordon could with absolute certainty pick out from over 6,000 names these 655 voters, then they are unnamed and unknown. But two of all are called and three others only are identified. But if their identity is established, then there is not a single witness who testifies for whom they severally voted. Twenty-one witnesses living in sixteen of the twenty election precincts testify as to whom the colored people as a class voted for. In four of the precincts in which 66 of the alleged delinquents voted there is not a line of testimony as for whom the colored people as a class voted.

But we contend that a still more important question is:

who cast the ballots which the majority report declares to be illegal, and which the committee deduct from contestee's vote, and which must be deducted from contestee's vote in order to seat the contestant?

The committee concede that of the 676 persons who it claims voted on collectors' receipts 119—of whom 21 were white and 98 colored—were entitled to vote. What are the names of these 119? It is admitted by the majority report that Collector Wayland had at least $125 before the election, and that this would qualify 119 voters. Who are they? At what precinct did they vote? How many of them voted at Batesville? How many at each of the other twenty precincts? If it is impossible to say who the 119 voters are, how can the committee name the 557 voters whose ballots it deducts from contestee?

Did any court investigating an election case ever reject a ballot for the sole reason that the person casting it had not paid a tax required by law as a prerequisite for voting without naming the voter who cast the ballot? How is it possible to decide that the ballot is illegal unless the name of the person casting such ballot is known? Can the majority of the committee name the 557 voters whose ballots it deducts from the contestee in order to seat the contestant? Can the contestant name them? Can any one tell us the number rejected at each of the twenty precincts? If not, why not?

Again, it is admitted that the clerk of Albemarle County, and a supporter of contestant, issued tax tickets to the value of $150 to the chairman of the Democratic party. (See record, page 404.) Why does not the committee apply the same rule to the 140 votes, who presumably voted on these receipts, that it applies to the 557 and deduct that number from contestant? We concede that we can not name them, but neither can the majority name the 557. We concede there is no evidence for whom they were cast, but there is as reliable evidence as there is in the case of the 557.

We do not deny the correctness of the rule that the declarations and actions of a voter whose partisan he had been, with what party he affiliated, whose friends gave him his ticket, who paid his taxes, &c., are all proper matters to be considered in finding for whom the individual voter voted. But that is not what the contestant and the subcommittee ask of us. They ask us to find that the colored people as a class voted for contestee. They ask us to find from such evidence as is published in the appendix that 655 colored delinquents voted, and because colored, and because they received their tax receipts from a collector who was contestee's friend, that, therefore, they voted for contestee.

As heretofore stated, but 2 of the 655 alleged delinquents are called as witnesses. Of the 557 votes which the committee deduct from contestee no man can select them from the 655. No member of this House can write down their names from any evidence before us. With the exception of a very few—less than a dozen—no witness of the 21 called specifies how any individual voted. It is utterly impossible for any member of the committee, who indorses the resolutions reported by the majority, to specify how many votes are rejected in a single one of the twenty precincts.

No Committee on Elections in any Congress, no quasi-judicial tribunal whose decisions have been preserved, no court of law or equity has ever foreshadowed the positions upon which these 557 votes are rejected, and all deducted from the majority candidate, and a minority candidate seated. It is in proof that a very large number of tax receipts were issued by the partisans of the contestant, and therefore the declaration that such "receipts were issued to Readjuster voters, and used by them exclusively," falls to the ground.

What is true of Albemarle County is true of the other counties in the district.

We therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That Charles T. O'Ferrall was not elected as a Representative from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia to the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that I shall be permitted to print an appendix to the views of the minority. I do not ask to have it read, but simply to have it printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COBB in the chair). Is there objection to granting the request made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LOWRY. I do not understand exactly the proposition just now made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. It was leave to print with the views of the minority the appendix which the gentleman has already seen. It is the same appendix printed with the minority views some time ago, of which he had a copy.

Mr. LOWRY. I do not object.

The appendix is as follows:

APPENDIX.

HOW THE NAMES OF VOTERS AND DELINQUENTS WERE IDENTIFIED.

Maj. John W. Goss, a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says as follows, in answer to questions by W. D. Dabney:

Quest. 1. Please state your residence, whether you hold any official position in this county; and, if so, how long you have held it.

Ans. Albemarle County; I am clerk of the county court of Albemarle County, and have been so since the 1st of July last (1882). Ever since Nov'r or Dec'r, 1871, I have been connected with said clerk's office, and from that time to this I have been clerk or dep'y cl'k of said court.

Quest. 2. How many assessing districts are there in Albemarle County, and how many voting precincts?

Ans. There are two assessing districts and twenty (20) voting precincts, I believe, if I am not mistaken.

Quest. 3. Please look at the books now shown you and state what they are.

Ans. They are the poll-books for 1882 for Albemarle County.

X-ex'd by C. E. Hass:

Quest. 1. Please state whether the poll-books to which you have referred, if they are poll-books, have been removed from your office since the election of 1882; if so, when and by whom?

Ans. Here latterly Mr. W. D. Dabney has had some of them out; I don't know which nor how many; and it strikes me that Rich'd W. Duke had one, but I'm not certain whether he got it or not; I know he came there for one.

Quest. 2. Please state whether any Democrat, prior to the late election, applied to you or gave orders upon you for blocks of delinquent capitation-tax receipts; I mean by blocks, more than one, several.

Ans. None.

Quest. 3. Do you know of a Mr. White addressing orders to you or to your deputy for the delivery, in quantities, of delinquent capitation-tax receipts to other parties?

Ans. None addressed to me. I don't know what has been addressed to Mr. Burnley?

Quest. 4. Who is Mr. H. B. Burnley?

Ans. He is deputy clerk of the county court of Albemarle.

Re-ex'd by W. D. Dabney:

Quest. Please state whether or not the books gotten out by me were gotten with your knowledge, and whether or not it is the practice of your office to allow trustworthy and responsible people to withdraw the records at times for more convenient reference.

Ans. Yes.

Further this deponent saith not.

JNO. W. GOSS.

BENNETT T. GORDON, another witness of lawful age, was here introduced in the same behalf, and, being first duly sworn, deposes and says as follows in answer to questions by W. D. Dabney:

Quest. 1 (by contestant's counsel). State your residence and profession.

Ans. I live in Nelson county, Va., and am a lawyer by profession.

NOTE.—Counsel for Col. O'Ferrall here filed three papers marked Exhibits A, B, and C, respectively, with Bennett T. Gordon's deposition. (See pages 73 to 90, inclusive, of record.)

Quest. 2 (by same). Mr. Gordon, please examine Exhibits A, B, and C, which have been filed with your deposition, and state whether you have compared Exhibit A with Exhibits B and C, and whether the names which appear on Exhibit A are noted by any mark or memorandum on Exhibits B and C, opposite the same names on Exhibits B and C; if so, by what memorandum or mark?

(Counsel for contestee excepts to the filing of the three exhibits noted above, on the ground that they furnish insufficient and imperfect evidence; that the facts set forth therein, if perfect in their forms, are immaterial in this issue, and the foregoing question is excepted to on the ground that the issue it presents is immaterial. All questions involved in the prepayment of the capitation tax should be excluded by the Committee on Elections, because that requirement in that constitution of Va. is opposed to the Constitution of the United States and in conflict with the act of Congress approved Jan'y 20th, 1870.)

Ans. I have examined them and compared A with B and C. The names that appear on Exhibit A are marked on Exhibit B and C by the letters H. R. B. opposite the same names on B and C.

Quest. 3 (by same). Please examine the said Exhibits B and C, and state whether you have examined those exhibits in connection with the books now shown you, which purport to be, and have been identified by the clerk of Albermarle County court as being the poll-books of Albermarle County for 1882; and whether any note or memorandum opposite the names on the list of colored delinquents on said Exhibits A and B, respectively, indicates the names of parties that you have found on said poll-books. (This question is excepted to on the ground that it is immaterial, and is suggestive.)

Ans. I have examined Exhibits B and C in connection with the poll-books of Albemarle. On Exhibits B and C all names found upon poll-books are indicated by the name of the precinct opposite the voter's name, in red ink in most instances. In the case of Monticello House, I believe, the word Mont. Ho. is found in black ink, which I think is the only exception to the color of the ink. In several instances the names of voters on the poll-book differed from those on the delinquent-list in the matter of spelling, but in every such instance as I now remember the sound of the name is identical, and the name as found on the poll-books is so marked on the delinquent-list opposite the name. In some cases the name of the precinct is abbreviated.

Quest. 4. Please state how many names of colored delinquents you found on the two Exhibits B and C, which names also appeared on the various poll-books?

Ans. I counted the lists carefully and found six hundred and fifty-five (655) names of colored voters.

Quest. 5 (by counsel for contestant). Where did you make your examination and comparison of Exhibits B and C with the poll-books?

Ans. In the clerk's office of the county court of Albemarle.

Without waiving his exceptions, counsel for contestee proceeds to cross-examine the witness as follows:

Quest. 1. Please state how you ascertained the 655 names mentioned above to be those of colored voters.

Ans. I simply took these delinquent lists and compared them with the poll-books, and when I found a name on the poll-book corresponding with one on the delinquent-list I indicated it by writing the precinct or an abbreviation thereof opposite the name of the voter on the delinquent-list.

Quest. 2. Please state by what authority of law the assessors make a distinction between the white and colored delinquents. State this as a lawyer, if you please.

Ans. I am not prepared to say, and am not cognizant of any act of the Legislature authorizing it. I simply know it is done in all the counties with whose proceedings I am familiar.

Quest. 3. Then, if there be no law in Virginia requiring an assessor to make a color distinction in the delinquent-list they return to the clerk's office of the county, a return of colored delinquents by such assessor could be no legal guide for you in determining the colored delinquents of the county. Is not this so?

Ans. I didn't examine the lists as a lawyer, nor did I do so critically. I simply did it as a matter of fact. The distinction had been made, and I took it as I found it.

And further this deponent saith not.

Richard W. Duke, a witness of lawful age, being here introduced on the same behalf, and being first duly sworn, deposes and says as follows in answer to questions by W. D. Dabney:

Quest. 1. Please look at the books shown you which have been identified as the poll-books of Monticello Court-house and Wingfield's precincts in Albemarle County, and state whether you have compared those books with the assessor's books of Albemarle County for the year 1881, and if so what voters, if any, did you find at those precincts who appear not to have been assessed for 1881; state the names at each precinct separately.

Ans. I have compared them—1st. Monticello House: Wm. Dabney, C. H. Calaway, Wm. Preston, Fred Chapman, James Cooper, Isaac Coleman, Fleming Green, Isaac Duval, Charles Marroe, George Buckner. 2d. Court-house: Isaac Sampson, Charles Cosly, Joe Laring, Lycurgus White, Ed Young, Milton Kirtley, Jas. L. Ward. 3d. Wingfield's: Adam Dyer, John Barbour, Frederick Small, Parks Smith, and Wm. E. Terrill.

(The foregoing question and answer excepted to as immaterial and irrelevant. The judges of election at those precincts are sworn officers, and they are presumed to have admitted those votes under some exception in the law authorizing them to vote though not assessed.)

Quest. 2 (by same). Please state whether or not you have examined the registration-books of Court-house and Monticello precincts with reference to the names above given by you, and, if so, do their names appear on the list of white or colored registered persons, and do they appear from said registration-books to have been over or under 21 years old when registered?

(Question excepted to. The evidence referred to is of record, and should be presented here in that form. The contestant should not rely on the memory of his witness.)

Ans. I have examined them. Their names appear on the list of colored registered persons, and they seem to have been over 21. I didn't examine the registration books of Wingfield's precinct, because I couldn't have access to them.

Quest. 3 (by the same). Where did you examine the poll-books, assessor's books, and registration-books above referred to?

Ans. In the county clerk's office of Albemarle County.

And further this deponent saith not.

THE PRECINCTS IN ALBEMARLE COUNTY, AND THE NUMBER OF ALLEGED DELINQUENT COLORED VOTES CAST AT EACH.

The following is the number of colored persons who it is alleged voted for contestee in Albemarle County on delinquent-tax receipts, at each precinct. Of this number the majority of the subcommittee deducts 557 votes from contestee:

Batesville	16
Blackwell's	3
Court-house	63
Carter's Bridge	35
Covesville	23
Earleysville	34
Free Union	24
Howardsville	34
Hillsborough	15
Ivy	54
Keswick	38
Lindsay's	27
Milton	39
Monticello House	66
North Garden	25
Porter's	68
Stony Point	18
Scottsville	28

THE EVIDENCE RELIED ON BY THE MAJORITY TO SHOW HOW THE COLORED DELINQUENT TAX-PAYERS VOTED IN ALBEMARLE COUNTY.

BATESVILLE PRECINCT.

There is not a line of evidence as to how even the colored people voted at this precinct.

BLACKWELL'S PRECINCT.

There is not a line of evidence as to how even the colored people voted at this precinct.

COURT-HOUSE PRECINCT.

Question 3 (by contestant's att'y). State for whom the colored voters voted at the last election at that precinct. Was it for Paul and Wise or Massey and O'Ferrall?

Answer. They voted for Paul and Wise.

Question 4 (by same). How do you know that?

Ans. Because I was here all day and saw the tickets which the men were issuing who were working for Mr. Paul and Mr. Wise.

Question 5 (by same). State whether or not nearly all the colored voters got these tickets.

Ans. Yes; I think all the colored voters got them tickets and voted them at the court-house. Anyhow, I was at one of their meetings, and every colored man pledged himself to vote that ticket, and took it down in writing.

Question 6 (by same). Where was that meeting held, and who presided over the meeting?

Ans. That meeting was held at a place called Woodburn, in Albemarle County. Jas. Taylor, of Charlottesville, A. B. Parker, and Jessie Simons, or Salmons, as it is called, were the leaders or principal men.

Question 7 (by same). Was any white person present at that meeting? If so, who?

Ans. No, sir; no white man was present.

Ques. 8 (by same). About how many people were there?

Ans. Probably fifteen or twenty men were there that night.

Cross-examination:

2nd. Ques. Can you read and write?

Ans. I can't read or write much; I can manage to scribble my own name. I can read a little, not much.

3rd. Ques. How, then, can you tell how people voted?

Ans. I can know the name of the men on the ticket by looking at them.

4th. Ques. How many men's tickets which were voted at the election last November did you look at and read the names upon?

Ans. I saw the tickets the men were issuing; I asked them to let me see the tickets they were issuing, and they let me see them. Macajah Walker, I saw the tickets he was issuing.

5th. Ques. Did you issue tickets, and, if so, for whom?

Ans. I issued a few, some two or three, for Mosby and Dawson; I don't mean Mosby, I mean Cochran and Dawson.

[Testimony of M. T. Lewis, page 54.]

Question 2 (by contestant's att'y). Did you take an active interest in the last canvass; if so, for whom?

Ans. I did, sir. I was a leading one of my party in this county, and, in fact, in this district. I supported Dawson and Cochran, the straightout Republican candidates, for Congress.

Quest. 3 (by same). From your opportunity of judging during the canvass and at the polls where you voted, and from your personal acquaintance with the voters and your observation of their political associates, for whom would you say the great mass of the colored vote in this county was cast last election?

Ans. They were in a larger majority than I have ever know them to be for Paul and Wise; there was more enthusiasm, more interest manifested for the candidates than I have known for years.

Quest. 4 (by same). For which candidates, and by whom, do you mean all this enthusiasm was shown?

Ans. It was by the colored people for Paul and Wise.

Cross-examination:

Quest. 1. Do you know, of your personal knowledge, how any vote except your own was cast at the last election?

Ans. I think I can readily state. While I was in the court-house I saw numbers of Paul and Wise tickets voted. I saw them get these tickets, go up to the polls, and did not fold their tickets till they got to the polls, and then voted.

Quest. 2. Were these tickets referred to by you folded before they were voted?

Ans. They were, sir.

Quest. 3. Did you unfold and read a ticket after it was handed to the judge of election by the voter?

Ans. I did not unfold a ticket.

Quest. 4. You say the tickets were folded before they were voted, and that you did not read a ticket after it was given to the judge of election. This being the fact, can you say on your oath you knew who the vote was cast for?

Ans. My grounds for swearing the tickets were for Paul and Wise was because they were handed there in the court-house open, in my presence, and I saw the same ticket folded and voted, and the parties had no chance to change the tickets without my notice, because I was actively at work on that day and watched all these things.

Quest. 5. Did you see the face of the ticket after it was folded and handed to the judge of election; if not, do you still say you can tell for whom the ticket was voted?

Ans. I saw the ticket after it was folded, but did not see the face of it. Some of the tickets were handed to me to find out whether they were Paul and Wise tickets. I did not see the face of it after it was handed to the judge. I do say I can tell who the ticket was voted for.

CARTER'S BRIDGE.

[Testimony of M. L. Van Doren, page 28.]

Ques. 1 (by counsel for contestant). Please state your residence and voting place; whether you were an officer at the last election and were present at the polls all day.

Ans. My residence is in Albemarle County, near Carter's Bridge precinct, where I vote; I was a judge of election and present at the polls all day.

Question 2 (by same). From your observation of the polls that day, and your general knowledge of the voters, and their political affiliations and associates, and from your observation of the political workers who gave out ballots to the colored voters and came to the polls with them, how should you say the colored vote was cast; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

Answer. I should say it was almost unanimously for Paul.

Cross-examination:

Quest. 1. Were you not a partisan of, and did you not work and vote for, C. T. O'Ferrall at the last election?

Ans. I did not work for him on the day of election; I voted for him. I was a supporter of Col. O'Ferrall and wished for his election. I was less active than usual at the last election; my position as judge prevented me from taking an active part on the day of election.

COVESVILLE PRECINCT.

There is not a line of testimony as to how even the colored people voted at this precinct.

EARLEYSVILLE PRECINCT.

[Testimony of Davis J. Jackson, page 69.]

2d Q. (by same). Whom did you support for Congress in that election?

Ans. Massey and Paul.

3d Q. (by same). For whom did the colored voters at that precinct vote as between Paul and O'Ferrall?

Ans. Well, I think Paul got the majority.

4th Q. (by same). Did not Paul get nearly the entire colored vote?

Ans. I think he got the most of them.

FREE UNION PRECINCT.

There is not a line of testimony as to how even the colored people voted at this precinct.

HOWARDSVILLE PRECINCT.

[Testimony of J. J. Brown, page 27.]

Question 1 (by counsel for contestant). Please state where you reside, how long you have resided there, and where you vote.

Answer. I live at Howardsville precinct, where I have lived since 1848; vote there.

Question 2d (by same). Have you ever been an officer of election at that precinct, and have you been an active political worker, and have you full acquaintance with the politics of the white and colored voters at that precinct? Do you know well, in a general way, how the colored voters have usually voted at Howardsville, and how did they vote in the last election?

Ans. I have been registrar there for several years. I have ascertained the sentiments or political views of the voters, white and colored, at that precinct more fully for the past five years.

Ans. (continued). By knowing the colored and white voters, after looking over the poll-books, after the election, then ascertaining the number of votes, it was evident the colored people voted in a mass, with the exception of two, who voted the Democratic ticket, which two votes I know of my own knowledge. As to the last election I know nothing of my own knowledge.

Question 3d (by same). Did you not frequently, prior to the last election, urge the colored voters and the colored leaders to vote the Democratic ticket; that is, for O'Ferrall and Massey, and did they agree or refuse to do so?

Ans. Yes, sir, I did; they all refused to do so, with the exception of one colored voter, who always voted the Democratic ticket.

Question 4th (by same). State whether or not you have heard any of the negro leaders say since the election how the vote was cast, and have you heard any colored voters say how they voted, and have you heard any of them say they voted the Democratic ticket?

Ans. I have heard nothing.

Cross-examination:

Quest. 2. Were you not a warm partisan of C. T. O'Ferrall in the last election, and did you not vote and work for him?

Ans. I did.

HILLSBOROUGH PRECINCT.

[Testimony of J. J. Winn, page 34.]

Ques. 2 (by same). From your knowledge of the individual voters at that precinct and their political associations and affiliations, and from your observation of the persons from whom the negroes got their ballots on last election day, and whom they came up to the polls with, for whom would you say the colored vote at your precinct was cast; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

Ans. I should say it was cast for Paul.

Cross-examination:

Ques. Can you say on oath, of your personal knowledge, how any man, except yourself, voted at the election of Nov. 7th, 1882?

Ans. I could say how they said they voted. No; I could not say of my personal knowledge, unless that be considered personal knowledge.

IVY PRECINCT.

[Testimony of Wm. H. Southall, page 25.]

By contestant's att'y:

Question 2. Were you present at the polls all day at Ivy during the last election?

Ans. I was there all day in the room where the voting was going on or near there, never one hundred yards from there—from sun to sun.

Question 3. State whether or not you urged the colored leaders there and the colored voters to vote for Charles T. O'Ferrall at that election, and with what result?

Ans. I urged the leaders and many who were not leaders to vote for O'Ferrall and Massey, but only got one to do so. There were three colored voters on my place who I pretty much support which I asked to vote for O'Ferrall and Massey, but they declined positively to do so, and two of them voted on Wayland tax tickets; the third one came to vote, but had no tax ticket. He was asked whether he had paid his taxes, and he said he had not, and had no tax ticket. He, the voter, retired (was not allowed to vote); then Mr. J. Snowden Wood, the registrar, then left the polls and went to Mr. Sandridge's store and bar-room at Ivy, which place was considered the headquarters of the Readjusters. And a little while after Mr. Wood returned the voter came to the polls with a tax ticket (a Wayland tax ticket), but was not allowed to vote. I gave those two tax tickets to Mr. Dabney. After the election I got those two tickets from Herbert Taylor and Ruben Cutlet; the parties there gave them to me voluntarily upon request. Bob Harris, the one who attempted to vote but did not, refused positively to give the ticket up upon my request, or to tell me how or from whom he got the ticket.

Cross-examination:

5th. Ques. Did you contribute or assist in collecting money to pay delinquent taxes for Democratic voters.

Ans. I did, sir: by voluntary subscription.

6th. Ques. Do you know the amount raised in this county or used in it to pay for Democratic delinquents?

Ans. No, sir; I can't say that I do.

7th. Ques. Can you approximate it or state fully your knowledge as to the amount so raised?

Ans. It is a mere guess-work, but I suppose some four or five hundred dollars. There was not one-fourth (¼) as much as ought have been raised, a great many refusing to give anything—a large majority refusing to give anything. About three hundred dollars ($300) to my knowledge; it may be a little over or a little less.

11th. Ques. Do you know of any efforts on the part of the partisans of Col. O'Ferrall to induce colored men to vote for Dawson and Cochran who would have voted for Wise and Paul?

Answer. I tried to persuade colored men to vote for Cochran and Dawson. So far as I know, did not succeed in getting a single vote. I know of no one else, except a colored man who was endeavoring to do the same; whether he succeeded or not I do not know.

[Testimony of N. C. McGee, page 57.]

Quest. 2 (by contestant's att'y). From your knowledge of the individual voters and their political affiliations and associations, and from your observation of the polls that day, and of the persons with whom the colored voters came to the polls, and from whom they got their ballots, for whom would you say the colored vote was cast; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

(Objected to by contestee on the ground that the voters referred to are living in this county; that they are the best witnesses on this subject; that this witness can have no positive knowledge on the subject.)

Ans. I should say for Capt. Paul, undoubtedly.

KESWICK PRECINCT.

[Testimony of John Anderson, page 56.]

Quest. 2 (by contestant's att'y). From your observation of the voting that day, and from your knowledge of the voters and the persons who gave them their tickets and came up to the voting place with them, for whom would you say the colored vote at Keswick was cast that day; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

Ans. For Mr. Paul.

Cross-examination:

Quest. 1. Can you read or write?

Ans. No, sir.

Ques. 2. How do you know these votes were for Paul?

Ans. I knew the ticket-issuers for Mr. Paul and Wise, and could tell pretty well from them.

[Testimony of Jefferson R. Taylor, page 59.]

Quest. 2 (by same). From your knowledge of the individual voters at that precinct, and of their political affiliations and associates, and from your observation of the persons from whom the negroes got their ballots, and who came up to the polls with them, for whom would you say the colored vote there was cast; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

Ans. Paul, almost solidly.

Quest. 3 (by same). Please state the facts on which your conclusion is based.

Ans. I was appointed by the county superintendent of the Conservative party to attend to the interests of the party at Keswick precinct. I was to be and was assisted in looking after votes by several other voters at the precinct. Either myself or some of these men who were acting with me, and under my eye, met every colored voter who offered to vote at the precinct. They were also met by men acting for the Readjuster party. I do not remember one instance in which the Readjuster managers failed to take off the colored men who offered to vote, and were met by agents of both parties, to the polls and watch over them until they had voted. They took their tickets from the Readjuster managers, and I suppose voted the Readjuster ticket.

LINDSAY'S PRECINCT.

Question 2d (by contestant's att'y). State whether or not you noticed whether the colored vote at your precinct was controlled at the last election by the partisans of either of the candidates for Congress from this district; and if so, in the interest of which candidate was the colored vote controlled and cast; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

(Excepted to on the ground that the voters themselves must be called to testify as to how their votes were cast, or it must be shown that their evidence can not be obtained.)

Ans. My observation is that it was for Paul. There was a large number of colored voters there in the morning who did not vote until the evening, and rushed to the polls very soon after Mr. N. Branham arrived on the place, who acknowledged that he brought capitation-tax receipts for a good many. He was a partisan of Mr. Paul, and a very strong one.

Cross-examination:

1st Q. (by contestee by counsel). You have said that the colored vote at Lindsay's precinct was generally cast for Paul; how do you know that fact?

Ans. By their being brought up by the partisans of Paul.

MILTON PRECINCT.

[Testimony of J. Massie Smith, page 28.]

Question 2d (by contestant's attorney). From your observation of the polls that day, from your knowledge of the individual voters and their political affiliations and associates, from your observation of the persons who gave out the ballots to the colored voters and came up to the polls with them, for whom would you say the colored vote was cast at the last election at Milton; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

Ans. It was for Paul. The ticket holders were Republicans, Jas. T. S. Taylor and Jas. Thomas, both colored men. These men went up with nearly all the voters—would go up with the voters and exhibit the tax tickets of the voters. Taylor went with the colored voters to the polls, and I saw him very often give the voter the ballot and the tax ticket just at the door of the room in which the poll was held, and I saw James Thomas do the same. This answer refers to the colored voters at this precinct. I saw Jas. T. S. Taylor take a small book from his pocket, which looked as if it were a memoranda book, write something in or on the book, I don't know which (I tried to see), and he immediately handed a tax ticket to a voter, to a colored voter. Jas. T. S. Taylor tried to vote Randal Johnson on Randal Jackson's ticket, and I challenged the vote and his vote was refused.

Ques. 3 (by same). State whether Randal Jackson had already voted on that tax receipt.

Ans. I can't say positively that he had voted.

[Testimony of W. R. Staehlin, page 731.]

Quest. 3 (by contestant's attorney). Do you know whether or not many persons at Milton who in elections heretofore voted the Readjuster ticket, when the debt was the main issue at the last election, voted the Democratic ticket, and do you know whether John E. Massey has a strong personal following at Milton precinct?

(Counsel for contestee excepts to this question as only calling for a hearsay answer.)

Ans. There were some, a few white persons, who voted for him who did not vote for him in previous elections; but there were many colored men who voted for him before, but did not vote for him this time. He did not have the following he had in previous elections there.

4th. Quest. State who nearly all the colored people there voted for.

(Excepted to, because he can't know under the ballot system, and his opinion is not evidence.—MONTAGUE.)

Ans. I can't say who the majority of the colored voters voted for; I think the majority of the colored and white votes were for Massey and O'Ferrall.

5th. For whom did you vote?

Ans. I voted the Readjuster ticket square through and through.

Further this deponent saith not.

MONTICELLO HOUSE PRECINCT.

Question 3 (contestant's attorney). State which of the two candidates for Congress from this district the colored voters supported at the last November election at your precinct.

(Excepted to by counsel for contestee, because the evidence must be secondary if answered by the witness, and under the ballot system he can not know with sufficient certainty to answer.)

Answer. John Paul and John S. Wise.

Question 3d. State your means of knowing this.

Answer. I know from whom they got their tickets, and who these ticket-holders were supporters of.

Question 6th (by contestant's attorney). Did you hold meetings of the colored voters in the various neighborhoods you visited on your canvass, and address them, and confer with them, individually, on the subject of which candidate they should and would support in the election then about to come off?

Answer. I did in some of them. Some of them I held meetings and in some of them I conferred with them through their leaders.

Question 7th (by same). State which of the two candidates for Congress from this district the colored people of this county voted for at the last election; was it Paul or O'Ferrall?

Answer. The majority of them voted more solidly than usual than since the Presidential election; the majority voted for Paul and Wise. My impression is the majority of them voted for Paul and Wise; but I could not know. I was judge of election at Monticello House precinct and could not see anywhere else.

Question 8th (by same). From your opportunities of judging, state whether the colored vote of the county was not almost solid for Paul and Wise; that is, were there not but very few who voted for O'Ferrall?

Answer. I don't know that I had any opportunity of knowing after I canvassed and did all I could for them. My opinion is, after my canvass they would go solid for Paul and Wise.

NORTH GARDEN PRECINCT.

[Testimony of Holmes Bowles, page 28.]

Question 1 (by counsel for contestant). Please state where you reside, how long you have resided there, and where you vote.

Ans. I reside in the neighborhood of North Garden, in Albemarle County; some ten years in that neighborhood; I vote at North Garden precinct.

Question 2 (by same). State whether or not you have been an influential leader of your race (the colored race) in politics at that precinct for several years, and did you work among the colored voters just previous to the last election in the interest of either candidate for Congress; and, if so, for which candidate did you work? Was it Paul or O'Ferrall?

Ans. Yes, sir. I have used my influence among my race, the colored race. Yes, I used my influence previous to the election in the interest of Hon. John Paul.

Question 3 (by same). Were you present at the polls at North Garden all day at the last election?

Ans. Yes, sir; I was present there all day at the last election.

Question 4 (by same). From your opportunities of knowing—from your work before and your presence at the election—for whom should you say the colored vote was cast; for Paul or O'Ferrall?

Ans. I would say for Paul, with a few exceptions.

PORTER'S PRECINCT.

[Testimony of J. C. Childress, page 331.]

Ques. 1 (by counsel for contestant). Please state where you reside, how long you have resided there, where you vote, and whether you have not been active in the politics of this county for many years, and exercised a large influence over the colored vote.

Ans. I live between Porter's precinct and Howardsville, in Albemarle County; have lived there about 69 years: I vote at Porter's precinct; I have been active in the politics of this county for many years; I have usually exercised a large influence over the colored voters.

Question 2 (by same). From your opportunities of knowing, from having worked among and conversed with many negroes on the subject of politics just before the last election, and from your observation of the polls on election day, how would you say the colored vote was cast at Porter's; that is, for which of the candidates from this district was it cast?

Ans. They voted the Readjuster ticket, for Mr. Paul, about unanimous; I don't know of one who did not.

Ques. 3 (by same). Did you have much talk among the negro voters at other precincts before the election; and, if so, what was the sentiment prevailing among them as to which candidate they should support, especially the precincts of Scottsville and Howardsville?

Ans. I electioneered for Dawson, and in that way I saw most of the negroes, but did not succeed in getting them to vote for him. I went to Scottsville and Howardsville, tried to get them to vote the Republican ticket, but they were all for the Readjuster ticket, for Paul and Wise.

Cross-examination by counsel for the contestee:

Ques. 1. You say you do not know of one negro who did not vote for John Paul; can you say on oath you know of your own knowledge how a single person except yourself voted at the election held Nov. 7th, 1882?

Ans. No, sir; of course I don't. I did not read a ticket or touch one. There was no vote for Dawson when they reported. I know though that I voted for him. I did not read the darkies' votes; only know how they told me they voted.

[Testimony of Archie Bland, page 35.]

Ques. 1 (by counsel for contestant). Please state where you reside, where you vote, whether or not you are a leader in politics among the colored voters at your precinct, who you supported at the last election, and whether you were present all day at the polls.

Ans. I live at Porter's precinct, Albemarle County, Virginia, where I vote; I have been a leader among the colored voters there for fifteen (15) years. At the last election I was present at the window of the voting-place from sunrise to sunset. I supported Mr. Wise and Mr. Paul.

Ques. 2 (by same). From the work you did among the colored people and your talk with them, and from your observation of the voting at Porter's that day, for whom would you say the colored vote at that precinct was cast; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

Ans. For Mr. Paul and Mr. Wise. Mr. O'Ferrall's name was not called at all, except by those who did not let their votes be known. They would not tell who they voted for, but when they were counted it was found those few who dodged around had voted for O'Ferrall. I could not tell exactly how many, but they might have been some twenty-five; there were not many of them.

Ques. 3 (by same). How many colored voters voted at Porter's last election, as near as you can tell?

Ans. I could not tell exactly, as I did not take sight on the quantity.

STONY POINT PRECINCT.

[Testimony of Philip Nelson, page 68.]

Question 2 (by counsel for contestant). From your observation of the polls that day how should you say the colored vote was cast; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

(Objected to, as this is not the best evidence that can be procured, and because the question is too general. Nobody can testify to how a voter casts his vote until the voter himself has testified, or until it is shown that his testimony can not be had; and, secondly, all of the colored voters did not vote the same way; consequently such a question is too general.)

Ans. For Paul, with a few exceptions.

SCOTTSVILLE PRECINCT.

[Testimony of Jonathan Browning, page 41.]

Ques. 2 (by counsel for contestant). From your knowledge of the individual voters and of their political affiliations and associates, and from your observation of the persons from whom the negro voters at Scottsville got their ballots last election day, and who came up to the polls with them, and from your experience in canvassing among the negroes in the interest of your candidates, for whom would you say the negro vote at Scottsville was cast that day, Paul or O'Ferrall?

Ans. It was cast solidly for Paul, I think, with one exception. I don't know of but one negro that voted the other way.

WHITE HALL PRECINCT.

[Testimony of J. A. Early, page 691.]

2d Ques. by same. State whether or not you noticed whether the colored vote at your precinct was controlled at last election by the partisans of either of the candidates for Congress from this district; and, if so, in the interest of which candidate was the colored vote controlled and cast; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

Ans. Well, the colored vote was controlled by the friends of Mr. Paul. I do not believe there were but two colored votes cast for O'Ferrall. I know there was two.

WINGFIELD'S PRECINCT.

Quest. 2 (by counsel for contestant). From your work among the voters that day, and from your observation of the parties who gave them their tickets and went up to the polls with them, how would you say the colored vote there was cast that day; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?

Ans. In behalf of Mr. Paul and Wise the only person who issued tickets there was myself up to the time I came away, about 3.30 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon. I then gave the tickets to Mr. John Kennie. And of course all those I issued were voted in the interest of Paul and Wise. In my judgment, up to the time I left they were in the majority for Paul and Wise. I did not look over the poll-books, but I approached pretty much every one who came, both colored and white.

Quest. 3 (by same). Do you know of any persons who voted there that day who said they had not paid their taxes; if so, who were they?

Ans. I don't know of any.

Quest. 4 (by same). Did not Frederick Small, or Adam Dyer, or John Barber, or Parks Smith, or Henry Smith, or Wm. E. Terrell, or Phillip Scott, or Robert Fry, either, or any or all of them, vote, admitting either that they had never been assessed or had not paid their tax?

Ans. I don't recollect anything about it.

Cross-examination:

Quest. 1. Can you say of your own personal knowledge how any one voted at Wingfield's precinct, Albemarle County, Va., on last election day?

Ans. Yes, sir; I can. All those that I gave tickets to I required them to give me their tax tickets, and as there was two tickets to be voted I went to the polls with them, handing a ticket first for the candidate and then the ticket for the repeal of the constitutional amendment.

Mr. LOWRY. Mr. Speaker, with a view to a free and full opportunity for discussion by the other side I will again call attention to the point whether it will be desirable to have any understanding as to the time when a vote may be taken upon this question.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COOK], a member of the Committee on Elections, will want an hour; the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE], a member of the committee, an hour, and I myself would like to have an hour in case I find it necessary to consume any time whatever. It may be that I shall not occupy the floor, but I would like to have the privilege of doing so if I find it necessary. That will be three hours on the minority side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COBB in the chair). The Chair has nothing to do with regulating the time, but presumes that gentlemen can agree among themselves upon the length of time to be consumed in the debate. The gentleman from Indiana can of course demand the previous question whenever he sees fit to do so.

Mr. LOWRY. It is understood that the House will be occupied in the discussion of another topic on to-morrow, and it is desired, I take it, on all hands to get through with this case to-day. I think it will be reasonable, Mr. Speaker, to divide the time up until the hour of half past 4 o'clock.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. There is no necessity for forcing a vote to-day. The case can go over until Wednesday. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. LOWRY. I think it may therefore be understood, in view of the fact that no present arrangement can be effected, that the previous question will be called at half past 4 to-day.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I certainly will not give my assent to any such arrangement as that. If the gentleman sees fit to force this matter to a vote without discussion, as they have forced the consideration of the question without the minority views being printed, they have of course the power to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the substitute offered by the minority of the committee.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I certainly will not agree that a vote shall be taken upon this without discussion. The gentleman from Indiana I understood was on the floor prepared to proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is for the House to determine. The Chair has waited, but since no gentleman seems inclined to debate the matter the Chair will put the question.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. We have a right to be heard, I believe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will be heard if he desires to be heard. But no one rose to address the Chair, and the Chair, in obedience to the rules of the House, submits the question first upon the adoption of the resolutions reported by the minority as a substitute for the report of the committee.

Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. COOK. If no one desires to address the House upon that side, or in favor of the report of the majority of the committee, I will begin. But I supposed the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] would occupy the first hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not for the Chair to inquire whether gentlemen propose to address the House or not. After waiting and finding no one inclined to address the House the Chair submits the question. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard?

Mr. COOK. I do, but I prefer to wait until after hearing from the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LOWRY. I addressed the Chair for the purpose of discussing the question now pending and was recognized by the Chair. The Chair, as I understood, recognized some proposition emanating from some other part of the Hall which no gentleman on this side understood. The Chair was not understood by any gentleman in this neighborhood as to what the proposition was, and I was waiting for the purpose of hearing that before proceeding with my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that he recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who asked leave to have an appendix printed to the minority report. After action had been taken upon that the Chair recognized the gentleman from Indiana, supposing that he desired to debate the report. The Chair waited for some time and concluded the gentleman had yielded the floor. If, however, the gentleman states that he was recognized and that he had not yielded the floor the Chair will of course recognize him now.

Mr. KEIFER. Nobody objects.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was not disposed to wait further on the gentleman from Indiana. [Laughter].

Mr. COX, of New York. Regular order!

Mr. LOWRY. Mr. Speaker, we have in Indiana a maxim, and I do not know whether it is well recognized in the region of the State from which the present incumbent of the chair comes or not, but it is one which we found quite wholesome to act upon at times in that portion of the Commonwealth from which I came, and it is that it is sometimes desirable to make haste slowly. I was desirous just now of coming if possible to some understanding so far as the length of time to be consumed in this debate was concerned. For that purpose I had addressed the gentleman from Pennsylvania and had stated to him that I thought it would be reasonable to limit debate in such a manner as that a vote could be taken in the case at half past 4 o'clock. I desire now to say that, having failed to succeed in effecting any understanding with the other side as to the time, so far as I am concerned my inclination will be to afford such reasonable time for discussion as I think will be necessary to bring out all the facts in this case and then ask a vote upon it. I do not think it will be desirable to infringe upon the parliamentary day of to-morrow in this discussion, inasmuch as it is well understood that it is to be devoted to another and a most important topic.

In this case, sir, at the November election in 1882, in the seventh district of the State of Virginia, Charles T. O'Ferrall was the Democratic candidate and John Paul the Readjuster or Coalition candidate for Representative in the Congress of the United States. The constitution of the State of Virginia contains a provision by which the Legislature is authorized to impose a capitation tax as a qualification for voting, and in pursuance of that provision of the constitution the Legislature provided for the imposition of such a capitation tax. There was within the confines of this district a large number of delinquent tax-payers, those that had not paid their capitation tax before the November election. The auditor of public accounts for the State of Virginia had appointed a collector for each of the ten counties comprising this Congressional district, and these collectors had each appointed deputies who claimed authority to collect and issue receipts for these delinquent capitation taxes. The controversy arose in this case as to whether the auditor of public accounts possessed such authority under the laws of the State of Virginia, and at one time the committee had arrived at a conclusion in regard to that matter. Other contested-election cases are pending from the State of Virginia and the same question was raised in those cases.

One of them at least is yet undetermined and unargued. And in order that there might be no conflict between the conclusion arrived at in this case and the conclusion that might be reached in that, the question as to the validity of the appointment of these tax collectors has been held in abeyance by the committee until they have arrived at a conclusion in reference to that case. Not as is stated by the gentleman from Virginia; they have not abandoned the position which was occupied by the majority of the committee in reference to that matter, but have determined to hold it up in order that there might be no embarrassment in determining the question when it comes to be fully considered after being presented by those engaged in its discussion in the case of Massey against Wise, to which I refer more particularly.

These collectors having proceeded with the discharge of the duty which they conceived to be incumbent upon them, issued receipts to delinquent tax-payers, parties delinquent in the payment of their capitation taxes in the ten counties composing this Congressional district. There is no controversy about the fact that the clerks of the several counties have unquestioned authority to receive these delinquent capitation taxes and to issue receipts for them; and that upon the payment to the clerks the parties become duly qualified to vote at the ensuing election. The provision of the statute is that the tax must be paid before the day of election. And the question arose as to whether or not there were payments made in the manner required by law either to the clerks of the several counties or the collectors, assuming them to be qualified to make these collections, who were appointed by the auditor of public accounts, or their deputies.

In order to ascertain who were delinquent in the payment of these capitation taxes the committee have proceeded no further than the county of Albemarle, for the reason that they conceived it to be unnecessary in order to a determination of the merits of this case as between the contestant and the contestee to go beyond an inquiry as to the validity of the vote of that county. The canvassing board returned John Paul as being elected by a majority of 205 votes. Under the statute of the State of Virginia the commissioners of the revenue are required to note upon the record on which the assessment of tax-payers is entered whether the party assessed is white or colored; and the treasurer in making returns of delinquents in the county of Albemarle showed upon his list as set forth by the assessment-list of the commissioners of the revenue the fact as to whether or not the delinquents were white or colored. A witness was introduced in this case who examined the list of delinquents and who compared it with the poll-lists of the voters who had voted at the election for members of Congress in the county of Albemarle; and it was ascertained by him that 667 of the persons who were noted as being colored were persons who voted at the election and were returned as delinquent in the payment of these capitation taxes. The witness who thus examined these records remained uncontradicted. There was no countervailing testimony upon that point.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOWRY. I would rather proceed until the close of my remarks, and if it shall then be in my power to answer any question proposed to me I shall be happy to do it.

By this process it will be seen that it could be ascertained how many of those who had been delinquent and had voted at this election for members of Congress were white or colored; 667, as I have said, of these were ascertained to be colored voters. Thus that fact was ascertained almost to a demonstration in this case.

Then, sir, for the purpose of ascertaining how these 667 delinquent colored voters cast their votes at that election a large amount of testimony was introduced, twenty-one witnesses in all testifying on that point. They testified as to how the votes of the colored people as a class were cast; not throughout the State generally; not throughout the whole Congressional district, but as a class in the county of Albemarle and in the various precincts of that county. And it is shown by these witnesses in a variety of cases that they became conversant with this fact. Many of them were the adherents of the party of which the contestee, Mr. Paul, was a candidate—nearly all of them who testified upon the question. Some of them were present at meetings where colored people congregated together for the purpose of discussing the questions pending during that election. Others were conversant with the views of the colored element in the county of Albemarle. Others knew as to what the personal preferences and predilections of that class of voters were. Others had canvassed the district, and particularly the county of Albemarle, and had thus familiarized themselves with the views and purposes of that element of the voting population. Others had associated with them personally and knew what their personal predilections and party affiliations were. Others had been present at meetings where resolutions were adopted and where the purpose was declared. Some gentlemen who had canvassed the county—one in particular—stated as the result of his observations that he had no doubt that the colored vote was cast almost as a unit for Mr. Paul. In fact, the evidence upon this point, not to amplify further at this time, is so full, complete, and satisfactory in regard to the matter that there can scarcely be a reasonable doubt that this vote was cast en masse for the contestee.

I do not understand gentlemen upon the other side as claiming that there is evidence going to show the contrary. And so far as one of the counties of this Congressional district is concerned, the point was made that the entire colored vote of the county was solid for the contestee; this claim being put forth in the answer to the notice of contest in the case, assuming that as a matter of course, as an undisputed and well-ascertained fact.

A large number of witnesses were also introduced to testify in reference to the manner in which voters who were delinquent in the payment of the capitation tax were supplied with their tickets; in regard to the manner in which they were distributed; in regard to the manner in which they were handed out at the polls; in regard to the manner in which they came into the possession of the collectors and their deputies; and in regard to the time in which they were passed out of the hands of these deputies to the voters.

It will be remembered, as I have already remarked, that the statute of Virginia prescribes that this capitation tax must be paid not later than the day preceding the election. The testimony all goes to establish the fact that none of these delinquents either paid their tax or were provided with tax-tickets, as they are called in that State, or, as they will be more familiarly known to members of this House, tax-receipts, until the day of election.

It however appears in the proof in this case that in the county of Albemarle no payment of the taxes was made for the tickets which were issued to the collectors (with the exception of the sum of $125), until long after the election. James T. Wayland was the collector appointed by the auditor of public accounts in that county, and in his turn he appointed a large number of deputies. Without at this time going into a minute examination or analysis of his testimony, I will state that in substance it appears from his evidence that a check for the sum of $440, I think, had been sent to him.

It appears that he had a private clerk, a person who is denominated a clerk. I do not know that it appears distinctly whether or not he was acting simply as his private clerk or in some official capacity; but it does not appear that he was acting as deputy collector, assuming that there could be such an officer as deputy collector. Wayland, however, never saw that check until some sixteen days after the election. At that time it came into his hands for the first time, and he indorsed it and sent it in to the treasurer of the State of Virginia.

There was the sum of $125 which had been transmitted to him in bulk before the election. In arriving at the conclusion which we have reached in this case the committee have not deemed it necessary to go into an investigation of the fact whether or not that would constitute a proper payment of this capitation tax so as to authorize individual voters to vote. That sum of $125 came into his hands. A larger fund came into hands, and of that larger fund he appropriated $125 to pay for these delinquent capitation receipts.

Without raising in this case the question as to whether or not that constituted a proper payment of the tax, the committee allow credit for the amount of money thus coming into his hands, and making a calculation as to the number of receipts that sum would pay for, each voter under the provisions of the statute of the State having to pay $1.05, or at least the sum of $1—I think there is some controversy whether the additional 5 cents was properly imposed—but assuming that $1.05 was the sum which each voter was required to pay in order that he might be entitled to vote, that $125 would pay the tax for 119 voters. Now, deducting that number from the 676 votes which it was shown were cast up on collectors' receipts, there would be left 557 votes, which we think are clearly shown as having been cast for the contestee in this case, Mr. Paul, and should be deducted from the vote accorded to him by the canvassing board.

The votes of one of the precincts of this county were thrown out by the canvassing board, as stated in the majority report, upon a mere technicality, because of the non-sealing of the envelope in which the certificates of the board were returned. The majority of the committee accord to Mr. Paul the right to the votes cast in that precinct. Deducting that number from the majority which it was ascertained Mr. Paul would have after deducting the 119 votes, that would leave 248 votes as the majority for the contestant. The conclusion of the majority of the committee is that leaving out of consideration the question as to the other counties in the district, in all of which these tax-receipts were issued in a similar manner through these collectors to their deputies and by them distributed in many instances without the payment of the capitation tax by the voters—at best there being only a payment in bulk, large sums of money being placed in their hands for the purpose—leaving out of calculation the question in reference to those counties, the majority of the committee consider that this will show the majority of votes to which the contestant in this case is clearly entitled.

This is a brief statement of the grounds upon which the majority of the committee rest their report in favor of the contestant in this case. I will reserve the remainder of my time and give way to other gentlemen who desire to speak.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CASSIDY). The gentleman has thirty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. LOWRY. I thought I had forty minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. According to the information given to the present occupant of the chair as to when the gentleman commenced his remarks, he now has thirty minutes remaining.

Mr. HEPBURN. In opening the discussion of this question against the report of the majority, I desire to call the attention of the House to the very peculiar position in which this case now is. I think that I might make some complaint against my colleague on the committee who has just taken his seat [Mr. LOWRY] with regard to the attitude that he has assumed with reference to this case.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that up to this time no opportunity has been given for the minority of the committee in that orderly and usual way recognized as proper by this House to place their views of the case before the House. Some time ago, three or four weeks ago, the gentleman who has just taken his seat prepared an elaborate report, embodying, as he supposed, the views of the majority of the committee, which report was discussed in committee. The minority of the committee prepared their views with reference to that report of the majority, which views were presented by the minority to the full committee, and they were discussed.

The result was that the distinguished gentleman was driven from many of the positions that he had assumed, so that he was unwilling, in the light of the investigation that ensued, to commit himself to the views he had expressed in that report. He therefore asked and obtained permission to revamp his report, and for the first time it was permitted to see the light on last Saturday morning. I do not believe that it has yet been distributed. For one I have never seen it, and until two hours ago did not know that it was in print; and up to this time there has been no opportunity for that usual reply that the minority would have a right to make.

Not only that, sir, but this case has been pressed upon the House at this time in opposition to the unanimous view of the Committee on Elections, because the gentleman himself stated that in voting upon the question his vote was pro forma simply. It was not the desire of the Committee on Elections that this case should be called up this morning. They recognized the unfairness of such procedure, and by this united vote to which I have called your attention declared their conviction that propriety required there should be such delay, so that the report of the minority, containing their argument, should be laid upon the desks of members. Hence the committee this morning resolved that this case ought not to be taken up for consideration before next Wednesday morning.

But, Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some remarkable exigency for this haste. The gentleman, usually so courteous, would not, in my humble judgment, have outraged propriety as he has done, would not have trampled upon decency as he has done, unless there was some reason beyond that which is apparent to the average member of the House. The minority of the committee had a right to be heard in the ordinary way. We had a right to have our views laid upon the desks of members, so that they could see upon what flimsy pretexts, upon what miserable pretenses, it is proposed now to seat the contestant in this case.

Mr. Speaker, as you must have observed, it is claimed that the contestant should be seated solely upon the vote in Albemarle County. The majority have abandoned all the other nine counties in the district, and have contented themselves with saying that such facts cluster around the vote of this county as justify them in the report they have made. Now, in this district the contestee had a clear majority of 205 votes; having that majority, he received the certificate.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. The majority of the committee concede he is entitled to 104 more, making 309.

Mr. HEPBURN. I was coming to that. But he was entitled to and received his certificate upon this majority of 205, to which the addition of 104, by reason of an erroneous count, must be given him. Now, these gentlemen must overcome that majority of 309 votes; and by their own confession they are limited to the one county of Albemarle in order to accomplish it.

How is it proposed to do it, and what is the character of evidence upon which they have arrived at their conclusion? They say that votes were cast at that election by 667 colored men whose names appear on the delinquent capitation list. Now, I am ready to admit that this list under the law should designate whether the delinquent is white or colored; and therefore if it contains the statement that an individual is colored, being in the nature of a record, the committee have a right to rely upon that fact. But how do they find out that the parties whose names appear upon the poll-books are colored? Simply because the letter "C," by the voluntary act of some one, we know not whom, some one whose duty it was not made by the law to place it there, has been written after each one of these 667 names. There is no authority for so designating these voters on the poll-lists; the law does not require it; it is not the duty of any one to do it. The man who placed the letter there was not, in doing so, acting under the solemnities of an oath. The letter thus written opposite these names is not in any sense a part of a record; it is not in any sense exemplified. No man has pretended to swear that those persons against whose names this letter "C," indicating "colored," appears were in fact colored voters. But the majority of the committee have assumed that they were colored.

There has then been introduced a witness who testifies, not as my friend stated a while ago, that the 667 persons whose names appear upon the delinquent-list did in fact vote. That is not in proof. No man has said it. It is simply in proof that there are corresponding names upon the two lists; and these gentlemen have assumed the identity of the individuals. But there is, it seems to me, a very marked distinction. Where they have found, for instance, the name of George Washington upon the delinquent-list and the name of George Washington upon the tax-list, the majority of the committee have assumed that the name on the two lists is the name of one and the same person. Yet it may be true that there are scores and scores of persons so named in that county. Hence the assumption of the majority of the committee is entirely unwarranted.

These gentlemen assume that there are more than 500 of these voters who did not pay their capitation tax. They admit that of the 667, the total, 125 did pay their capitation tax. The remainder, they say, did not. Yet, Mr. Speaker, it is in proof that in the hands of the clerk of the collector of that county, as the gentleman himself said in his remarks, there was before the election day $440 to be used in payment of the capitation tax of these voters. But right here the gentlemen grow technical; and although this money was in the hands of this clerk, the one who was transacting the business, the one who was recognized by his principal, the one who was authorized by him to do the business and who did it, they say that because the money had not reached the hands of the collector therefore the money is not to be regarded as in his hands, the payment was not made, and the votes should not be counted.

Is not that a little technical? We have a right to assume that the laws of the State of Virginia requiring the payment of this tax are for the purpose of aiding the revenue of the State. No gentleman will claim that they are clogs, impediments, obstructions in the way of free suffrage. No man will claim that the enginery of the great State of Virginia has been invoked in order to rob these men of their right to vote.

No gentlemen on the other side will claim that it has been the purpose of this great Commonwealth to ostracise certain of its citizens, to prevent them from the exercise of the right of suffrage; but, on the contrary, it will be their claim and it ought to be our belief that Virginia, when imposing this tax, simply means it shall be a revenue measure, a means by which so much of the hard earnings of her sons shall go into the treasury of the State.

And right here let me say, Mr. Speaker, no man disputes that every dollar of this $125 and the $440 has gone into the treasury of Virginia, and is there to-day unless expended. No man claims but that the purpose of the law, of this revenue measure, has been effectual in bringing into the coffers of the State $565 from these colored people. That is beyond dispute. The State has the money.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as these provisions are simply revenue measures, and are for the purpose of adding to the revenue, whether you find them in the constitution or statutes, the method of collection, the time and place of collection, are simply directory and not mandatory, the object being to secure revenue. True, the time and place may be stated, but if the object is to secure revenue, and if any other time will do as well, if any other pl ace will do as well, if any other person will do as well, then the statute is but directory, and if the object of securing revenue is accomplished, then the object of the law is attained.

The State of Virginia has the money, the State of Virginia has been the beneficiary, and it seems to me now it would be the grossest of injustice to say these men whose money the State clings to tenaciously, these men who have done all they could do to fit themselves for the discharge of this duty—it would be a most ungracious act to say because of some technicality such as my friend has suggested their rights are to be questioned and their votes excluded from the count.

Mr. Speaker, there is no dispute about the fact of this $440 being in the hands of the clerk of the collector prior to the election. I appeal to the language of my colleague on the committee. It was his statement, and I borrow it from him. There is no dispute but $125 was paid before the day of the election in addition to this $440. There is a total of $565—payment for 565 tax receipts.

Now, sir, if we were to admit what the committee claims in regard to the remainder there would be but 105 votes disposed of, while they must dispose of 309 in order to overcome the clear majority of the contestee.

Let me call your attention, Mr. Speaker, if you please, to another important question, and that is as to how the 667 troublesome voters that so much perturbed the majority of the committee—how are they to be disposed of in reference to the question of how they voted? I say of that whole number of 667 neither the gentleman who has just taken his seat nor any other member of the committee can lay his finger on a single voter and say this voter voted for the contestee. Not one. There is no attempt to individualize the vote. There is no attempt to show that John Jones or John Brown or George Washington voted for the contestee or for the contestant. Gentlemen console themselves or rather content themselves with guessing at the whole class of voters, and that, too, in the case of entire townships or voting precincts where there is not one solitary word of testimony as to how the voters of that particular township or precinct voted. There are several of these, and I challenge the attention of my friend who has just taken his seat to this portion of his report.

I assert there are many townships whose vote he has excluded that no living witness, white or black, has in any way challenged. They have contented themselves by showing that in the opinion of the witness the colored people as a class in the whole country or in the whole district voted for a particular candidate. They have not attempted to show that any of these challenged voters individually voted for the contestee in this case.

But the contestant called witnesses and put such questions as this:

How did the colored voter of such a county or such a district vote?

And the answer is simply of this character:

The most of them, I think, voted the Readjuster ticket; or, a large majority of them, I think, voted the Readjuster ticket; or, it is my opinion that the large proportion of them voted the Readjuster ticket; I think they mostly voted for Wise and Paul.

But, sir, no man has had the temerity to say that all the colored people voted the Readjuster ticket.

Mr. LOWRY. Will you allow me?

Mr. HEPBURN. Did you allow me?

Mr. LOWRY. I would inquire of the gentleman what witness he alludes to as using such qualified language?

Mr. HEPBURN. I can not name the particular witness now, but I will make the general statement that the great majority who were called by the contestant contented themselves with just this kind of qualified statement.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in some instances they give the reasons for their belief. They say that their leaders voted the Readjuster ticket; that their head men voted it; they say that the distributers of tickets voted the Readjuster ticket, and they think from all of these causes and from other conditions existing that the majority of these people voted that ticket. That is the conclusion of the majority. Why, sir, how unsafe this would be if adopted as a rule of evidence. Suppose there was but a single vote in the contest in dispute, who would then be content to say that proof such as I have called your attention to would be sufficient to keep out that one vote, whereas it is now claimed by this committee as sufficient to exclude 667 votes? I do not believe that any sane man ought to. And yet that is the principle, that is the method these gentlemen have adopted here. They have not called the witnesses and asked them how they voted.

They have not sought to get the better class of testimony. But refusing to do that, they attempt to make a secondary class of testimony competent. They have been content to go beyond the elements of secondary proof and give to the House simply these speculations and beliefs and opinions of men upon this question. How unsafe this must be is apparent to all, and I can not understand how any gentleman could be willing to trust himself to act in matters of this important character upon testimony like that. My friend who made the report said, as I understood him, it was conceded that the colored people all voted the Readjuster ticket. I do not know who has made that concession. I have never heard it before. On the contrary, there were proofs from their own side that more than one hundred of these colored people voted the Democratic ticket.

And if I might appeal to the current literature that we have for years seen, when outrages upon suffrage have been charged against the Democracy, we would not have to go far before we could find in all the prints of the Democratic persuasion constant insistings that there was a division of the colored vote in the South and that the colored people knew who their friends were. We hear it frequently said that they have a strong affection for their old masters, that they know who fed them and provided for them, and that they vote as this class desired them to vote. How familiar that kind of talk is upon this question! But now, sir, the opposite seems to be conceded because it happens to be necessary to sustain my friend's methods and argument, and he must take the other horn of the dilemma and insist that it is a truth now that the colored people all vote in opposition to the Democratic party. If the House is to act upon this question as claimed by the majority, I want such action to operate as an estoppel against them in future when they propose to make their annual denials, as they will do at each succeeding election; and to my friend especially I commend his own statement when he proposes to wipe out all of the charges that are made about outrages in the South by the easy pretense that the colored vote is divided, that there is no solidity or unification of it, and that as many of the colored people in the South vote the Democratic ticket as any other.

Mr. Speaker, I have occupied more of the time of the House than it was my purpose to do; but I want to say in conclusion that I do not believe, upon the sober second thought, this House can afford to seat the contestant. In order to do so there must be so many outrages upon the laws of evidence, upon the methods that have heretofore been adopted, upon the rules of procedure that have been established, upon the right and justice and verities of this case, that I do not think gentlemen can afford to commit themselves to the proposition that a whole community, 676 persons, must be ostracized and robbed of their votes when there is no other shortcoming upon their part than that a payment into the treasury of the State of Virginia has been delayed until three weeks beyond an election, when the law of the Commonwealth gives to the officer an entire year in which to make his statement or account and settlement. I do not think the House can consent to so disregard all of the well-established precedents for the production of testimony that they will seat this contestant solely because a number of witnesses have said that in their judgment and opinion the majority or the mass of the colored people voted against the Democratic party and in favor of the Readjuster party. And yet you have got to say that; you have got to give the seat to this contestant upon this ground and upon this class of evidence and upon no other, for that is all there is in the case.

I now yield the remainder of my time to my colleague on the committee [Mr. COOK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. COOK addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. LOWRY. I yield fifteen minutes to my colleague [Mr. WARD].

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, the only distinguished service which I can claim to have rendered to my constituents thus far is in the fact that I have maintained silence on this floor. I think my constituents are indebted to me for this, and the House is under an equal obligation. Nor, sir, had I any intention of breaking that silence this morning; but I can not be silent nor will I ever withhold my voice when a gentleman contending for a seat here, whose right in my judgment is unquestioned, demands simple justice, and when it is manifest that the opposition to him is factious, partisan, and unreasonable. To be silent under such circumstances would be a plain dereliction of duty.

Speaking for myself individually, here and now I wish to say that upon a question of this kind, a question of a contested election in this House, I will never consent to consult anything but my judgment and my conscience. I will never consent to view these questions from a partisan standpoint. I will never consent to sit here in judgment on these cases except as a judge trying the case upon the law and upon the facts. I would not vote to seat any man here simply because he belonged to my party. I am a partisan, and a strong one; but I repeat it, sir, I will never consent to seat any man here simply and solely because he happens to belong to my party. It is because I believe this contestant has an indisputable right to his seat that I rise to briefly advocate his claims.

So far as I have been able to examine this case—and I am compelled to admit my examination has been cursory, but I have read this report and I have heard measurably, as well as I could hear, the report of the minority which was read in the House this morning—so far, I say, as I have been able to inform myself, I think the case before us is clear, strong, irresistible. It stands upon the law; it stands upon the evidence. It commends itself to the conscience and intelligence of every gentleman in this House, and the right of the contestant to his seat ought to be conceded by every member cheerfully, promptly, without a moment's hesitation.

What is the case? I find from the report of the majority of the committee that they plant themselves chiefly upon the proposition that a large number of persons who voted for the contestee had not fulfilled the requirements of the law in that they had failed to pay what is known as the capitation tax. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] says that the capitation tax is merely a tax for revenue. That is a remarkable proposition, to my mind, as coming from a gentleman of acknowledged ability as a lawyer. A tax for revenue simply! Sir, the payment of this tax is a qualification of the voter. It is made a prerequisite to every man's right to vote in the State of Virginia. This tax is grounded upon a statute, and that statute is grounded upon the constitution of the State. Does anybody doubt the right of the State of Virginia to impose such a qualification? The gentleman says it is simply for revenue purposes. I say, sir, that in the State of Virginia in 1882, when this election was held, it was just as essential that a voter should have paid his dollar of capitation tax as that he should have lived in the State twelve months, and in the city where he asked to vote three months—just as essential as that he should have been 21 years of age, just as essential as any other qualification that may have been prescribed by the constitution of Virginia or by any statute of the State.

Now what is the evidence? I can not go into detail. I have not time; and I am obliged to admit I have not read this record in full. I have failed to do so simply and solely because it was my understanding, until I came into the House this morning, that gentlemen on the other side would content themselves by voting against the contestant, and would not ask for any discussion of the case. What I am saying is chiefly founded upon the report of the majority of the committee. I assume that it contains the facts.

Briefly, what are those facts? That five hundred and fifty-seven men who voted at that election failed to pay the capitation tax. For whom were these votes cast? What is the evidence on that point? It is said there is nothing definite on this question; that we can not tell for whom these votes were cast. Sir, looking at this matter as a lawyer, looking at it, as I trust, with judicial impartiality, the evidence is sufficient to satisfy my mind, or that I think of any reasonable person, that these 557 men who thus voted belonged to the Republican party, were colored voters, and cast their votes for the contestee. Who testifies to this? Is there any testimony upon the point, or is there an absence of testimony on this question? There is positive testimony upon it. It comes from the lips of twenty-one witnesses. It comes from witnesses who were in a position to know. It comes from men who attended the election on that day, and who testify that these votes were cast for the contestee, and that they were all the votes of colored men.

Some of these witnesses are Republicans—some of them are colored men, and not one person who appeared upon the witness-stand has testified to the contrary. Does any reasonable person suppose for one moment that if it had been possible to successfully controvert this one prominent, controlling fact in the case it would not have been done? And yet there has not been even an attempt to controvert it. Sir, in the last Congress it was held by the Republican Committee on Elections and by a Republican House that the uncontradicted testimony of two witnesses was sufficient to establish the fact that the colored voters of an entire Congressional district voted the Republican ticket. But here we have twenty-one witnesses, whose testimony is wholly undisputed, testifying that the 557 colored men in a single county, to whom tax receipts were furnished by Republican tax-collectors, voted for the contestee. Is there a gentleman upon this floor who has any moral doubt of the fact? Probandum est.

I am not making any attack upon these voters because they were colored men. I am simply trying the case upon the law and the evidence. Those votes were cast for the contestee. Being thus cast, and being illegal votes, if you deduct them from the votes received by the contestee, the result as shown by the report of the committee is that this contestant is elected by 248 majority.

How happens it that these votes were thus cast? For what purpose? What does the record show in this behalf? What is the uniform testimony of all these witnesses? It is that these tax-receipts were issued by the partisans of the contestee. They were not issued because the tax had been paid. There is no pretense that prior to this election more than $125 had been paid in this way into the treasury of the State. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] said that the clerk or some other person—I did not understand who from his remarks—held a check or a draft for $400, which was applied in payment of the capitation tax for these persons who voted.

That is not the evidence. I respectfully say, according to my reading of the report, that the gentleman is quite in error.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him with a statement?

Mr. WARD. I am nearly scared to death now. Please do not interrupt me. [Great laughter.] I do not understand that to be the evidence. I understand the evidence to be this: The gentleman who received that check or draft never did receive it until one month after the election had taken place.

What is the meaning of this capitation tax, Mr. Speaker? I say it is an essential prerequisite to a man's right to vote. Even if the $400 had been paid into the State treasury before the votes were cast, you could not say it could be applied as capitation tax. There was no direction as to where it should be applied, and it is not pretended that there was. The tax was a personal debt which the voter was bound to pay before he could exercise the high prerogative of the elective franchise.

I do not claim or pretend that some other man might not have paid it for the voter. I say if four hundred persons wanted to vote and $400 were paid into the Treasury, indiscriminately, without any direction as to its application, it would not be a fulfillment of the law. I do not believe there is any gentleman on this floor who belongs to the profession of the law who would claim any such construction.

Mr. MILLER. I will cite you authorities.

Mr. WARD. A gentleman suggests to me the authorities you will cite will be Philadelphia authorities, and I will say to the gentleman they are not worth a cent out in Indiana where I live. [Laughter.] I do not know what they may be worth in Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARD. I do not yield to anybody in the world. [Laughter.] I am pretty nearly through, and when I have finished you can all take the floor.

It is my firm conviction from the hasty and cursory examination I have been able to make of the record and testimony in this case that the contestant is entitled to his seat, and because I believe he is so entitled on the evidence I speak for him and shall vote for him.

I repeat, I am one person on this side of the House, and I trust there are many who will never be found voting for any person to take his seat here simply and solely because he happens to belong to my party. I know bad precedents have been set by both parties, but bad precedents should be changed into good examples. We ought to amend our habits and conduct in this respect, and so far as I am concerned I propose never to make a record of that kind.

Now, sir, I have submitted these brief remarks earnestly, because they grew out of my profound conviction of the right of this contestant to take his seat. He does not come here asking any favor at our hands as partisans. He comes as the legally-elected Representative of the seventh district of the Commonwealth of Virginia. His title is as clear as yours or mine. I can not doubt that it will be recognized and confirmed.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, before I pass to the consideration of this case I desire to make a few corrections for the benefit of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WARD], who states he has only cursorily read the majority report and heard a little of the minority report filed this morning and read at the Clerk's desk. He stated, if I understood him correctly, that this capitation-tax provision was not a revenue measure. Permit me to inform him that this capitation-tax provision was adopted in the Virginia constitution of 1850 and has been in all of her constitutions and all the enactments of that State from that time down to this, but it was only in the year 1877–'78 that the payment of such tax was made a prerequisite for voting.

And what does the State of Virginia herself declare this tax is for? Article 10, section 5, of the constitution reads as follows:

> The General Assembly may levy a tax not exceeding $1 per annum on every male citizen who has attained the age of 21 years, which shall be applied in aid of the public free schools.

Why, sir, by the very provision of the constitution of Virginia that tax is declared to be a tax for revenue. By the constitution of 1876–'77 and the act of 1877–'78 the payment of it was made a prerequisite of voting for the express purpose of enforcing the payment of that tax.

Again, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WARD] stated that it did not appear in the evidence that this draft for $440 paid to Collector Wayland on delinquent taxes was in the hands of the clerk of the collector before the election. Why, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] who drew the majority report, and who has but taken his seat, stated in his remarks, as an admitted fact, that the draft was in the hands of the clerk of the collector or some person acting as his clerk before the election. It strikes me that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WARD] not only read this majority report in a cursory manner but failed to listen to the remarks of his colleague.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WARD] again stated that it was a fact that 557 persons voted for the contestee who had not paid their capitation tax. I ask him now, and I will give him time to answer me, to name one of the 557 persons. He says he has read this report. He said he had, in a cursory manner, examined the testimony. Now, I yield to him to name one of the 557 who he says it is a fact voted for the contestee who had not paid the capitation tax, and I hope he will answer me.

Mr. STEELE. To whom are you referring?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. To the gentleman from Indiana last on the floor [Mr. WARD]. I pause for an answer. [After a pause.] Ah! the gentleman from Indiana declines to answer?

Mr. WARD. Perhaps I did not think the remark was worth answering.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Ah! that is a very proper response on the part of the gentleman. He referred to his profession in his remarks. I would be pleased to know what his profession is.

Mr. PETTIBONE. It can not be law.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. There are 557 votes rejected, and the gentleman espouses the action of the majority of the committee, and when I ask him to name a man of all of that list who has voted, as he states, for the contestee, he is unable to answer me.

Mr. WARD. I did not claim any knowledge of that kind with reference to this subject. I planted myself upon the proposition contained in the report of the majority, which shows that 557 persons voted for the contestee. I do not pretend to say that there is any evidence to show how any one of them voted.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I am not asking you how they voted; I am only asking you for the name of one single one of that 557 persons. If the gentleman can not answer it, then I ask is there a member of this committee who will name one of them? Will the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. LOWRY, who made the report, name one of them?

I pause for an answer. Five hundred and fifty-seven votes deducted in bulk from the vote of the contestee and no man can name a single one of the 557. The gentleman from Indiana concedes that of the 676 votes 119 are legal voters, and he says that we count these 119. He says so in his report as well as in his speech, and I ask him to name one of the 119 that he says are legal voters, and then name one of the 557 votes which were illegal voters that he ruled out.

I yield for an answer.

Mr. LOWRY. Does the gentleman desire an answer?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I want the names; I yield for that; not for an argument.

Mr. LOWRY. The gentleman may be wanting a great many things that he will never get. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. And this House wants a great many things with reference to this report that it will never get from the gentleman. It wants light on this subject. It desires to know the names of the alleged illegal voters which you ask it under the solemnity of an oath to reject in order to seat Mr. O'Ferrall. It wants the names in order that it may determine whether or not the voters are disqualified.

Mr. LOWRY. But my response to the gentleman's inquiry is this: That in the close of the argument I expect to show a degree of proof here that is entitled to more weight and has more strength in support of the propositions embodied in this report than in the more than fifteen or twenty cases which have been decided by his party when they were in a majority in this House—the party with which the gentleman is associated.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Oh, then, because the Republican party has set this House, as the gentleman claims, a bad example by excluding a Democratic contestant in the past, and seated parties that ought not to have been seated here, and against the voice and protest of gentlemen upon the other side of the House, you are now going to follow that example which you then condemned. Is that the argument of the gentleman from Indiana? Is that his response to my inquiry? Is that naming one of these 557 voters that he excludes? I state to this House, without fear of contradiction, that this committee has said that 557 votes were cast by men who had not paid the delinquent tax, and I further assert that they can not name a single one of the 557.

I repeat it, they can not name one of them. They have a list of the 676 men that they say had not paid the capitation tax, but the very moment that they said 119 of them were illegal votes, that very moment they put themselves in such shape that they never can tell this House who the voters are. I want to know what court ever did that? Deduct the vote because the voter that cast it was not a qualified voter, without being able to name the voter!

I cease to wonder that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WARD] did not yield for a question. Is the ballot in and of itself illegal, or is it the voter that is disqualified? The majority do not hesitate to say that it is the voter who is disqualified. I put the question to the lawyers on the Democratic side of this Chamber: Did you in all your practice know of a case where a court threw out a ballot because the person casting that ballot was disqualified, unless they were able to identify the voter who cast the ballot? I pause for an answer. [After a pause.] The gentlemen are all silent. I admire your discretion.

But, sir, more than that. I state that this House never in its past history established a precedent that votes could be taken from the contestee or a contestant on the evidence which is submitted to this House. What is it? There are twenty precincts in the county of Albemarle. The committee in its report stated that of the 676 votes which they found had been given upon capitation-tax receipts 21 were white voters, and therefore they would count them. They said that being white they could not tell whether those votes were cast for contestant or the contestee, and therefore they would count the twenty-one votes. They do not pretend to know for whom they were cast. They do not pretend to know anything of them except three facts: one is that they were on the list of delinquent tax-payers; another was that they were on some of the poll-books in that county; and another was that they were white, and, being white, they would count them. That left 655 votes alleged to have been cast upon delinquent-tax receipts by colored voters. Assuming that the witness, Gordon, correctly marked and checked the names, the votes cast by these delinquent tax-payers, legal and illegal, are distributed throughout the county as follows:

THE PRECINCTS IN ALBEMARLE COUNTY, AND THE NUMBER OF ALLEGED DELINQUENT COLORED VOTES CAST AT EACH.

Batesville	16
Blackwell's	3
Court-House	63
Covesville	23
Earlysville	34
Free Union	24
Howardsville	34
Hillsborough	15
Ivy	54
Lindsay's	27
Milton	39
Monticello House	66
North Garden	25
Porter's	68
Stony Point	18
Scottsville	28

Bear in mind now that the majority count in bulk, without locating or identifying, 98 of the above, and reject in bulk, without locating or identifying, the balance—557. Adding the 21 votes cast by alleged white voters to the above 98 makes the 119 votes heretofore referred to. Let us examine this list. First in the list is Batesville, where, it is alleged, 16 votes were cast by colored delinquents. These 16 votes are deducted from contestee. No, not the entire 16 votes, but the $\frac{557}{655}$ of these 16 votes. Will some member of the committee tell me for whom these 16 votes were cast? Will he refer me to the evidence on this point? I yield for an answer. [After a pause.] Silent again.

Will some member of the committee tell me what witness testifies how even the colored people voted in Batesville at that November election? Why, sir, there is not a single witness called who pretends to testify how the colored people voted in Batesville. And yet, sir, this committee has decided and asks this House—and this House will do it—to throw out $\frac{557}{655}$ of these 16 votes in Batesville precinct without one line of testimony as to how even the colored people voted there. They throw them out because some witness testifies that in some other precinct the colored people voted for the contestee. And they ask my friend from Indiana [Mr. WARD], who stands by his profession, to stand with them when they say because the colored people voted in one district for contestee therefore they did so in another; and he will do it.

Then at Blackwell's precinct the committee say that three colored delinquent voters voted for contestee. Well, who testifies as to how the colored people voted at Blackwell's precinct? Nobody. But then that is "such a very little one" that my friend from Indiana will vote for that too. That is only a matter of $\frac{557}{655}$ of 3 votes, and out they go.

Then we come to Covesville. At Covesville the committee tell us there were 23 colored delinquents that voted for the contestee. According to this line of evidence they voted for him because they were black. Why, sir, who testifies that the black voters of Covesville voted the Readjuster ticket? Who? Nobody. No witness is called who testified as to how the colored people of Covesville voted; but because some man says that in his opinion the colored people voted at some other precinct the Readjuster ticket out go the aforesaid vulgar fraction of 23 votes, and my distinguished friend from Indiana will vote for that too. He has to; he will not like to when he comes to look at it, but he will do it. I wonder if he does not now think that cursory reading and hasty conclusions are bad in practice. I see that some of my Democratic friends are becoming uneasy. Wait! The grid-iron I shall put you on is only warming. Wait until it gets hot.

Then we come to Free Union. The committee tell us that at Free Union 24 colored delinquents voted, and because they were colored men they voted for the contestee. Who says that the colored people of Free Union precinct voted the Readjuster ticket? Nobody. No witness says so. Witnesses could have been called if that were true. But the committee say, notwithstanding there is not a line of testimony about that, that you must throw out the requisite fraction of those 24 votes, and out they go. My distinguished friend from Indiana, placing himself on his profession, says, "I will follow." I like that kind of law which can arrange itself on either side of a legal proposition; that is the kind of law that pays.

But at Earlysville precinct the committee tell us there were 34 colored delinquents who voted the Readjuster ticket. How did the colored people vote at Earlysville? Why, here is the only testimony within the lids of the record as to how the colored people of Earlysville voted. Let me read it to you. I want to read this to the lawyers of the House that they may see upon what testimony they are going to put Mr. O'Ferrall in his seat. You will find his testimony on page 69. For the benefit of the gentlemen of the House who have only given it a cursory reading I will refer to the pages. Davis J. Johnson, the witness, testifies:

Q. Whom did you support for Congress in that election?
A. Massey and Paul.

Massey was running on the Democratic ticket; Paul was running on the Readjuster ticket. The contestant supported Mr. Massey. The contestee, Mr. Paul, supported Mr. WISE, who was running against Mr. Massey.

3d Q. For whom did the colored voters at that precinct vote as between Paul and O'Ferrall?
A. Well, I think Paul got the majority.
4th Q. Did not Paul get nearly the entire colored vote?
A. I think he got the most of them.

And out went the required fraction of the 34 votes.

Ah! the gentlemen on that side who stand by the legal profession will admire the audacity of the committee that deducted $\frac{557}{655}$ of 34 votes from contestee on that testimony.

The next precinct is Carter's Bridge. The majority of the committee tell us that 35 delinquent colored men at that precinct voted the Readjuster ticket because they were colored. Well, how did the colored people vote according to the testimony? I will read every line that regards the precinct of Carter's Bridge. Here it is—testimony of M. L. Van Doren, page 28:

Q. 1 (by counsel for contestant). Please state your residence and voting place; whether you were an officer at the last election and were present at the polls all day.
A. My residence is in Albemarle County, near Carter's Bridge precinct, where I vote; I was a judge of election and present at the polls all day.
Q. 2 (by same). From your observation of the polls that day, and your general knowledge of the voters, and their political affiliations and associates, and from your observation of the political workers who gave out ballots to the colored voters and came to the polls with them, how should you say the colored vote was cast; was it for Paul or O'Ferrall?
A. I should say it was almost unanimously for Paul.
Cross-examination:
Q. 1. Were you not a partisan of, and did you not work and vote for, C. T. O'Ferrall at the last election?
A. I did not work for him on the day of election; I voted for him. I was a supporter of Colonel O'Ferrall and wished for his election. I was less active than usual at the last election; my position as judge prevented me from taking an active part on the day of election.

And out go the requisite fraction of these 35 votes, all deducted from contestee, so as to seat a man that never was elected. To throw out votes on such testimony is to assume a position which no party outside of Virginia ever thought of taking. The only party equal to such an emergency is the great party which to-day is seeking to obtain the control of the destinies of this nation. Upon such testimony as that the requisite fraction of 34 votes is deducted from contestee by this committee. The testimony of the other eighteen witnesses is not more conclusive or more convincing. I publish all of it on this point with the minority report.

Yet upon such testimony, the testimony of twenty-one witnesses scattered over sixteen districts, this committee proposes, and it asks the House to indorse its position (and it will do it), to throw out $\frac{557}{655}$ of the above 655 votes, or 557 votes in the county of Albemarle, and deduct them all from contestee. Why did they not throw out the whole 676 votes? They say that 119 of the persons who cast that many of the 676 votes were legal voters. They say they can not separate them from the illegal voters; they can not separate the wheat from the chaff. They confess that they can not name one of those claimed to be legal voters; they confess they can not name one of the 557 claimed by them to be illegal voters. But they ask you, their political associates, to stand with them and say that 557 votes were illegal; that they were cast by colored men, and because they were cast by colored men therefore they were cast for the contestee. When before did this House ever take such a position?

They claim that the contestant had the names of the 676 persons who he and the committee say were delinquent tax-payers, and who he and they say voted for the contestee. They all lived in the county of Albemarle. Sixty-three of them, if the evidence is to be credited, lived in one precinct. Not one of them was called; not a single witness was called to testify how any one of these individual colored men voted. Those 63 men lived there in one precinct. Not one of them was called to prove that he was a delinquent tax-payer; not one of them was called to prove to whom he paid his tax; not one of them was called to prove that he voted for the contestee; not one of them was called to prove that he voted the Readjuster ticket.

In the whole county of Albemarle but two men were called as witnesses who voted, and one of them testified that he paid his tax himself before the day of election; he was not asked and did not say for whom he voted. But his vote went out with the rest. His name is among the others on that delinquent-tax list. It is James Curry. You will find his testimony on page 390 of the record. He is one of the colored men who go to make up the 676.

I trust the Democratic Representatives of this House relish the evidence on which they are asked to seat the contestant. I have heard it asserted on Democratic authority that a ballot cast by an illegal voter could not be deducted from the person for whom it was cast, even after it was found to be illegal, unless the party desiring to be benefited thereby had first called and offered to examine the voter who cast the alleged illegal ballot.

I do not take that position in its broadest sense, but I understand that the Democratic party does take that broad position, It takes the position that where John Smith is admitted to be an illegal voter and voted at Batesville precinct, it is the duty of the party who wants to gain by throwing out his vote to place John Smith on the stand, and then if he refuses to testify the party can proceed and prove John Smith's party affiliations, his actions, and his declarations before and at the time of his voting. I understand that this House will be asked to stand upon that position before this session closes. And I enjoy the prospect of seeing my Democratic associates placing themselves on record to-day that a vote can be deducted from a candidate without naming, identifying, or calling the alleged illegal voter, or proving his declarations before, at, or after the election. When you undertake to straddle this position, as you soon will, I shall remind you of your to-day's action.

I am gratified that there is one Democrat who sits in this House who will not have the lash applied to his back by either the Morrison reformers or the Virginia Bourbons. I am glad that there is one Democratic Representative who is determined to be consistent, although his party associates may all go against him. I refer to Mr. COOK, of Iowa.

But let us for a moment refer to this list of alleged delinquent tax-payers, and who is one of the 676?

One of them is Hy. Allen. He is one of those who they say voted at Howardsville. He is the first man on the list of district No. 1, to be found on page 78 of the record. Who testifies as to how Hy. Allen voted? No man. Who testifies with whom Hy. Allen affiliated on the day of election? Nobody. Who testifies from whom Hy. Allen got his tax ticket? Nobody. Who testifies from whom Hy. Allen got his ballot? Nobody. Who testifies as to whom Hy. Allen went up to the polls with? Nobody. Who testifies to a single declaration that Hy. Allen ever made before the election, on the day of election, or since? No living man.

But Hy. Allen's vote has got to go out, because he is a colored man. Ah, the colored man must go, either by force or intimidation at the polls, or by such action as this after a fair and free election has been had, unless he is one of the said 119. Who knows whether he is or not? Nobody. That his tax was paid is unquestioned, for no delinquent could vote without exhibiting a tax-receipt.

Let me take another name. Charles Burnley appears on the colored delinquent-list. How did Charles Burnley vote? Why, sir, do you know that there are three Charles Burnleys on the delinquent-list? Which one of them was counted? Which one rejected? Who testified as to how any one of these Charles Burnleys voted, as to whom any one of them acted with or went to the polls with or got his tax receipt or his ballot from? Who testifies as to what any one of these three men said before or after the election? Nobody. Yet these persons are living in the immediate community and could have been called or identified.

Let us take up the Browns. There are three John Browns, one Jack Brown, one John A. Brown, and one John W. Brown, all on the delinquent list and all five are marked as voted. Which of them were thrown out, and upon what testimony? I ask the gentleman from Indiana; and I venture to say he does not know. If he does, let him answer. Again he is silent.

Then there are the Nelson Browns—five of them—all delinquents, and all in the county of Albemarle. Which of these were thrown out and which accepted? Not a single witness fixes the identity of any one of these men.

Take the Johnsons. There are four James Johnsons and one Jim Johnson. There are five Hy. Johnsons and one Henry Johnson. There are three Sam. Johnsons and two Saml. Johnsons. I admire the ingenuity of any lawyer who can pick out, upon a cursory examination, those of the Johnson family who voted and those who did not, and for whom they voted.

There are some other anomolies connected with this case. If you look at page 86 you will find the name of one John Anderson, a colored man, who paid his tax to H. B. Burnley, the clerk. The committee say that was a good payment. Then I go down a little further and I find another John Anderson, who voted at court-house precinct; a little further down another John Anderson, who voted at Keswick's precinct. Which one of these John Andersons did the committee count, the one who paid his tax to Burnley, which you admit was a legal payment, or one of the two who paid their taxes to the tax-collector, which you say was an illegal payment in the majority of cases? Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] inform the House? I will yield to him to do so. Again he is silent.

I look down a little further on the page and I find two Reuben Bakers. One of them paid his tax to Burnley, which you say was a good payment. One voted at Court-House precinct, and he is thrown out. How do you know that the Reuben Baker who voted at Court-House precinct is not the same Reuben Baker who paid his tax to H. B. Burnley, the proper person, as you say, to receive it? You do not know; you can not know. Nobody knows but Reuben Baker, unless—if the Lord pays any attention to elections in Virginia [laughter]—it is the Lord. This committee, with an omniscience which is to be at least admired, picks out at random one of these Reuben Bakers, it knows not which, and says, "We will throw him out anyhow," and deduct his vote from contestee.

If you look a little further down you get into the Johnson family again, which is as prolific in Albemarle County, Virginia, as the Smith family up in New England. I find that one Sam. Johnson paid his tax to H. B. Burnley; a good payment according to the committee; and I find that a Sam. Johnson voted at Batesville precinct. I find also that a "Saml." Johnson voted at Scottsville precinct. Which one of these did you throw out? I ask my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. WARD] which one of these Johnsons he threw out? I ask the other gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY], who wrote the report of the majority, which one did he throw out? Again the gentleman is silent, and yet his side of the House will blindly follow him.

So I find there are more persons than one bearing the name of William Barber. One paid his tax to Burnley; one voted at Batesville. Which did you throw out? So with William Faucett. One person of this name paid tax to Burnley; one voted at Monticello. Which one did you throw out? So in regard to Daniel Scott. One person of this name paid tax to Burnley; one voted at Wingfield. A similar remark may be made in regard to Edwin Taylor. One person bearing this name paid tax to Burnley; one voted at Porter's. One person named John Wood paid tax to Burnley; and one of same name voted at Carter's. The same may be said as to Chas. Johnson, who paid tax to Burnley and voted at Court-House precinct.

If I had time I could pursue this line of argument at great length, demonstrating the absurd and inexplicable action of the committee.

Such anomalies emphasize the unreliability of deducting 557 votes in bulk. I think I have shown the importance of bringing direct testimony in every instance to identify the voter. The testimony should have been directed to John Anderson, to Reuben Baker, to Sam. Johnson, and to all the others. If these persons were not called themselves, some persons should have been called to identify them, thereby making it possible for this House to act intelligently on the case. Because the committee has not done this, I object to this report. It is not one upon which a lawyer can stand, and I assert without fear of contradiction that no county court in the United States that would take this evidence and go over it impartially would ever throw out these 557 votes and deduct them all from the contestee.

If it is uncertain for whom illegal votes have been cast, throw them out altogether. If any votes are shown to be illegal, I will not object to throwing them out. But how? There are but two ways in which it can be justly done. It must be done either by taking the total vote of both candidates and deducting a fair percentage from each, or by declaring there is so much doubt about the matter that we can not decide intelligently and judicially for whom they were cast. Therefore, we will declare there was no legal election, and send the case back to the people.

The report of the minority does not declare that Mr. Paul was elected. He having resigned his seat to accept another position, it is not necessary to decide this. Speaking for myself, and I believe for the minority of the committee, I firmly believe he was elected—fairly, honestly, and legally elected. I believe that tax-collectors appointed by the State auditor, who is the head of the revenue department of the State, were at least de jure officers, and that the payment of the capitation tax to the collector of Albemarle County by the delinquent tax-payers was a legal payment, whether made by the delinquents themselves or by some one for them. And in support of this I cite the House to the decisions of the courts in Pennsylvania as found in 11 Philadelphia Reports, 645; 1 Kulp, 157, and 1 Brewster, 121, and cases therein cited. The latter case is cited to support the legality of the title of the tax-collectors, at least as de jure officers.

Mr. Paul came to this House with 309 majority. The election is conceded to be fair and free. No man voted whose taxes were not first paid into the treasury of the State of Virginia. No delinquent in Albemarle County, in any of the twenty precincts, was permitted to vote until he exhibited to the election officers his tax-receipt, signed either by the clerk of the court or the collector of taxes.

On what flimsy pretense 557 are thrown out! Not only is it admitted that $565 was in the hands of the collector before the day of election to apply on the tax owed by these delinquents, but it is admitted that no list can be made out of the 557 voters who it is alleged cast illegal ballots. Not only this; not one name of the 557 can be given to this House, all of which were deducted from contestee in order to give contestant a majority of 248.

Will this House perpetrate this outrage? Will it disregard the registered will of the voters of the seventh Congressional district of Virginia? Are there not some Democrats on this floor who will vote for this very report who will be ashamed of it?

Let me say to you that you can not stand by the position you are taking to-day until the 4th day of March, 1885. Other cases will be brought to this House which will compel you to reverse this action.

We do not deny the correctness of the rule that the declarations and action of a voter whose partisan he had been, with what party he affiliated, whose friends gave him his ticket, who paid his taxes, &c., are all proper matters to be considered in finding for whom the individual voter voted. But that is not what the contestant and the committee ask of us. They ask us to find that the colored people as a class voted for contestee. They ask us to find from such evidence as is published in the minority report that 655 colored delinquents voted, and because colored, and because they received their tax-receipts from a collector who was contestee's friend, that therefore they voted for contestee.

No Committee on Elections, in any Congress, no quasi-judicial tribunal whose decisions have been preserved, no court of law or equity has ever foreshadowed the positions upon which these 557 votes are rejected, and all deducted from the majority candidate, and a minority candidate seated, and when the second sober thought of the Democratic party has gained control of this House it will not repeat the outrage about to be perpetrated in this case. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Twelve minutes.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I yield eleven minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHN S. WISE].

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. Mr. Speaker, the man who was elected to this seat has been promoted to a higher position, and to-day occupies the honored place of judge of the western district of Virginia. If he were in his seat the question would be quite different from what it is, for I hardly think the bold outrage now about to be perpetrated would be practiced then. From time to time, as this contest has proceeded, I have heard the remark from gentlemen on the other side that it did not make much difference, as there was nobody in the seat. It makes this much difference, sir, that to take this seat, whether it be occupied or vacant, is to steal that which belongs to another man who was honestly elected or to his lawful successor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

That is what it means, and the consolation sought from the seat being unoccupied reminds me of the story of the man who once went to meeting to confess his sins. He confessed that on a certain occasion he had gone to a store and found the storekeeper had gone off to the spring for a bucket of water. He was barefooted, and he saw a beautiful pair of boots on the shelf that fitted him exactly. He looked at his toes, and there was a spirit in him saying, "Solomon, why don't you take those boots; they fit you exactly." "Then," said he, "a better spirit came up and whispered to me, 'Solomon, don't you take those boots.'" Said the brethren, "What did you do?" "Struggling," he said, "between two contending feelings, thank God, the spirit of justice prevailed. I never touched those boots. I would have scorned to steal them. I was perfectly satisfied to walk off with the best pair of shoes in sight." [Laughter and applause.] So the man who votes to-day to seat Charles T. O'Ferrall in this vacant seat can not console himself with the thought that John Paul is not in it, for Charles T. O'Ferrall has no more title to it than if Paul was here. I never read since the day I was born such testimony as that upon which this committee attempt to strike at these 555 votes.

What do we see at the court-house of Albemarle County? We find the claim to be that of the 209 votes cast for John Paul 62 of them must be stricken out on the testimony of somebody who is said to have compared the lists. Who they are, what their disability was, nobody pretends to say. And yet within the call of that notary public, within a hundred or two hundred yards at most of the spot where the deposition was taken, was every man whose vote had been challenged, and not one of them was summoned as a witness to say how he voted, for whom he voted, what tax-receipts he had or what tax he had paid! Monticello House was another precinct in Albemarle County where out of a vote of 270 cast for John Paul 65 must be stricken out, as claimed, from the polls, and the simplest summons of the contestant could have brought every man of the whole number to the stand to tell what receipt he voted and how he voted. So of every precinct in that county. But never one did he summon, and why? Because he calculated, and he calculated well, it seems, that he would be indorsed here if he made out any sort of case on any sort of testimony. He knew it was not necessary to go beyond that. [Laughter.]

Sir, from time to time I have been patted on the shoulder on this floor and told that I had better keep quiet myself, because I had a contest pending before the Committee on Elections. Mr. Speaker, that seat of my colleague has no protector on this floor, and I hold a seat here as a Representative at large from the State of Virginia, with a duty to perform toward my outraged constituents of the seventh district; and by the gods, if I knew my head would roll in the basket the next moment, I will stand up for the rights of my people against any party or any man or set of men who embark in an effort like this to rob and cheat them of their rightful Representative. [Applause on the Republican side.] I ask no favors from the Democratic majority of this House. I stand on the ground of right and justice. I stand on the ground of Roman right, and I pray God that they will commit another outrage and send me back to the people of Virginia. Because then, Mr. Speaker, I shall return to the gallant people of that State, to the old Tenth Legion of Democracy whence this contest comes, to the stalwart yeomen of the Valley of Virginia, who have already rebuked the pretended Democracy of to-day by piling up an overwhelming majority in every county in that district against them. An immense white majority has been rolled up against them and in favor of my party. I will show them what a fraud and sham is your latter-day Democracy, and they will indorse the representative of their rights who dares to stand up on this floor and who is not afraid to demand their rights although at his own peril. I want to see this thing done. I say I want to see it done. It is done already. I hear the clanking of your chains that are lifting now the knife of the guillotine to cut off the head of an empty seat. [Laughter.] You are schooled to such outrages at home. You are panting for the blood of another victim to keep your hands in for the next election.

I know when the vote comes the "grand old party" will be on hand to pile up solidly its vote, for I have known them long and well. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Yes, sir; I know them well, but I listened with amazement to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] here talking to Democrats about being consistent. Who ever heard of a consistent latter-day Democrat? Why, gentlemen, you were laughing at him while you heard him. For the last twenty years the Democratic party has played the game of merry-go-round, and straddled every sappling in the forest of national politics. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] I have seen it in 1868 come out for an incidental protection, but without injury to revenue. I have seen it in 1872 take up as a leader Horace Greeley, the very father of high protection, in direct opposition to their previous record. I have seen it in 1876 come back and denounce the tariff; and later still, in 1880, I have seen it first clamor for a tariff for revenue only, and then ran away from its own platform before election day. [Laughter.] I have seen them denounce the Republican party in one campaign for not resuming specie payment, and give them "Hail Columbia" in the next campaign because it was done. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I have seen it in one platform denounce every measure of reconstruction, and in its next declare its devotion to every constitutional amendment. I have seen it vibrate, like the pendulum of an eight-day clock, from greenbacks to hard money; hard money to greenbacks. I have seen it one day weeping with the South over confederate graves, and the next day parading the North with its transparencies enblazoned, "We whipped the rebels and the Republican party got the credit for it."

I have seen that party come here and denounce the Republican party for having no one at their head to lead them in their campaign but a military dictator, a bloody butcher, a military tyrant, and in the next campaign run Winfield Scott Hancock as their champion, with nothing in this world to give him prominence but the fact that he killed more rebels than any other major-general in Grant's army. [Applause on the Republican side.] I have seen them go into the tariff question in my district and talk free trade out of one corner of their mouth and protection out of the other; and when you get them down to what they really want all you could get out of them on the tariff question was that they were "Sort of so, sort of not so, a little more sort of not so than they were sorter so." [Laughter.] But I am delighted to know the hour of a vote on the tariff is near at hand, when every sneak will make his record, and on that record, if I mistake not, we will have music in Virginia in the next campaign. If there is anything on God's green earth that Democrats have been consistent upon for the last twenty years I have not been able to find it unless it be a common purpose of public plunder, and a common passion for getting all they could and holding on to what they get. And it is this their sole, their ennobling and exalted principle which has made them march to-day shoulder to shoulder to take this seat belonging to Paul and give it to O'Ferrall.

Mr. Speaker, I will not undertake to argue this question upon the evidence. This case sinks below the dignity of a legal argument. There is not a lawyer in this House who if this evidence were before him in a private case would shoot a pointer dog for sucking eggs on such testimony as that on which they seek to give this seat to a man to whom it does not belong. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] But it seems to me when men become inflamed with this sort of political passion they forget the high trust that is confided to them. They forget their sworn oaths to try cases according to their merits, and run mad with the passions of party. They hound themselves on in the mad cry of the pack, instead of standing up in the nobler attitude of conscientious men, and men sworn to do a high and solemn duty, too brave and too proud to do a wrong merely because it is popular.

I am not afraid of the consequences of this act. I am not in doubt about what the result will be. For as sure as this House ever comes to a vote, the ayes can be measured on the Democratic yard-stick and the noes will be the poor little minority of Republicans with fewer just men than were found in Sodom and Gomorrah to come to their side from the Democratic ranks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude what I have to say in the two minutes remaining to me by defying this outrage. It is not worth while to coax. When a man knows that coaxing will not do he can afford to be a little defiant. I say that the spectacle is so outrageous that it has become ludicrous. It is a decided come-down from what was presented 1,800 years since when our Savior rode into Jerusalem on an ass. We are to see to-day the Virginia Bourbon come riding into the House of Representatives on the back of one of Barnum's spavined mules from Indiana. Virginia Bourbonism must be honest. We have wronged it surely, for it is now indorsed by the world-wide virtue of Indiana Democracy. Yes, sir, this is a fitting sight for the representatives of Virginia Bourbonism, Virginia honor, and Virginia chivalry. Here is a man running on a ticket with Massey who first appointed this tax-collector, and the man Massey who first appointed him now claims that the tax-collector was a fraud and that he never had any power to appoint him, while O'Ferrall, his partner, sings the chorus of the song. I say it is a fitting time for Virginia Bourbonism to come up here. It comes, it is true, with its hands besmeared with the blood of innocent, murdered blacks. It comes, it is true, to the national capital and to this House palpably stultified in every principle it has ever professed. It comes, it is true, dragging after it the corpse of strangled suffrage. It comes, it is true, as the thief of seventeen seats in one Virginia Legislature to get two-thirds majority. It comes, it is true, repudiating every anti-repudiation principle it ever professed. But after all it comes up confidently to the fountain-head of national Democracy, that has always lent it countenance, to be signed with the cross of that national fraud and taken into worthy fellowship. And it finds congenial spirits here awaiting it to welcome it in warm embrace and recognize it with a brother's kiss. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has one minute of his time remaining.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I yield that minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE].

Mr. PETTIBONE. It seems to me we can settle this matter easily by determining a few facts. It is conceded here that Mr. Paul received a majority of 205 votes as declared in his certificate. Next it is conceded that the Committee on Elections unanimously agreed that he was entitled to 119 more, making his total majority 324. Now, in order to declare the seat of Mr. Paul vacant, you must find that Mr. O'Ferrall received in the county of Albemarle more than 324 majority.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I now propose to take the floor in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY], who had reserved the remainder of his time. A gentleman has just spoken on the other side.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I ask my honorable friend from Indiana——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I ask my honorable friend from Indiana to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. LOWRY. I can not yield the gentleman any time.

Mr. GEORGE D. WISE. I would like to ask the unanimous consent of this House.

Mr. MCADOO. I ask that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE] have unanimous consent to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] has the floor and can not be taken off it without his consent.

Mr. LOWRY. I do not yield. I rise for the purpose of moving the previous question. I do so without any desire on my part, and I feel sure without any desire on the part of the Committee on Elections, to cut off full and ample discussion. And I suggest if the gentlemen on the other side of this question can give us any assurance of unanimous concurrence to devote this evening to the discussion of this question, I would be glad to have it so devoted.

Many MEMBERS. No! No!

Mr. LOWRY. In view of the general dissent——

Several MEMBERS. We are ready to vote now.

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. LOWRY. I can not yield at this time. I regret I am unable to do so. If, however, the House will consent to dispense with the previous order under which this evening is devoted to the discussion of the tariff question——

Many MEMBERS. No! No!

Mr. LOWRY. Then, in view of the general dissent, having risen for the purpose of moving the previous question, I have only to say in regard to the question of courtesy, to which my eloquent friend from Iowa has alluded, I think I may be able to give before the close of this session, if I have not already given, evidence of my disposition to deal fairly with all these questions; and, so far as the mere question of politeness is concerned, while I regret exceedingly I have not been able to get into the uniform habit of being invariably polite, there are other and higher questions involved here than those of mere politeness. I regret I have been constrained to pursue the course I have felt it my duty to pursue in calling this case up for action at this time.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER], who has distinguished himself in this House and I hope is about to distinguish himself upon the bench, I think will find himself constrained to pursue a very different course in the examination of witnesses from what he has pursued in the examination of this case, when he comes to assume the judicial ermine. The gentleman has asked for the names of disqualified voters. We have here on this record, on this page which lies open before me, the name of every delinquent tax-payer who voted at that election. We have there the name of every one who was delinquent as recorded on the public records of the Commonwealth of Virginia. We have indubitable evidence which remains uncontradicted, and which I think we may justly infer is not susceptible of contradiction, to the effect that these men did vote for John Paul, and that they could not, in view of the evidence before the committee and the House in these records, have voted for any one else.

I have said that I would be prepared to show that the evidence in this case was such as to be tenfold more strong than that upon which was predicated the decisions of this House when the party majority was differently constituted from what it is to-day.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. LOWRY. I hold in my hand the report in one of those cases, in which it was proved, simply by the testimony of two witnesses only, that from 95 to 97 per cent. of the colored vote of a certain Congressional district was in favor of a certain candidate. And upon the strength of such testimony as that a majority of 2,600 votes was overthrown, and the man who was certified as having been elected by that majority was turned incontinently out of his seat.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman now permit me to ask him a question?

Several MEMBERS. Do not yield to interruptions.

Mr. LOWRY. I do not propose to be governed by those precedents, but simply to be controlled by the rules of evidence. I propose to look at these questions and have my conclusions upon them controlled by the same methods that are adopted in the judicial tribunals of this country. If my friend who represents on this floor the entire Commonwealth of Virginia is apprehensive that in his case any different methods will be pursued, and if he is now making preparations for receiving the crown of a martyr, I only beg leave to ask him whether, if he is constrained to put that crown on his head, he will allow us to do it in his kitchen? [Great laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I did not hear what my friend said.

Several MEMBERS. Do not yield.

Mr. LOWRY. It is not necessary that elsewhere, where I have occasion to feel any concern about my reputation for fairness in determining these questions, I shall undertake to defend my vote. The people whom I represent know full well what my individual methods are in reference to such questions.

But I desire to say to this House that although I have not now the time to do it without jeopardizing the public interests, I stand prepared to defend the report of this committee against all comers here or elsewhere, now or at any future time, whether it be in a party aspect or whether it be in reference to its determination by the rules adhered to in strict judicial decisions.

So far as the great Commonwealth of Virginia is concerned, my friend who sits opposite to me [Mr. GEORGE D. WISE] and others are desirous to speak on this question, and I would be glad to afford them the opportunity to do so. But I desire to state here a word in reference to what has fallen from a gentleman who has just addressed the House, who stated that it has become the custom in that Commonwealth for the opposing parties to pour out their money lavishly for the purpose of providing means to carry on their canvasses and determine their elections. The inference is that the practice is to be justified which has been shown to have prevailed in this case of raising large sums of money for the purpose of suborning the votes of the indigent class of voters.

I desire to interpose between the gentleman and the Commonwealth he represents, and to rescue the name and fame of Jefferson and of Washington from the obloquy that would rest upon them by having such a misfortune overcome the old Commonwealth of Virginia. I hope that if such a stain rests upon her, the State which contains the sacred dust of Jefferson, that holds upon the bank of yonder river the bones of George Washington, will ere long be relieved from the imputation of having her elections carried by the power of gold. Money is one great element which this country has to fear; it is that which will infuse the dry-rot into her institutions; it is the skeleton in the closet of the American Republic.

I concur with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD], who at an early period of this session said that he trusted that the Democratic party had a sufficient majority in this House to afford to be decent in determining these questions. I think it can not only afford to be decent but to be right, and to place itself in such a position that now and forever hereafter it can defend itself as having adhered to the right in determining all questions of this kind.

I now move the previous question upon the adoption of the substitute submitted by the minority of the Committee on Elections.

A MEMBER. Upon the report of the committee.

Mr. LOWRY. I understand that there is a motion pending before the House to substitute the resolution submitted by the minority of the committee for the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee. I call the previous question on the pending proposition.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. The previous question I suppose will apply to the report of the majority?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has not so submitted his motion. He moves the previous question on the resolution of the minority.

Mr. LOWRY. I will call the previous question on all the pending propositions; all of them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman now to call the previous question upon the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee and the substitute submitted by the minority of the committee.

Mr. LOWRY. That is my motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution proposed by the minority of the committee for the resolutions of the majority was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Charles T. O'Ferrall was not elected as a Representative from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia to the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MOULTON. Let the yeas and nays be called upon adopting the report of the majority.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I want it on this proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 83, nays 139, not voting 100; as follows:

So the substitute submitted by Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, on behalf of the minority of the Committee on Elections was not agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. RAY, of New York, for to-day, on all political questions.

Mr. FINERTY with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, on this question.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. ANDERSON, on this question.

Mr. STONE with Mr. BLANCHARD, on this question.

Mr. MURPHY with Mr. THOMAS, on this question.

The following were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. MULLER with Mr. MCCOMAS.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. VAN EATON with Mr. HOLTON.

Mr. HURD with Mr. WAKEFIELD.

Mr. BARKSDALE with Mr. ELLWOOD.

Mr. NEECE with Mr. CANNON.

Mr. LEWIS with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, with Mr. WADSWORTH.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. ROCKWELL.

Mr. ELLIS with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. SHELLEY with Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. POTTER with Mr. OCHILTREE.

Mr. NEECE with Mr. CANNON.

Mr. OATES with Mr. STRAIT. On the proposition to seat Mr. O'Ferrall, Mr. OATES would vote "yea" and Mr. STRAIT "nay."

Mr. GOFF. I voted inadvertently and desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. MULDROW.

Mr. NEECE. I desire to state that if I had not been paired I would have voted "no" on this question.

Mr. RANDALL. I was called out of the House, and did not return in time to vote. If I had been present I should have voted "no" on this question.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the adoption of the resolutions reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John Paul was not elected as a Representative to the Forty-eighth Congress from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia, and was not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That Charles T. O'Ferrall was duly elected as a Representative from the seventh Congressional district of Virginia to the Forty-eighth Congress, and is entitled to his seat as such.

The resolutions were adopted; there being—ayes 128, noes 73.

Mr. LOWRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOWRY. I ask that the oath of office be now administered to Mr. O'Ferrall.

Mr. CHARLES T. O'FERRALL presented himself, and was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed in section 1757 of the Revised Statutes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to call up from the House Calendar House bill 6479, and move to suspend the rules and pass it.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is not in order until after the call of the States and Territories.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. PAYSON. I move to dispense with the regular order.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask unanimous consent.

Several members objected.

CALL OF STATES.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the Chair will proceed with the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for printing and reference to their appropriate committees. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and Territorial Legislatures are in order; also resolutions calling for executive information for reference to their appropriate committees.

CAPT. SANDERSON H. ROGERS.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (H. R. 6884) granting a pension to Capt. Sanderson H. Rogers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES M'LAUGHLIN.

Mr. FUNSTON introduced a bill (H. R. 6885) granting a pension to James McLaughlin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

KICKAPOO INDIANS, KANSAS.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (H. R. 6886) to provide for the settlement of the estates of deceased Kickapoo Indians in the State of Kansas, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WHARF AND MARINE WAYS, JEFFERSONVILLE, IND.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (H. R. 6887) to provide for the purchase of a wharf and the construction of marine ways at Jeffersonville, Ind.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

DRAFTED MEN, PENDLETON COUNTY, KENTUCKY.

Mr. CLAY (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 6888) for the relief of certain drafted men in Pendleton County, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPEAL OF TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. KING introduced a bill (H. R. 6889) for the repeal of the internal-revenue tax on tobacco; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

NAVY-YARD, MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. KING also introduced a bill (H. R. 6890) to establish a navy-yard and depot of supplies on the Mississippi River at Algiers, or at some point between Algiers and Port Eads; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN JERDON.

Mr. KING also introduced a bill (H. R. 6891) granting a pension to John Jerdon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF LOYAL CITIZENS.

Mr. McCOMAS introduced a bill (H. R. 6892) to afford further relief to loyal citizens of States not in rebellion for property taken by the Army of the United States.

Mr. McCOMAS. I move the reference of that bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is that a bill to amend the laws? Should it not go to the Committee on War Claims?

The SPEAKER. It belongs, under the rules of the House, to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I insist that it should go there.

Mr. McCOMAS. It involves a revision of the laws upon this subject, and should be properly considered by that committee rather than the Committee on War Claims. I make that motion, to refer it.

The question was taken.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 23.

Mr. SLOCUM. No quorum.

Mr. McCOMAS. This is making too much out of a very little thing, and if the gentleman insists upon the point that no quorum has voted I will withdraw the motion.

The bill was accordingly read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LABOR ON PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. MAYBURY introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 246) providing that in the employment of labor on the public works of the Government preference shall be given to residents and citizens of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Labor, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC LANDS, LAKE SAINT CLAIR, MICHIGAN.

Mr. MAYBURY also introduced a bill (H. R. 6893) to set apart the marsh and overflowed or shoal-water lands in and bordering upon Lake Saint Clair, in the State of Michigan, for a national shooting and fishing resort or reservation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' CEMETERY, PORT HURON, MICH.

Mr. CARLETON introduced a bill (H. R. 6894) asking an appropriation for improving and ornamenting the grounds of the soldiers' cemetery at Port Huron, Mich.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

Mr. CUTCHEON introduced a bill (H. R. 6895) to authorize the creation of an additional light-house district; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

JACOB STEED.

Mr. CUTCHEON also introduced a bill (H. R. 6896) granting a pension to Jacob Steed; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES W. GREEN.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (H. R. 6897) granting a pension to Charles W. Green, late of Company B, Regular Missouri Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BOGGS & ALLEN.

Mr. GRAVES introduced a bill (H. R. 6898) for the relief of Boggs & Allen; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that we go through with the call of States before the recess.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RANDALL. With the understanding that no other business is to be done before the recess I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. With the understanding that no other business is to be transacted, the Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

PACIFIC RAILROAD AND TELEGRAPH LINES.

Mr. LAIRD introduced a bill (H. R. 6899) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph lines from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 2, 1864; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

REVENUE TAX ON ALCOHOL.

Mr. McADOO submitted a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, requesting the repeal of a part of the United States revenue laws relating to alcohol; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution is as follows:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY.

Joint resolution requesting the repeal of a part of the United States revenue laws relating to alcohol.

1. Whereas the business of the citizens of the State of New Jersey engaged in agricultural pursuits has been injured by the operation of the United States revenue law permitting the manufacture of vinegar from alcohol which has paid no internal-revenue tax; and

Whereas the operation of said internal-revenue law gives opportunity to evade the tax on alcohol made and sold as such: Therefore,

2. Resolved (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and hereby are, requested to use all honorable means in their power to procure the repeal of so much of the amendment to the United States laws contained in section 5, chapter 125, of general laws passed by the Forty-fifth Congress at the third session, in the year 1879, as authorizes the manufacture of vinegar from alcohol that has paid no internal-revenue tax.

3. And be it further resolved, That the governor of this State be requested to forward copies of the foregoing preamble and resolution to our said Senators and Representatives.

Approved April 8, 1884.

IMPORTATION OF CONTRACT LABOR.

Mr. McADOO also submitted a resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey with reference to the importation to the United States of foreign labor under the contract system; which was referred to the Committee on Labor, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

It is as follows:

Resolutions of the New Jersey General Assembly against pauper labor.

Whereas it is a well-established fact that for some time past foreign laborers have been imported into this country under peculiar contracts, the conditions of which contracts are manifestly detrimental to the labor interests of this country as well as to the foreign laborers so contracting, because of the fraudulent representations made to them regarding the amount of wages paid and the cost of living in this country: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of assembly of the State of New Jersey, That the representatives of the State of New Jersey in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, requested to take such official action as will prohibit the importation to the United States of foreign laborers under contract, and thereby protect the laboring interests of this country.

Resolved, That an engrossed copy of these resolutions be signed by the speaker of this assembly, and by him forwarded for presentation to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

A. B. STONEY, Speaker.

DANIEL M. DILL.

Mr. FIEDLER introduced a bill (H. R. 6900) for the relief of Daniel M. Dill; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH CURRIDEN.

Mr. FERRELL introduced a bill (H. R. 6901) for the relief of Joseph Curriden; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

FRANK G. STEVENS.

Mr. BREWER, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. 6902) for the relief of Frank G. Stevens; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CATHARINE GATTIE.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. 6903) granting a pension to Catharine Gattie; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GREENLEAF introduced a bill (H. R. 6904) for the relief of John F. Chase; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. S. F. PATTEN.

Mr. SLOCUM introduced a bill (H. R. 6905) granting a pension to Mrs. S. F. Patten, widow of Col. G. W. Patten; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

THE CHORPENNING AWARD.

Mr. HARDY introduced a bill (H. R. 6906) to review the award of John A. J. Creswell, late Postmaster-General, by which he found due from the United States to George Chorpenning the sum of $443,010.60; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LYMAN BRADLEY.

Mr. STEVENS introduced a bill (H. R. 6907) for the relief of Lyman Bradley; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

STEPHEN V. BENÉT.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (H. R. 6908) authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to rehear the application of Stephen V. Benét for patent for cartridges; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

INDICTMENT OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, introduced a bill (H. R. 6909) for extending the time for which public officers of the United States may be indicted to five years; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JACOB T. JOHNSON.

Mr. KEIFER introduced a bill (H. R. 6910) granting an increase of pension to Jacob T. Johnson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SECTION 165, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. CONVERSE introduced a bill (H. R. 6911) to amend section 165 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY B. LAMBE.

Mr. FOLLETT introduced a bill (H. R. 6912) granting a pension to Henry B. Lambe; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH SNAPP.

Mr. HOPKINS introduced a bill (H. R. 6913) for the relief of Joseph Snapp; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

H. G. HUNTER.

Mr. ERMENTROUT introduced a bill (H. R. 6914) for the relief of H. G. Hunter; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ELLEN R. HARRIS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill (H. R. 6915) for the relief of Ellen R. Harris; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MATILDA VICTOR.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, also introduced a bill (H. R. 6916) for the relief of Matilda Victor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH RICHARD.

Mr. PATTON introduced a bill (H. R. 6917) for the relief of Joseph Richard; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

LIBRARY IN SURGEON-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Mr. EVERHART introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 247) providing for the printing of the index catalogue of the library in the Surgeon-General's Office; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

NASHVILLE, TENN.

Mr. CALDWELL introduced a bill (H. R. 6918) to add Nashville, Tenn., to the list of reserved cities mentioned in sections 5191 and 5192 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

SCHOOL PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BARBOUR (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 6919) relating to school property in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT NEWPORT NEWS, VA.

Mr. LIBBEY introduced a bill (H. R. 6920) to provide for a light-house at Newport News Point, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM A. MASON.

Mr. GUENTHER introduced a bill (H. R. 6921) granting a pension to William A. Mason; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF PASSENGERS ON STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. DEUSTER introduced a bill (H. R. 6922) to amend chapter 4488 of the Revised Statutes, to provide better protection for life on steam vessels; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House this bill should be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GUENTHER. I desire to have it go to the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests.

The SPEAKER. It will be so referred, if there is no objection.

There being no objection, the bill was accordingly referred to the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT L. MOORE.

Mr. WOODWARD introduced a bill (H. R. 6923) for the relief of Robert L. Moore; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ANNA MARIA SCHAUTZ.

Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (H. R. 6924) for the relief of Anna Maria Schautz; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I desire to ask consent to have a bill now on the Speaker's table referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that can not be done at this time. The order of the House, made by unanimous consent, was that the time for taking a recess to-day should be extended until the call of States and Territories had been completed, no other business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. STRUBLE. Will it be in order to ask a correction of the RECORD at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, under the order made by the House. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore during this evening's session. By order of the House a recess will now be taken [5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.] until 8 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering revenue bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BAGLEY in the chair.

TARIFF REDUCTION.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House the session this evening is for general debate only upon the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes.

Mr. COOK addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. YOUNG addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HOLMAN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BEACH. I noticed, Mr. Chairman, when you took your seat to-night that you stated that the House was in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of general debate on the tariff bill. Now, I would like to have the Clerk read the resolution under which this debate has proceeded.

The Clerk read as follows:

That on and after to-day [April 22] and until further ordered, the House take a recess at 5 o'clock p. m. until 8 o'clock p. m., which said evening sessions shall be for debate only, no business to be transacted; this order not to conflict or interfere with any prior orders for evening sessions.

Mr. BEACH. I take it that under that resolution any general debate is proper at this time, and that I need not confine myself to a discussion of the tariff.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it has generally been understood that the debate at these evening sessions shall be confined to the tariff bill. The resolution which has been read seems to warrant a different construction. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BEACH. I am free to admit, Mr. Chairman, that the remarks I am about to make are not in the line of the discussion which has prevailed at these evening sessions.

I do not care to speak about the tariff to-night. That question has been discussed upon this floor until it is threadbare. It is like straw which has been thrashed and thrashed over and over again, until nothing can be got out of it but dust. I prefer talking upon a subject which in my opinion equals if it does not surpass the tariff question in importance. I refer to the great question of legislative reform.

While others are talking about revenue reform, judicial reform, and civil-service reform, I propose to say a word or two about legislative reform.

It is time, Mr. Chairman, for us to turn our attention to this subject. The evils of our legislative system are becoming more and more manifest, and the time is not far distant when an outraged people will rise in their fury and not only demand but exact a radical change.

Let us look at ourselves for a few moments to-night. I would that these walls were covered with mirrors, that we might "see ourselves as others see us." Such an introspection might not be pleasant, but it would certainly be instructive.

Here we sit, day after day, with our eyes wide open to the abuses which exist in the administrative department of the Government, but with them blindly closed to the abuses of which we ourselves are guilty. While trying to reform others we neglect to reform ourselves. There is far greater need of reform here, for you must remember that the abuses elsewhere owe their existence directly to the action or non-action of Congress. We members of Congress are the sinners. "We have done those things we should not have done, and we have left undone those things we should have done." It is my purpose to-night to call attention to a few of our acts of omission and commission, and in doing so shall point out the reforms which have become necessary in our legislative methods.

One of the first is to stop all class and special legislation. We should have general laws under which the people could get what they want without special application to Congress. In this respect the States are far in advance of the General Government. Most all of them, I believe, have adopted the system of general laws and a prohibition of special legislation. When I first took my seat in this House in the last Congress this subject was brought to my attention. One of my constituents wanted to change the name of a vessel. I found in the statutes numerous precedents, but before introducing a special bill for his relief I took the matter in consideration and concluded to prepare a general bill giving the Secretary of the Treasury power to change, if required, the names of all vessels, and thus relieve Congress from that class of legislation. I did so, but while on my feet awaiting recognition from the Speaker I showed my bill to an older member, who informed me that a bill similar to the one I proposed had passed in the preceding Congress. The fact, however, remains that from the formation of the Government up to the year 1880 a citizen who desired to change the name of a mud-scow from the Sally Ann to the Mary Jane had to come to Congress and get a special bill passed.

At the same time I had no less than three postmasters in my district who had written me to introduce bills to reimburse them for postal stamps and moneys stolen by burglars. I supposed that the burglars had not confined their operations to my district alone but that others had been frequented. Upon inquiry I found that about a thousand bills were pending for special relief in similar cases. I furthermore found that it had been the uniform practice of Congress to allow these claims where the loss had occurred through no fault or negligence of the postmaster. I at once introduced a general bill authorizing the Postmaster-General to adjust and settle the claims of all postmasters for stolen stamps. The proposition was approved by the House, and under the bill passed at the last session Congress is relieved of a vast amount of legislation. The extent of this relief will be seen from the last annual statement of the Postmaster-General, who reports that under the law of March 17, 1882, there had been filed in his office 1,944 claims, of which 274 had been allowed, 182 disallowed, 369 abandoned, leaving 1,119 yet to be adjusted.

Let me, Mr. Chairman, call further attention to my record upon this subject, not for personal gratification but for purposes of illustration. When the tariff bill was under consideration in the last Congress it contained a provision prohibiting the importation of foreign watches, watch cases, and watch movements which copied or simulated the name or trade-mark of any American manufacturer. Now, I thought if this prohibition was a good thing for the watch-makers it would be equally good for other manufacturers, and I therefore moved and carried an amendment making the prohibition apply to all other articles of foreign manufacture.

Again, when the bill to stop the importation of adulterated and spurious teas was before this House in the last Congress, I took the ground that it should be made general and include all commodities which are the subject of adulteration. I regret to say that my objections were unheeded and the bill passed.

Coming down to the present Congress, I have introduced a general bill granting the Secretary of War power to give condemned cannon to Grand Army posts for monumental purposes whenever he can do so without detriment to the public service. In the last Congress there were hundreds of these "cannon" bills introduced, and in this we find quite a number, but not so many, because it is understood that the supply of useless cannon is exhausted. I rejoice to say that the general bill I introduced passed this House last Thursday without a single objection.

Again, I noticed since we have been in session that numerous bills to change the names of national banks have been introduced. I thought it a piece of great folly to take up the time of Congress with the consideration of such insignificant bills. I therefore introduced a general bill (which I trust will become a law) empowering the Comptroller of the Currency to change the names of national banks upon such terms and conditions as he might prescribe for the protection of the public interests. I afterward suggested to the chairman of the Committee on Banking, which has the bill in charge, that it had better be amended so as to permit the Comptroller to authorize an increase of the capital stock of national banks and also let him direct a change of site when required.

These matters are purely matters of administration, and there is no reason why Congress should be bothered with them. I can not at this time think of the various matters of legislation which might with great advantage be made the subject of general laws. A few of them, however, will readily occur. There might be a general bill granting to railroads the right of way through Territories. We might pass a general bill for the bridging of navigable rivers. I think a public building bill could be framed which would put a stop to the shameful logrolling we have recently seen on this floor. It might concede a public building to every city where the volume of court, revenue, or postal business done made it desirable or economical for the Government to own its own building. A general bill giving the judges of the Supreme Court power to create and alter judicial districts would relieve Congress of considerable special legislation.

But it is not for the relief of Congress alone that I advocate a system of general laws. Much, no doubt, would be accomplished in that direction; but a more important result would be the prevention of special Congressional favors. There should be no monopoly in the franchises of the Government; they should be open to all, free to the people, and not reserved for the privileged few.

When I see the difficulty of passing any bill in this House I realize the obstacles in the way of general bills of the character I have indicated, which from their very nature would give rise to protracted debate. For this reason, in the early part of the session, I introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting special and class legislation and requiring the enactment of general laws. I am satisfied that nothing short of a constitutional amendment will stop the evils of special legislation.

I will now pass, Mr. Chairman, to another legislative reform which is worthy of our most earnest attention.

The practice of legislating on appropriation bills is a most pernicious one. It leads to all manner of abuses. A more vicious system could not be devised. An appropriation bill should be confined to the purposes expressed in its title. I can give you an illustration of how it sometimes affects the people. Several years since a New York merchant told me that he had been obliged to pay $15,000 in compromise of a claim made against him by the Government for violation of a revenue law of which he had no knowledge whatever, but which, upon more careful examination, was found tucked away in an appropriation bill. In this respect we are imitating the example of the tyrant Caligula who had his laws written in small letters and displayed on high poles so that the people could not read them.

The responsibility, Mr. Chairman, for a continuance of this pernicious system rests to a large extent upon this House. The Senate has wisely resolved against it, though I must admit their resolution has faltered at times when their own interests or dignity were affected. I do not believe, sir, that it can be effectually stopped without a change in the organic law, and for this reason I have proposed an amendment to the Constitution so as to prohibit all legislation upon appropriation bills.

Another legislative reform for which there is a crying necessity is the devising of some means whereby the petitions of the people can be heard by Congress and disposed of. The right of petition, Mr. Chairman, is a right guaranteed by the Constitution. It is a right dear to the people. What is the character of the right? Is it simply the right to deposit a petition in that mahogany box at the end of the Clerk's desk, or is it the right to have the grievances complained of heard before Congress and passed upon? I submit that it is the latter. Otherwise, the right of petition would be an empty and a barren right. As matter of fact, we all know a petition is the basis for a bill. The petitioner prays for relief or redress and the bill is the instrument by means of which the matter is brought to the formal attention of Congress.

In the last Congress there were 10,702 bills introduced, of which number, including the general appropriation bills, only 729 passed. Of those which passed, 248 are classed as public acts, 171 as public resolutions, 285 as private acts, and 25 as private resolutions. In the present Congress there have already been over 7,000 bills introduced, and we are not yet through the first session.

Now let us look at the routine these bills take. First the bill must be formally introduced. That takes time. Then it must be printed. That costs money. Then it is considered in committee. More time again. Reported back formally to the House. More time consumed. Report of the committee printed. More money spent. Ordered to be printed on the Calendar at still more expense. Each bill takes this course. Multiply the time consumed on each bill and report and the money expended in printing by 10,702 (the number of bills introduced in the last Congress) and you have the cost in time and money of the work done in the last Congress before the bills could come up in the House for consideration. Now deduct the 729 bills and resolutions which passed from the 10,702 introduced, and you have nearly 10,000 which were strangled in parturition but which nevertheless cost the Government a very large amount of treasure.

The cost, however, is not the most objectionable feature in this business. The right of the people to be heard is a matter of far greater importance. Every citizen, however humble, who comes here for the enforcement of a right or the redress of a wrong is entitled to be heard. This is his privilege, his right, under the Constitution.

The common argument is, we must not consider these bills from fear we may pass some bad ones. This argument, Mr. Chairman, is prompted by cowardice and founded in sophistry. If the bills are bad, let us vote them down; if good, let us pass them. This is the honest and manly course. But it will be said Congress has not the time to consider all these bills. It is a physical impossibility. I admit the truth of this assertion. And yet if you will adopt the plan of passing general laws and creating special tribunals to hear and determine certain classes of cases you will so reduce the number of bills that when Congress adjourns the Calendar will be cleared.

Let me call your attention for a moment to the pension bills. There were introduced of this class of bills in the last Congress 2,247, of which number only 166 passed. That would give upon a fair apportionment one-half of a bill to each member. In the present session there have been introduced up to date 2,222 bills for pensions.

Now, what are these pension bills? They are claims for pensions made by the soldiers of the late war. Their claims have been in many instances rejected by the Pension Bureau because of inability to furnish the legal proof called by that department. The Commissioner of Pensions has no discretion in the allowance of these claims. However equitable the case may be, he must reject it unless the claimant can comply with the cast-iron rules of the Pension Office. The door of the Pension Office having been closed, the applicant turns to Congress where the case can be considered in all its equities. The practice here is to send them to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. That committee consists of fifteen members. They take up the bills, and, having considered them, report them back to the House. They go on the Calendar, and every Friday night is set aside for their consideration. These Friday night sessions are very poorly attended. You will never find over fifty members present. The number of bills passed at these sessions will average about ten. It takes time to read the bills and the reports, and then some of the cases give rise to more or less discussion. But I have noticed that after explanations have been made the action of the committee is uniformly sustained. This has been the case, I believe, without exception, in the present Congress, and is owing in large part to the sound judgment and conscientiousness of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Now, I ask particular attention to this fact, for if the fifteen members of the Committee on Pensions can dispose of these cases to the satisfaction of this House, why could not a tribunal of fifteen or any less number of persons be created which would perform the work with equal satisfaction? Such a tribunal might be intrusted with discretionary powers and authorized to hear and determine upon equitable grounds all cases which have been rejected by the Pension Bureau. It should be required to make annual report to Congress of its doings, and if we found at any time that its discretion has been abused we could correct the evil by removals or by legislative restrictions. Something of this kind has got to be done in the early future. These pension bills have grown rapidly in number, and they will increase still more rapidly hereafter, because we will have to deal not only with the cases already rejected but with the large number now awaiting their doom in the Pension Office. There seems to be a fascination about the soldier whose claim has been rejected to have a bill introduced in Congress for his relief. You may tell him he stands no show—that his chance for success is only one in a hundred. But all in vain. He looks upon it as a lottery and he is confident he will draw a prize.

The same observations will apply to a very large class of bills which are commonly referred to the Committee on Claims. Up to this date eight hundred and eleven bills of this character have been introduced at this session, and the cry is, "Still they come!"

Now, something must be done to relieve Congress from the consideration of this flood of business. It is growing worse every day, for each Congress has to deal with not only new claims but the old ones inherited from its predecessor. In my judgment the first step to be taken is to raise a statute of limitations. We have got to get rid of stale claims and raise a bar to new ones. With this object in view, I have introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution so as to have a statute of limitations for the benefit of the Government. In other words, I would put the Government, so far as its debtor and creditor relations with the people are concerned, upon a like footing with citizens as between themselves.

The next step would be the creation of an equity court of claims, similar to the one I have suggested for rejected pensions.

Another move in the direction of legislative reform is the constitutional amendment I have proposed to the effect that "neither the credit, nor the money, nor the property of the United States shall be hereafter given or loaned to, or in aid of, any association, corporation, or private undertaking."

What a world of treasure this simple provision would have saved the people if it had been incorporated in the organic law twenty-five years ago! We would not to-day be struggling to get back from railroad corporations a portion of the public lands voted so indiscriminately away by our predecessors in this Hall. Through the absence in the Constitution of the provision for which I am now contending Congress loaned the credit of the Government to private corporations to the amount of $64,000,000, and gave away in the same direction 225,000,000 acres of the people's lands. Is it not about time that the door was closed to all such legislation? Now let me say a word in general about these propositions to amend the Constitution. In the last Congress there were forty-one joint resolutions introduced to amend the Constitution and sent to the Judiciary Committee. Was any of them ever reported back to this House? The only one that ever got out of the committee was the one giving the President power to veto one or more items in an appropriation bill, and that was wrested from the committee through a Cæsarian operation performed by my distinguished friend, Mr. Flower, of New York. In this Congress we have had forty-nine joint resolutions of a similar character introduced thus far. They come from most every State in the Union. Many of them are for the same amendment. Now, these various propositions, coming as they do from all quarters, must have something back of them. They are not introduced here for fun. When we look behind them we find a great popular sentiment, sustained by the press all over the country, urging amendments to the organic law. What has become of these bills? They went to the Judiciary Committee. Has that committee considered them? No! Does it intend to? No! They have acted adversely, I am told, upon two out of the forty-nine bills.

And here let me say a word about the Judiciary Committee which will apply equally well to the other so-called important committees of this House. Whenever a bill is introduced there is a struggle between the committees as to which shall get it for consideration. The jealousy I have seen displayed upon this floor in this respect would surpass that of the opposite sex upon an Easter Sunday. Each committee wants to gobble up all the bills it can. The result is, some of the committees are overloaded while others have comparatively little to do. The Judiciary Committee has always been a "stickler" for what it conceives to be its rights. It has always insisted upon gathering more eggs in its nest than it could cover.

Feeling from the first that my proposed constitutional amendments would never receive any consideration from the Judiciary Committee, I introduced on the 11th day of January last a resolution to raise a special committee on constitutional amendments, to which all bills for that purpose should be referred. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules, where it entered into that peaceful sleep which knows no waking.

Now, what are we going to do about it? I believe that my proposed amendments are of great public importance. I think we will never get rid of legislative and other abuses until they are adopted. I am not alone in this opinion. The press of the country, without regard to party, has commended them, particularly the one which looks to establishing a uniform law of marriage and divorce.

The position I take is this: The bills should be considered. If they are meritorious let them be adopted; if not, let them be rejected. The position taken by the Judiciary Committee is: They will not consider them, and, with a dog-in-the-manger policy, they will not let any other committee consider them. I have appealed to members of that committee, as others have before me, to take up my proposed amendments and consider them, but I get nothing but evasive answers.

Mr. Chairman, it is a fact about which there can be no dispute, that a great change has taken place in the country during the last hundred years. It must be remembered that when the Constitution was framed the country was in its infancy. The population was about 4,000,000; now it is 55,000,000. There were but thirteen States; now there are thirty-eight States and eight Territories. Of manufactories there were but few and of commerce but little, and the present instrumentalities of carrying them on had not been discovered. Electricity and steam as motors in material industries had not been thought of. The engine on the water has now taken the place of canvas, and the engine on the land has supplanted the stage-coach. Between then and now a vast change has taken place in the habits and wants of the people. A constitution that was adapted to that early period of our history is entirely inadequate to the necessities of to-day.

I am aware of the reverence with which we have been taught to regard that sacred instrument, but I must submit we have been wrongfully taught. I can not subscribe to the theory that we must adhere to a constitution simply because of its antiquity or because it has, in the main, been beneficent in its operations.

Let me read you what Jefferson says on this subject. Here is an extract from one of his letters:

> Some men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence, and deem them like the ark of the covenants, too sacred to be touched. They ascribe to the men of the preceding age a wisdom more than human, and suppose what they did to be beyond amendment. I know that age well; I belonged to it, and labored with it. It deserved well of its country. It was very like the present, but without the experience of the present; and forty years' experience in government is worth a century of book-reading. We had not yet penetrated to the mother principle, that governments are republican only as they embody the will of the people and execute it. Hence our first constitutions had no leading principle in them.

Again he says:

> The dead have no sight; they are nothing, and nothing can not own something. The corporeal globe and everything upon it belongs to its present corporeal inhabitants, during their generation; they alone have a right to direct what is the concern of themselves alone, and to declare the law of that direction; and this declaration can only be made by a majority. That majority, then, has a right to depute representatives to a convention, and to make the constitution what they think will be best for themselves.

Again:

> Let us not weakly believe that one generation is not as capable as another of taking care of itself and of ordering its own affairs.

Guided by these principles, the State of New York, which I have the honor to represent in part on this floor, requires in her constitution that every twentieth year, and as much oftener as the Legislature may provide, the question of revising and amending the constitution must be submitted to the people.

In this provision the Empire State is true to her motto: Excelsior! She believes in adapting her organic law to the wants of an ever-progressing people; and by thus doing she has taken the lead in constitutional law; and the wise and salutary provisions of her constitutions have from time to time been adopted by most of the other States.

Among other legislative reforms to which my attention has been called and which I desire to commend is one proposed by my distinguished friend, Mr. BLANCHARD, of Louisiana, who has a bill to change the time for meeting of Congress from the 4th of December to the first week in January. This is a much-needed change. As is well known we come here in the early part of December and after numerous short adjournments of three days each (that being the constitutional limitation) we get the consent of the Senate and take a long adjournment of ten days to two weeks, which carries us over the holidays and well into January. Now, we should do one thing or the other—abolish the holiday recess or meet in January. There is no work of any account done in December, and members are kept here at large expense.

In this connection I will simply hint at the propriety of changing the law in relation to the election of Representatives. As it now stands they are elected over a year before they take their seats. It is argued that this being the more numerous and popular branch of the Legislature, its members should come fresh from the people. They would certainly be more apt to remember the issues upon which they are elected and carry out the views of their constituents if they took their seats shortly after election.

Mr. Chairman, another reform might be brought about in the manner of preparing and passing the appropriation bills. We have, I believe, fourteen general appropriation bills. I think the number might be safely reduced to two. In one, which might be called the "necessary appropriation bill," we could provide for the payment of all salaries and expenses which are fixed by law. This would be a mere matter of compilation and could be furnished by the heads of the various Departments. Such a bill would pass as a matter of course, requiring little or no consideration. In the other, which might be called the "conditional appropriation bill," we could place all appropriations upon which Congress was to exercise discretion. The advantage of such a system would be to simplify legislation, narrow down investigation, and invite a more careful scrutiny of all items of doubtful propriety.

I can not attempt, Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allotted me, to cover the whole field of legislative reform. It is indeed a wide one, and there is plenty of hard work to be done. I have outlined hurriedly, and imperfectly, I confess, a few of the reforms which are deserving of the early attention of Congress. I have simply shown the path, as it were, but I trust there will be some one to follow who will enter upon it and work out practical results. Before resuming my seat I beg leave to say just a few words upon a matter which is in the line of the remarks I have been making. I wish I had time, Mr. Chairman, to speak as I would like to about the rules of this House. They are simply abominable. They are a disgrace to any intelligent deliberative body. They are framed with the sole purpose to obstruct and defeat legislation. A man with any sense would say that the rules should be made to facilitate the business of the House. The people are not familiar with these rules or they would ridicule their representatives into changing them at once. Look at the rule which permits one member to rise in his seat and by the simple words "I object" defeat the consideration of a measure upon which the other three hundred and twenty-four members are anxiously intent. Is it fair or right to lodge such a power in the hands of one man who may, through personal or local reasons, defeat a measure of great public moment?

But the most objectionable feature in connection with the rules is the almost endless talk to which their construction gives rise. I have known a whole day wasted in discussing some frivolous point of order. I believe it would be a good plan to have no rules whatever but let the Speaker decide all questions of order upon his own judgment and sense of fairness. Make an autocrat of him. Let his decision be final. No appeal. His decision would be subject to public criticism, and in nine times out of ten he would decide right. It would be better to run the risk of an occasional erroneous ruling than submit to the present system under which so much valuable time is wasted.

Another great waste of time is in calling the roll. In the last Congress there were 318 roll-calls, taking about thirty minutes each; the aggregate time thus taken amounting to 159 hours, or about 32 days, putting the legislative day at five hours. Thirty-two days, or over a month, of the time of this House was actually consumed in the last Congress in the single act of calling the yeas and nays. If we multiply the 32 days by 325 (the number of Representatives), we have the grand total of 10,400 days, or about three years (of one man's time) wasted, to say nothing of the time of the doorkeepers, ushers, clerks, and other attendants. I wish the gentlemen in the gallery in front of me would take down these figures and spread them before the people.

It will be said, "The yeas and nays must be called or we can not ascertain the result of a vote." True. But why should we adhere to the system of our grandfathers when a better one can be adopted, doing away with all the evils of the old one? Why can we not use the electric wire to register our votes? The simple pressure of a button on our desks, upon the call of the Speaker, would convey to a dial on the Clerk's desk the vote of the whole three hundred and twenty-five members in the twinkling of an eye. If any mistake in the recording should occur it could be corrected the next morning when we get the RECORD. I understand that this system prevails in France, and I have yet to hear any valid objections to it.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me indulge the hope that Congress will at some early date turn its attention to these matters and work out at least some of the reforms to which I have referred. They are of great public importance, and they will keep growing in importance as our population increases and the wants of the people multiply with their material progress. It is no party question, sir. It is the cause of the people, and should have, as I trust it will, the hearty support of every true friend of good government.

TARIFF REDUCTION.

Mr. MORGAN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman, all the good things and many bad, all the new things and all the old things possible to be said on the subject have been said, and hundreds of times repeated in the course of this debate. I find no excuse for taking the time of the committee in the hope of changing a single vote here or elsewhere. But the wide-reaching influence of the tariff law and the national and enduring importance of the subject will excuse, if not justify, even the humblest member of this body in presenting a statement of his views.

A large part of the debate which the House has so carefully refrained from listening to has turned upon the question of the relative merits of free-trade and protection. I can not regard such discussion as necessary to aid us in passing upon the merits of this bill. We are not yet in sight of that question. It lies far in the future.

The true purpose of this bill is, and its effect, if passed, will be, that expressed in its title—the reduction of war-tariff taxes; and no gentleman who has yet spoken in this debate has been bold enough to assert that it has any other purpose, or can have any other effect. By express provision of the bill no duties under it are to be lower than the rates fixed by the Morrill tariff of 1861. That was a tariff for protection framed and passed by protectionists. After the passage of that law the exigencies of the Government compelled the adoption of the internal-revenue system, including excise taxes upon business, income taxes, license taxes, stamp taxes, &c. The manufacturers of the country claimed that the exactions of the internal-revenue system took away from them all the advantages which the Morrill tariff was designed to give them. Under such pleas the protective-tariff taxes of 1861 were increased from time to time by additions which are designated in the bill as "war-tariff taxes." The internal-revenue taxes, which constituted the excuse for the levying of the "war-tariff taxes," stamps, licenses, income, everything except those on liquors and tobacco, have long ago been wiped from the statute-books. The practical question now presented is, shall these "war-tariff taxes" continue when the sole excuse which the protectionists themselves ever advanced in their favor has ceased to exist? Surely this question ought not to depend for its solution upon any consideration of the principles of free trade or of protection.

I repeat, the Morrill tariff of 1861 was a tariff framed and passed by protectionists. It was commended by them to the country on the theory that the industries protected by it were in their infancy and needed the aid of the taxing power of the Government to set them on their feet. It was further commended to the country by the promise that when these industries should have grown strong and prosperous by the aid of the law they would consent to a reduction of duties to the revenue standard, and take the ordinary chances of competition in the markets of the world. Sir, the taxes which they themselves then fixed as the needed measure of protection have since been increased by additions of "war-tariff taxes," in ratio varying from 25 to 50 per cent. above that limit.

Now, after twenty years' enjoyment of the bounty of the people, far in excess of their own original demands, the oppressed tax-payers, the producers and laborers of the country, claim fulfillment of the promise made. They see that gigantic fortunes have been piled up by the manufacturers. They see that these infant industries have grown into vast and far-reaching monopolies. They see that the number of trained workmen, the buildings, the machinery, and the capital invested are capable of producing manufactured wares far in excess of the home demand. They see this excess practically shut out from foreign markets by the operations of our tariff laws. They see these manufacturers strong enough to close their factories, turn their workmen into the streets, and let their costly plants lie idle for long periods, until diminished production is brought to equation with increased demand. They see them forming combinations to keep up prices in a glutted market, and hear their boasts that they are able to manufacture large lines of highly protected wares cheaper than the manufacturers of England and Germany.

The people, then, claim the promise made; they ask that these pampered favorites of the law shall be shorn of their power to exact these enormous bounties and be subjected in some degree to the same competition which attends all other branches of labor and production. What is the answer to this demand? It is no longer the plea of infancy and poverty. Time and "war-tariff taxes" have disposed of that. They claim that it will be a shock to the business interests of the country to deprive them of these bounties. This answer adds insult to injury. It assumes in effect that the people who have so long submitted to the exactions of the tariff have by their submission made themselves responsible for the business relations of the favored classes, and liable to guard at their own expense the fortunes which they have permitted to be taken from their own pockets. But unreasonable as this contention is, the bill under consideration is a concession to it. It concedes protection, and, with the exception of three additions to the free-list, calls only for the repeal of taxes in excess of the demands of protection—the war-tariff taxes levied since the passage of the Morrill tariff of 1861.

Concession never satisfied greed. This reasonable measure, conceding to the protected interests even more than justice demands, has aroused the bitterest hostility of all the favored classes. The arguments used against it are many and conflicting, for they appeal in turn to many interests which are not in harmony among themselves. I refer to some of these arguments not so much for the purpose of answering them as to indicate briefly what answers will be made to them in the court of the people.

It is said by many gentlemen that the agitation of this question will imperil the success of the Democratic party in the approaching Presidential election; and several of our Republican friends have manifested some solicitude on this aspect of the case, a solicitude which is greatly to their credit and is deeply appreciated. Mr. Chairman, this argument deserves but one answer: it is not the business of this House to legislate or omit to legislate for Presidential elections. But there is another answer. The Democrat who believes in this reform and consents to postpone the question in the hope of attracting protectionists to the support of the Democratic candidates is doing all that lies in his power to render the Democratic party unworthy of success. We intend to carry out this reform, or we do not. Our declarations, or better, our actions, should be plain and not susceptible of two interpretations. A declaration that we intend to lower the tariff in case of success will surely make it impossible to secure the vote of a single protectionist. A declaration that we do not intend to reduce the tariff will dissolve the Democratic party.

But fortunately, sir, it is not in the power of the gentlemen who desire two-faced declarations, instead of simple action, to commit the Democratic party to any course of deception on this question. The intrenched line of protection and monopoly is the line of the Republican party. The protected interests know, indeed, that they have a few devotees among so-called Democrats. They know that among Republicans are some who are restless and eager to break away from the support of monopoly; but they also know that the masses of the Democratic party are in favor of tariff reform, while the masses of the Republican party, including all of its leaders, are in favor of the existing tariff as it stands, and can alone be relied upon to increase it. They will not trust the Democratic party. The confidence game so often outlined for the Presidential election is doomed to failure if attempted.

But, sir, it is said that it is useless to pass this bill, because other branches of the Government will reject it. It is the duty of this House, Mr. Chairman, to interpret and to act upon its own responsibility. We have no right to assume that any other body will reject any measure whatever which the House sees fit to pass. If we fail for this reason to pass this bill you must expect, sir, to be met with the assertion that the body referred to would have adopted it, and where will be your answer? That body can not originate revenue bills; only this House can do that. Those who may succeed in defeating this bill here can not be heard and will not be heard by the people to cast responsibility for its defeat upon a body which will never have been permitted to vote upon it. Such an argument is childish.

It is urged that no bill on the subject of the tariff should be passed until we have had time to test the law of March, 1883. Sir, we have had ample time to test that law. We know now, as well as we will ever know, that the law of 1883, professedly passed for the purpose of reducing taxation, largely increased taxation on many articles of common use and made a reduction in the aggregate of less than 2 per cent. The average reduction which was fraudulently assumed to be made by the Republican Congress which passed the act of March, 1883—the reduction which they admitted ought to be made—was from 20 to 25 per cent. The bill under consideration proposes an average reduction of about 16 per cent., which, added to the reduction actually made by the law of 1883, is still less than the lowest estimate of reduction admitted by the advocates of that bill to be just and necessary. Sir, we have lived just long enough under that law to find out that it embodied a fraud upon the people—a wrong which can not too soon be remedied.

It is said that the uniform reduction of 20 per cent. is empirical, unscientific. Sir, if we wait for the presentation of a bill reducing duties on imports which will commend itself to the protected interests by its reasonable contents and scientific construction we shall wait until after the "twilight of the gods." Nothing but an increase, horizontal or other, will ever satisfy their cravings for symmetry in the construction of tariffs. But this objection should not be heard coming from the Republican opponents of this measure.

The law of 1883 emanated from a tariff commission appointed by the Republican party. It was accepted and passed by the Republican majority in Congress. It was the work of experts and scientists specially charged to re-examine all the provisions of our tariff laws and propose changes in the schedule adapted to the changed condition of our manufacturing industries. It is not for the party which appointed them to do this work, and which ratified the work when done, to charge now that it was unscientific. Yet that is precisely what they do charge when they allege that a reduction of 20 per cent., which works no change in the relative status of the various articles and schedules, is empirical and unscientific.

Again, it is charged that this bill will so increase importations as to swell the revenue and the surplus in the Treasury. Here again, sir, we answer them out of their own mouths. The Republican tariff law of 1883 was passed upon their assertion that it scaled the taxes down from 20 to 25 per cent., and would therefore reduce the revenue $45,000,000. The first assumption was false and undoubtedly fraudulent. But we can not say that if the first had been true the second would not also have been found true. If their reasoning was good then it is good now. The bill under consideration certainly reduces the average rates 17 per cent. below those in force prior to the law of March, 1883. If they were not then mistaken in their argument it will reduce the revenues from $30,000,000 to $35,000,000.

But, Mr. Chairman, while I admit that a surplus in the Treasury is in some respects an evil, I also admit that I favor this bill rather to reduce taxation than to reduce revenue. Those who oppose the bill do so because it diminishes that kind of taxation which diverts the money of the people to the private uses of a favored class. We support it for the same reason. There is entire agreement on all sides as to its effect in this direction. If it shall still leave a surplus in the Treasury we will then inquire further how that surplus may be disposed of, and will indulge the hope that pending that inquiry the evil may be in some degree mitigated by a change of administration.

The last of these objections which I shall notice is the one most frequently used by the Republican opponents of this measure—that the bill is the entering-wedge to the establishment of the policy of free trade. None of these gentlemen go so far as to say that they would vote for the bill if they believed it were not the initiation of free trade; but it is evident from the tone of their remarks that they are quite willing to let such an impression go to the country. But as many of them seem incapable of discriminating between free trade and tariff for revenue, a word or two may be in place on that subject. No one is demanding free trade at this time. It is not probable that free trade will be advocated by any party or by any considerable number of persons at any time in the future. Free trade would necessitate direct taxation, and direct taxation under the Constitution must be apportioned among the States according to representation and not according to assessed value of property. The States most interested in reduction of impost duties are the States upon which this rule of the Constitution would bear with greatest weight. It is not for a moment to be assumed that they will ever favor a policy which would subject them to such unequal burdens.

But, Mr. Chairman, the friends of this bill, while they deny that such discussion is now in place, are not anxious to avoid the discussion of the relative merits of tariff for revenue and tariff for protection. Nor will they pledge themselves to remain forever silent after the "war-tariff taxes" are removed. They will then be ready to meet the great practical economic question to arise: whether the policy of protection should be continued indefinitely or at all? And they are ready now, Mr. Chairman, if the opponents of this bill insist upon it, to anticipate the discussion of that question either in this House or before the people.

It is not my purpose, nor is it necessary, Mr. Chairman, to enter into the philosophy of the question, or to cite here great tables of statistics for the purpose of proving any set of propositions. All that has been sufficiently done by gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. I notice, to answer briefly, some of the arguments most frequently used on this floor in favor of the continuance of high protective tariffs. One argument—and it has been the most effective of all, for it is addressed to the most numerous class of voters in the country, the farmer—is that protection furnishes a home market by diversifying industry and building up communities engaged in trades and occupations which consume the farmer's product and do not compete with his labor.

If other evidence were wanting, Mr. Chairman, I should confidently appeal to what has been said in this debate for proof of the falsity of the argument and the utter failure of the policy. Several gentlemen have attempted to figure out the proportion of agricultural products consumed at home. With unlimited supplies of ink and paper, with ample time and full liberty to bend the figures to their will, not one of them has succeeded in making an equation between home supply and home demand. The boldest of them was only able to carry domestic consumption up to 92 per cent. of domestic supply, leaving 8 per cent. to be disposed of in foreign markets. And yet they admit, for they do not dare to deny, that 1 per cent. to be sold in foreign markets means a failure of the policy, for the foreign price of the surplus to be sold, no matter how small it may be, fixes the price of the portion sold for domestic use. This after twenty-three years of protection.

Admitting that no more than 8 per cent. is available for export, what now is the prospect of the absorption of that 8 per cent. in the home market? If demanded here it must be for consumers not themselves engaged in agriculture. Will a continuance of protection furnish these consumers to the domestic market? I appeal to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] for the answer to this question. He said in his speech at the opening of this debate, and nearly every gentleman who has spoken on that side has indorsed his statement—none contradicting it—that the manufacturing establishments of this country are to-day capable of producing wares far in excess of the demands of domestic consumption. The statement is undoubtedly true; and, being true, no argument is needed to show that all hope of absorbing the domestic surplus in the domestic markets must be abandoned.

With this prospect in view our farmers are threatened with the loss of their foreign market for their great staples. Foreign nations have grown weary of submitting to our policy which forces them to buy our agricultural products while refusing to take anything from them in exchange. Barred out by prohibitory tariffs from selling in our markets, they are seeking other sources of supply for products which they have heretofore purchased from our people. They have been partially successful in this, and will not rest until they shall be entirely relieved from the necessity of buying in markets where they are not permitted to sell. Already the staple products of our agriculture begin to feel the effects of increased production in India and Australia, and the time is not far distant when our surplus of production, instead of finding a market in foreign ports, must rot in the fields, serving there no purpose but to depress the price of that which is consumed at home.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] endeavors to dispose of this view of the subject by telling us of a man who owned land adjoining a manufacturing town in his State who prospered in a fair degree by selling his products to the people of the town. No doubt, Mr. Chairman, many other similar instances might be cited in the vicinity of every city in the country, without regard to whether the city is given up to manufactures or not. This city of Washington, which has no manufactures whatever, would furnish many such examples. But the argument will not be effective until we are enabled to class strawberries and green corn, lettuce and asparagus among the staple agricultural products of the country. It is an infinitesimal portion of our agricultural lands that is or ever will be available for such purposes. Men situated like the one mentioned by the gentleman from Connecticut never need the aid of law. The millions of farmers of this country can not find markets for "garden sass." They must raise the great staples for the general markets and must have remunerative prices in such markets or go down, down under their load of debt and taxes. No, sir; protection does nothing for the farmers, no matter what it may do for the few market gardeners. Its purpose is to compel them to buy in a market where competition is excluded by statute, while they must sell in markets open to competition from the whole world.

But it is claimed that protection, by encouraging the investment of capital in manufactures, leads to competition in the home market and lowers prices. Experience has shown that this is not true. It is occasionally true. The Spanish proverb says: Greediness bursts the bag. The mad race of competition artificially stimulated sometimes gluts the markets with goods manufactured on borrowed capital. Forced sales and fall in prices momentarily ensue; but the vast aggregations of capital invested soon put order in the market. The disturbing element is quickly withdrawn by combinations of capital, the mills are shut down, and prices arbitrarily maintained until the balance of the protected market is restored. In this way the farmers who have paid the cost of building up and enriching the capitalists engaged in manufactures are cheated out of the promised results of competition.

But more, sir; far from giving to the farmers the reward promised for their long years of tax-paying, these men now besiege the executive department of our Government and clamor for reciprocity treaties by which they may find markets for their surplus manufactures in Mexico and South America. The natural effects of this policy, if carried out, will be to make and maintain high prices for their products without the necessity of periodically stopping their mills and letting their plants lie idle.

I protest, sir, that this involves a breach of faith. Was it the understanding that when the conditions of competition were secured through the aid of bounties paid by the farmers of the country the manufactures might destroy the effect of competition by widening their market? Or was it not a part of the implied agreement upon which prohibitory duties have been tolerated that the manufacturers should limit the sale of their products to the domestic market? When otherwise will the agricultural producers of the country enjoy with certainty the benefits of the competition in the home market which has been promised them? Fairness to this great interest, Mr. Chairman, demands that a prohibition of the export of domestic manufactures shall go hand in hand with the continuance of protective duties. But far from admitting any obligation for the bounties they have so long enjoyed, these favored classes bend there energies and use their combined capital in efforts to cheat the farmers out of the benefits of competition by conspiracies to diminish production and at the same time to extend their markets in Mexico and South America.

I have said, sir, that the pleas of infancy and debility are no longer employed. They are not openly insisted upon, but the advocates of protection on this floor imply them when they tell us of the consequences of the passage of this bill—mills closed, workmen starving in the streets, and bankruptcy and ruin everywhere. There is bad faith in all of this, Mr. Chairman. When exulting over the effects of protection and appealing to national pride, forgetful then of other considerations, they boast of the cheapness of American manufactures, and claim to undersell the English in their own markets. A distinguished advocate of protection, who took a prominent part in framing and passing the law of March, 1883, said to me very recently that that law imposed duties on a great number of articles which no longer need protection. I asked him for a list of them, but he declined to furnish it. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] has stated on this floor that sixty articles embraced in the existing tariff schedules manufactured in his State do not need protection because they can be made cheaper there than in England. But he did not name them nor propose to place them on the free-list.

But we are able to pick up a little definite information on this subject from the literature furnished by the protectionists themselves, furnished for another purpose, and for that reason more valuable. I hold in my hand a pamphlet marked "Tariff Tract No. 6, published by the American Iron and Steel Association, James M. Swank, secretary," in which I find two paragraphs, which I read, as follows:

As one proof of this you have only to look over the exports from our country to foreign countries of our manufactured commodities. We are sending to other nations yearly our agricultural implements, including fanning-mills, horse-powers, mowers and reapers, plows, cultivators, forks, hoes, &c., carriages, carts, cotton goods, railroad-cars, locomotives, steam-engines, watches, clocks, glass and glassware, hats, caps, boots, shoes, wearing apparel, machinery, cutlery, edge-tools, files, saws, firearms, nails, India-rubber goods, jewelry, lamps, saddlery, harness, organs, piano-fortes, paper, stationery, printing-presses, sewing-machines, household goods, furniture, woodwork, tinware, and scales.

We are steadily, year by year, increasing the variety and quality as well as the quantity we are sending abroad. Among these last year were over 148,000,000 yards of cotton goods, and nearly 400,000 clocks. If you will go to the leading dry-goods stores in Liverpool and Manchester you will find hundreds of pieces of our cotton goods being sold, equal in quality and texture to any they are making in England and at less price than they can sell those of their own manufacturing; while the "Yankee clocks," as they call them, are scattered all over their country. Our agricultural tools and implements, our axes, our edge-tools, our machines, and hundreds of other kinds of manufactured commodities, are found for sale in every town of any size in the kingdom. We are, therefore, not only competing with England in all the markets of the world, but competing with her in her own markets at home.

On this whole list of articles our tariff taxes average between 30 and 40 per cent. ad valorem—on some of them over 50 per cent.; and the same is probably true of the "hundreds of other kinds of manufactured commodities" which are not specifically named. Now, sir, it is certainly true that if our manufacturers can make these goods here, pay freight, insurance, exchange, consuls' fees, and other charges in sending them to England, and then sell them in competition at their own doors with the manufacturers of England, they do not need protection against that pauper labor which they supplant on its own soil. No man will seriously deny this, and I beg you to observe, Mr. Chairman, that a great portion of these articles named—saying nothing of the "hundreds of others" not named—are of composite character. They require for their construction large numbers of different forms of various metals, wood, leather, cloth, and other materials which figure separately on our tariff schedules. If combined in manufacture they need no protection, it is a fair and reasonable presumption that they do not need it in their simple state. And so the list of heavily protected articles which need no protection is greatly extended.

But what advocate of protection was found in 1883, or is found now, proposing either to reduce or abolish the duties on any one of these articles? It might well be, sir, that if they would act in good faith and frankly propose to put on the free-list the articles which they well know no longer need protection against the dreaded pauper labor of Europe, the friends of revenue reform could meet them and agree to continue yet longer the present protective duties on other articles which may possibly need such bounty. But, sir, they resist with desperation every attempt at reduction. They admit no compromise. They demand more, and will be satisfied with not one cent less. And here I may remark that while they now clamor to be let alone, and cry out against any reopening of the tariff question, it is but a short time since they were of a very different mind. Only last fall, just before the opening of this session of Congress, the Bulletin of the American Iron and Steel Association, copies of which were kindly sent to me for my guidance, demanded loudly that Congress should reopen the tariff question and repeal the beggarly reductions made by the law of 1883, and particularly so raise the duties as to create in this country "a cotton-tie industry," "a tin-plate industry," and several other industries.

But, Mr. Chairman, the favorite argument of the protectionists is that protection upholds the wages of the American laborer and saves him from the wretched state of the pauper laborer of England. Many tables have been compiled and published here and elsewhere showing rates of wages paid in this country and in England. Tables also are presented to show the purchasing power of the wages paid in both countries. I doubt, Mr. Chairman, if any correct conclusions can be drawn from such comparisons. Thousands of circumstances which affect rates of wages and purchasing power in both countries are necessarily excluded from view in those tables, and those which are most carefully compiled leave us with the impression that they are deceptive and unsatisfactory. A few simple facts not open to dispute or qualification will lead us to more accurate conclusions than a volume of such figures.

Let us inquire to what class of persons this argument refers. It excludes all persons engaged in agriculture. Work on the farm is not "labor" in the sense in which protectionists use that word. By the census of 1880 the whole number of persons engaged in manufactures, mining, and mechanical industries in the United States was 3,837,112, and this number included 631,988 females and 133,607 boys and girls 15 years of age and under. There are included also many thousands who can have no possible interest in protection, who unquestionably are burdened by protection, always in their means of living, and generally through the operation of the tariff upon articles used in their business. It is necessary to deduct these from the aggregate in order to ascertain the number of people to whom the argument applies. I select none but those in regard to whom no question can be raised.

This total of 3,837,112 includes bakers, blacksmiths, brewers, maltsters, bridge builders and contractors, builders and contractors, butchers, carpenters and joiners, coopers, fishermen, gas-works employés, stone-cutters, masons, meat and fruit packers, millers, oil-well operators, laborers and refiners, paper-hangers, plasterers, plumbers and gasfitters, pump-makers, quarrymen, railroad builders, roofers, slaters, upholsterers, and wheelwrights, to the number, in all, of 1,188,874. This total also includes carpet-makers, charcoal and lime burners, clock and watch makers and repairers, confectioners, engineers and firemen, engravers, gun and lock smiths, machinists, milliners, dress-makers, seamstresses, painters and varnishers, photographers, stave-makers, tailors and tailoresses, tinners, tinware-makers, and wood-choppers, to the number, in all, of 863,646. It is certain that at least one-half of this last number have as little direct interest in the tariff as the farmers themselves. But including them all it will appear that the whole number of persons whose wages are subject to be directly affected by protection, if they can be affected by it at all, is 2,748,238. The whole number of persons engaged in agriculture in 1880 was 7,670,493. And these farmers for over twenty years have submitted to an average tax of not less than 40 per cent. on everything they have had to buy for the ostensible purpose of keeping up the wages of this small handful of our people.

I admit without further inquiry the general proposition that the average wages of the people have been and are higher than those of persons engaged in similar occupations in Europe, and also will admit, for the sake of the argument, that the purchasing power of the wages is as great here as there. Laying aside the question whether it pays us as a people to keep up the wages of a small class by such exorbitant taxation upon the necessaries of life, we come to inquire whether this difference in wages is in fact due to protection or to other causes. The statement of a single fact, disputed by nobody, suffices to dispose of the claim that it is due to protection. England with free trade pays higher wages than Germany and France with protective tariffs. The difference in wages is due entirely to the fact that in Europe population is crowded and land is not to be had. Given the same state of things here, and the same results will follow.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], assuming erroneously that the whole number of 3,837,112 persons found to be engaged in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits are dependent for occupation on the protective tariff, asks what would be the effect of diverting them from those pursuits and sending them forth to compete in other branches of labor. Saying nothing of the effects of this bill, which leaves an average of protective duties of about 30 per cent. ad valorem, I deny that even absolute free trade, the abolition of all customs duties, would send the half of them into other pursuits.

Between 1860 and 1880, 122,966,221 acres were added to the area of improved lands of the United States. Over 50,000 miles of new railroads were constructed and put in operation. Vast additions were made to coastwise and inland tonnage. Thousands of mines have been opened west of the Mississippi River, and numerous other demands for labor have followed upon this enormous development of our material resources, none of which are in the slightest degree dependent upon the tariff. Let me then answer the gentleman from Maine by asking him another question: What would have been the effect upon the wages of factory operatives if the hands and brains which have gone into the reclaiming and continuous cultivation of these lands, the building and operating of the railroads and steamboat lines, and other pursuits dependent upon these, had been driven to compete for work and bread in the manufacturing centers of the country? But go further, cancel in imagination all the lands within the borders of this country not now actually occupied, keep up your protective tariffs or raise them higher, and with a manufacturing capacity now in excess of the home demand and without a foreign market, tell me where will be the wages of your factory operatives in five years from now? I have not a particle of doubt that in less time than that they will be lower than they are in England.

It has been well said, sir, by the gentleman from Michigan that the real purpose of the tariff has been to compensate the manufacturer for the high price of labor, to protect him against it by compelling the high-priced laborer to buy high-priced goods. Desiring to start manufactories, they find labor high. The reason they give for passing protective-tariff laws is that labor is too high to permit them to compete without a bounty with the low-priced labor of Europe. The tariff law is passed, and straightway they impudently claim that the wages of labor are high by reason of the tariff.

The tariff, sir, has never added one dollar directly or indirectly to the wages of the American workman. The manufacturer has never paid one dollar in wages which he was not compelled to pay because of the scarcity of labor, and the scarcity of labor has never been in the slightest degree due to the tariff. There has always been absolute free trade in labor, and the manufacturer has never failed to use it remorselessly to depress the rate of wages. The records of this House prove that they import foreign labor under contract and transfer the dreaded pauper labor of Europe to this country to deprive our native workmen of the benefits of the scarcity of labor produced by the natural causes which I have mentioned.

A bill is before this House to prohibit such transactions accompanied by the report of a committee containing the proofs. The census returns show that native workmen are gradually being crowded out of the employments which have been fostered by tariff bounties for their supposed benefit. In Rhode Island and Massachusetts over 25 per cent. of the population found in 1880 were of foreign birth; in Connecticut, over 20 per cent. If the children of these people of foreign birth, born in the last twenty-five years, were added it would no doubt appear that but little more than one-half of the population is, in any true sense, native. The same proportion holds in the manufacturing centers of Pennsylvania.

But, sir, even in this country we are not without examples of the effects of a crowded population upon the wages of labor. In this country, as in all others, there are often found in crowded localities those whose hopeless poverty, if not the lack or loss of ambition or other incentive, binds them to the spot. And here in our large cities such people are as effectually barred from participation in the great natural advantages of the country, as though they lived in Europe. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has told us the story of the trace-chains, and how the poor women who make them labor for starvation wages. He told us of the poverty and suffering in the slums of London to affright us from the passage of this bill.

Sir, the gentleman should know—does know—that Berlin and Paris, capitals of protected countries, will match every picture of poverty and suffering which he has drawn for us. Will he dare to say that New York and Philadelphia, his own city, have no slums, no unfortunate people who work for starvation wages? Are the shirt-makers of those cities, too poor to escape from their merciless employers, better paid than the women who make the trace-chains? He knows they are not. He knows that this unfortunate class in every city in the world are paid starvation wages, are insufficiently fed and clothed, are housed in chambers where the light is dim and the air impure—where vice, disease, and death lie in wait for them.

But why dilate upon this subject? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has produced and read upon this floor evidence that in the coke regions of Pennsylvania women and young girls from 12 to 16 years of age are engaged in labor that would tax the strength of strong men, handling coke-forks in crowded rooms, breathing poisonous gases in a temperature of 110°. No member on this floor from that State has questioned the evidence. Sir, the argument which the gentleman from Pennsylvania attempts to draw from the slums of London and the condition of the poor in England is fitly attended and sufficiently answered by his absurd assumption that the passage of the bill under consideration will "add pernicious anæmia to the list of diseases with which our working people are already familiar."

Protection, Mr. Chairman, has enriched the manufacturers as a class, but it has robbed the people at large. It has failed on every point to do what it promised for the country. It has not created the home market for the products of our agriculture. It has produced the conditions of competition in manufactures, but by combinations of capital it has cheated the people out of the legitimate fruits of that competition. It has added nothing to the wages of labor, but has constantly striven and is still striving to defraud the native laborer of the advantages which naturally belong to him by reason of our comparatively sparse population and abundance of land.

But independently of all these considerations this bill ought to pass. As I have said, it leaves untouched the principle and policy of protection. It deals with the "war-tariff taxes" only, and does not entirely remove them except in a few cases. To the extent of the reduction made it will prevent exactions upon our people in excess of the requirements of protection as stated by its own advocates. If this bill shall become a law the average of duties on all cotton goods under it will be 31.50 per cent. ad valorem, about 7 per cent. less than under the present law; on hemp, jute, and flax goods 24.60 per cent. ad valorem, about 4 per cent. less than the average under the law now in force; on wool and woolen goods, 46.43 per cent. ad valorem, against 57.70 per cent. now levied; on metals and manufactures of metal, 29.81 per cent., against 35.19 per cent. under the law of 1883; on crockery and glassware, 44.12 per cent., against 53.16 as now.

Can it be said that these reductions are unreasonable? Or will it be claimed that the rates established by the bill are insufficient for protection? To this it may be said now, and gentlemen may rely upon it it will be insisted upon again in that other forum to which we are all tending, that no gentleman who has so far spoken upon this floor has undertaken to point out a single rate established by the bill which is below the requirements of protection. They do not condescend to so simple a means of argument, but in presence of a measure which leaves the average rate of all tariff duties over 30 per cent. ad valorem they fall to shrieking about free trade and the pauper labor of Europe.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I invite the attention of this committee for a moment to the attitude of parties and factions toward this bill and the subject of revenue reform. The whole situation is reduced to two statements of facts and one conclusion: We have an actual surplus now in the Treasury in excess of demands to date of at least $50,000,000; we are taking from the pockets of the people every year from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 in excess of the annual necessary expenditures of the Government; and the conclusion is that honesty and sound policy require a reduction of the revenues. So far no disagreement here or elsewhere. We have our choice to reduce the revenues of the Government by reducing or repealing the internal-revenue taxes on whisky and tobacco, or by reducing the duties on foreign imports, the taxes—war taxes—on hats, caps, boots, shoes, clothing, blankets, knit goods, crockery, cutlery, glassware—in short, on the necessaries of life.

The majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, representing a large majority of the Democratic party in this House and in the country, bring forward this bill which reduces the war taxes on the necessaries of life and leaves untouched all taxes on whisky and tobacco. The issue so made is a plain one: necessaries of life on the one hand, whisky and tobacco on the other. From which shall the taxes be taken to reduce the surplus revenue which all admit ought to be reduced? The solid Republican minority in this House, with the exception of four gentlemen from Minnesota, and a fraction of Democrats elected from manufacturing districts, array themselves in opposition to the bill. Many of them, all the leaders of this opposition, admit, and none of them deny, that they prefer to make the needed reduction of surplus revenues by repealing the taxes on whisky and tobacco, and to leave untouched the war taxes on the necessaries of life. Mr. KELLEY and Mr. RANDALL frankly avow this intention and argue in its favor. Not one of their followers on either side disclaims it. But many of those gentlemen who have spoken pretend, while opposing this bill, to be in favor of reduction of the duties on imports. These gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, will be judged hereafter by their actions and not by their words.

First, sir, let us look at the action of the Republican minority of the Committee of Ways and Means, five gentlemen among the oldest and most experienced in this House, familiar with the subject in all its details. It was their privilege in any event, it was their duty, if they believed the present tariff ought to be reduced, and were not satisfied with the bill of the majority, to report a substitute for it. Instead of reporting such bill or recommending amendments of the bill of the majority, they reported an argument against any changes in the existing tariff, and against free trade. The reports placed the subject in control of the House. The bill was ready to be considered, and when considered any member had the privilege of offering and advocating amendments to the bill or a substitute for it. But the opponents of this bill voted against its consideration in Committee of the Whole, and in so doing they voted, no matter what their mental intention may have been, against the consideration or passage of any bill whatever reducing war-tariff taxes on the necessaries of life.

When the bill was taken up for consideration we had a right to expect, sir, that some of these gentlemen who say they favor reduction or modification of the tariff would point out in the general debate what amendments they desired in order to make this bill worthy of their support. We have listened, sir, to vague general denunciations of this bill, and high-flown declamations about the evils of free trade; but we have yet to hear the first suggestion of a proposal to amend or perfect this bill or to offer a substitute reducing or modifying the tariff taxes on any single article. On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, we were notified shortly after general debate began by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] that at the close of that debate he will move to strike out the enacting clause, and so endeavor to defeat the passage not only of this bill but of any bill to reduce "war-tariff taxes."

Sir, these gentlemen are making a record of action here which no words can ever wipe out or obscure. A vote to-morrow to strike out the enacting clause of this bill gives the lie to every profession of desire or willingness to reduce unnecessary taxation. Those who favor such reduction in the interest of the people will vote against that motion, and, if it is defeated, will proceed deliberately to consider this bill line by line, and anxiously inquire what changes can be made to perfect it and give to the country a measure of relief suited alike to the condition of business, the rights of consumers of domestic manufactures, and the needs of the Government.

For this great purpose, Mr. Chairman, they stand ready to receive and consider candidly and fairly warning, reproof, or instruction from friend or foe. Those who vote for the motion and to defeat this bill, without attempt to amend it, will simply say by their votes that they desire indefinite continuance of "war-tariff taxes" on the necessaries of life twenty years after the conclusion of the war and long after the repeal of the excise and internal-revenue taxes which led to their enactment. Defeat this bill to-morrow, and the issue which goes to the country in November is so made up.

A word in conclusion, Mr. Chairman. The Republican opponents of this bill and of tariff reduction, while struggling frantically to prevent its consideration, have told us that they welcome the issue which it makes, and that upon that issue they will defeat the Democratic party in the coming Presidential election. I know not how that may be, sir, and have never taken time to consider that phase of the subject. Possibly their predictions may prove true. No lioness ever fought for her whelps with the tenacity and desperation of protectionists fighting for the last cent of bounty and tribute. They have nearly all the capital of the country and a large share of its best brains in their pay. They are skilled in political intrigue, in the arts of balancing and neutralizing opposing interests. They have the machinery of the Federal Government in their hands and a powerful and able press to assist them and misrepresent this bill and its friends. They may succeed now.

But, Mr. Chairman, this question will never down. The people are aroused upon it in the West, and many answering voices come to them already from the Eastern and the Middle States. The continuance of war taxes after twenty years of peace will not much longer be tolerated. This agitation will go on and on until it may be a worse thing shall in the end befall those who now reject a measure of relief subject to no fair criticism but this, that it falls short of the requirements of justice to the people.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, addressed the committee. [See Appandix.]

Mr. FERRELL. Mr. Chairman, I consider it my duty before this bill shall have reached a vote of the House to offer some reasons why I am opposed to the agitation of the tariff question at this time.

At the outset, therefore, I desire to say that I have never considered this great economic matter as fit subject for partisan political control. Moreover, I condemn the proposition which attempts to disturb the great business and industrial centers of the country by the constant agitation of this question, which serves only to render uncertain the values of property and to depreciate public confidence in business integrity. Such legislation is not only impolitic, but it is statesmanship perverted to evil purposes and results.

As the success of a nation depends upon the confidence the people repose in the law-making power, such power should, when exercised by either party, aim to correct abuses and irregularities rather than attempt to revolutionize a system long established which may have served to enhance the prosperity of the country, unless it can be demonstrated beyond all peradventure that the good which is to flow from such revolution will be greater and more lasting than the benefits accruing from the recognized and habitual course.

Granting, for argument's sake, that there are wrongs under the protection system, to abolish it for free trade will not only effectually eradicate the evil, but in the doing of it you cut the throat of the business and prosperity of the country and deliberately starve the workingmen and their families. Common sense, business sagacity, and humane judgment all agree, however, that the more conservative course should be followed of treating the ulcer on the body-politic by removing the poison and restoring the system to healthful action. The remedy prescribed by this bill is of the nature I have referred to, and is infinitely worse than the disease.

Upon the question of taxation as applied to the collection of revenue to cover the expenses of the Government, legislators and citizens alike should agree, in my opinion, upon the proposition to abolish the internal-revenue tax system. The time has passed when this burden is any longer necessary to be borne by our people. With a large surplus in the Treasury and annually increasing, war taxes may well be allowed to lapse and the country be freed from the last of the burdens imposed by the necessities of the rebellion. That there is not unanimity of thought and purpose on this matter is to be regretted. The causes moving to this non-agreement are not creditable to the element who object to the abolition of this form of taxation, their desire being rather to let this surplus referred to increase and accumulate than to see the heavy phalanx of revenue office-holders now in service broken up and retired.

But while I believe this system should be done away with, and the people relieved from a species of taxation peculiarly annoying during a period of profound peace, I as firmly believe that the tariff should remain solidly stationary without a shadow of wavering, that home labor and home products may be protected from the fatal competition of the cheap pauper labor of foreign nations. The basis of protective duties should not be a sliding scale. In my judgment only a permanent one will or can stimulate the growth of industrial products, and afford the artisan and agriculturist alike the mutual use and benefits of each other's labor. Upon this solid foundation only can be created an available, convenient, and cheap home market for all classes of people and all species of products.

Protective duties, carefully laid, on articles of trade which are manufactured abroad, and mostly seek a market here, and brought into direct competition with similar goods of our own production, I consider not only legitimate but absolutely necessary. These duties should not only not be removed, but should not be disturbed. The agitation of the question tends to frighten capital already invested, and to intimidate that which seeks investment. It tends to render the artisan dissatisfied because uncertain of his future.

Solidity of principle and determination of purpose, founded upon prudence, sagacity, and experience, are all essential to business success and prosperity. These can not exist as the outcome of debate and discussion based on a doubt as to the virtue and value of the principle involved. We have had free trade in this country—and have suffered. We have tried protection—and the nation has prospered in a miraculous manner. Under the former business stagnated and the country went backward. Under the latter life and animation filled all the arteries of trade and manufacture, business channels flowed with prosperity, and the country went forward with renewed vigor, enterprise, and assured success. Sloth was stamped upon the policy of the one; progress and growth marked the other.

There was a period in our earlier history when we found it necessary to encourage manufactures—if we were to have any, even the least, national development—by means other than the ordinary ones of patronage of their products. Very few goods of our own manufacture, in that early day, were to be found in our markets or used by our people. Almost every want was supplied by foreign skill and labor. In that we offered every inducement to capital to invest in manufacturing enterprises. Property, in lands, was made a gift, taxes were held in abeyance on real and personal estate, and many and unusual privileges were conferred.

And now, in the midst of our rapid development, although young in comparison with our foreign competitors who have had their "plants" established for centuries, with all the improvements which we have reached, and which we cherish with so much pride and admiration, even now we are asked to turn back from these results of active and progressive civilization and take up the primitive life of the past—to simply till the soil while England and the balance of Europe shall furnish us with what we need in all branches of the mechanic arts.

We are asked to loosen our grasp on what we have mastered, and, to change the figure, to halt in the march which civilized industry and open competition with the world are now making toward our markets. Who has asked for this radical change in the policy which has so long and favorably guided our business interests? Has it come from the manufacturer or his workmen? Has it come from the agriculturist or his farm hands? Has it been heard from the lips of those who know what toil in the workshop, the mine, or the ship-yard means? It has come from none of these, but, with the single exception of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], whose large personal gain would be found in free ore, all who support this mischievous measure are found in the ranks of the legal profession, and they reason from their exalted status as mere theorists.

On the contrary, the testimony from all classes of manufacturers, notably of iron and glass, with their artisans and workmen, and the wool-growers, is against this bill. Only a few importers interested in their own personal gain by securing the control of our markets against the products of American workmen, and a number of free-trade clubs in New York, formed in the interest of English manufacturers and fed by English gold, in no sense employers of American labor nor tillers of American soil—who are in no wise acquainted with the operations of productive capital in our mills, mines, and furnaces—these are the only people who favor the passage of this measure. The denunciations against this bill have been dignified but strong and convincing, and the result should be what the country desires—its emphatic defeat.

I had concluded, after the question had been referred to a commission brought about by the wise and judicious efforts of the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON], then a Senator of the United States, and now an equally honored and distinguished member of this body, aided by the influence of the tariff convention held in New York in 1881, with its exhaustive discussion of all phases of the subject, followed by the exciting session of Congress which passed the act of 1883, that the matter was laid at rest for a time at least But my own belief has proved a fallacy, and the earnest wish of the country has been deliberately disregarded. Just as the good qualities of the act of 1883 were beginning to be understood and accepted and its bad ones exposed, the spirit of agitation has again become rampant and the dry bones of free trade again begin to rattle. The work of the Forty-eighth Congress should have been to remove the unjust discriminations and mistakes of its predecessor rather than to have engendered the strife and dissension which thus far has marked our deliberations.

That the reduction of tariff duties on imports will stimulate the shipping of them to this country is too plain a proposition to need any argument. The conclusion is equally plain that the United States will be flooded with the goods of Europe to the great detriment of our manufacturers. In this competition American mills must close and American workmen are thrown out upon the streets to hunt or beg for their bread and butter. Upon the face of this bill the tax appears to be reduced. Is that a real and beneficial reduction of taxation which shuts our shops and imposes an untold burden of poverty and enforced idleness upon the country to support, and at the same time opens the flood-gates of free trade to the pauper labor of England, France, and Germany? It is a reduction, but such as discriminates only in favor of foreign manufacturers. The effect of this bill will be to reduce the wages of the country to the European standard, for it is only by this means that our workshops can meet the influx of foreign products. In no other way can they sustain themselves against their free-trade competitors. Do employés or workmen want this state of things? They will answer in their own good time and way.

Europe has and may continue to enjoy her class distinctions of permanent rulers and servants, but in this country we elevate the wage-worker and bread-winner, making him equal to any and opening to him all paths which lead to wealth, honor, and distinction. We want no legislation which will tend to undo this and render negative the genius of our institutions. Yet the measure under discussion tends strongly in this fatal direction, and should therefore be crushed. Rather than this give us laws which will still more efficiently assure the largest measure of education and protection to all citizens alike in the common race for fortune, honor, and decent life.

While such a wide difference of opinion exists between Europe and America upon these questions of business prosperity and social life, we can not afford to slight even incidental protection if we would maintain intact our present industrial and social progress as against the free-trade theories and practices of England. Her policy of "peace and good-will to all nations" is a wolf's cry and should be heeded, that it may be rebuked and resisted. As in colonial days, when even the Bible was not allowed to be printed here, when wool and flax manufactures were repressed and American factories were declared a nuisance, and when English statesmen expressed the opinion that "the colonies ought not to be permitted to make even a hobnail," so in this day is England's attitude toward America and American manufacturing enterprise. The advocacy of this bill bears the impress of this same "hobnail" policy. England's proscriptive policy bore its natural fruit in that early day in the loss of her colonies and in the erection of a great and free Republic. Shall we, as one of the foremost nations of the earth to-day, yield to her insolent demands what we refused as her dependent colonies?

Permit me to adduce some testimony against the principle involved in this bill gathered from various sources. The argument of Hon. Columbus Delano on the wool industry of the United States is not only suggestive but highly instructive. It appears in the evidence taken before the Ways and Means Committee. Even the slight reduction made upon this staple by the present law cost that industry about $12,000,000. He says as to the effect of the act of 1883:

The passage of the tariff act of March 3, 1883, has already crippled this important industry, and if the rates of duty imposed by the act of 1867 be not restored its destruction may be regarded as an accomplished fact.

If required to give reasons for these conclusions I submit the following:

First. The price of wool before the passage of the act of 1883 was barely remunerative; the subsequent reduction of prices has been so great as to preclude profit, except perhaps in some of the Territories and sparsely-settled States, where the price of land is exceedingly low. I venture to state, without fear of successful contradiction, that the clip of 1883 has been sold by the producers at prices varying in different States from 2 to 5 cents per pound less than the clip of 1882. The producers in no States, so far as I am informed, sold at a reduction of less than 2 cents; in many of the States the reduction was greater, and in the States of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia I venture to estimate it at an average of 4 cents or more per pound.

The actual loss on the clip of this year, estimated at 4 cents per pound, amounts to about $12,000,000. It is pertinent to ask, does the percentage of reduction to the consumer in the prices of woolen goods equal that in the price of wool?

The workmen from the iron and steel industries as well as the employés and heads of large manufacturing companies jointly protesting against the change of duty in that great industry strictly admonishes us to let this question of reducing the tariff duties alone.

Mr. Thomas Williams, of Youngstown, Ohio, said:

They had been asked to come here and state how the workingmen looked at the matter of the proposed tariff reduction and how it affected workingmen. He was aware that it was often said that the tariff upon imported goods was of no benefit to the workingmen. He was not a public speaker, and had never been accustomed to anything of the sort. He worked in the mill and earned his own living by boiling or puddling, and he thought he knew something whereof he spoke. He happened to have been born on the other side of the Atlantic, and he had worked in an iron-mill in England for some time, so that he could tell the committee from his personal experience how the matter was in free-trade England and how it was in America. He had worked in England five years in what was known as the Dowlais works. He had been puddling there for five years, and the wages which had been paid to him were about 5s. 6d. a ton, or at the rate of $1.25 for puddling iron. And even at that the men did not get very steady work. At the end of the week, when they got their pay and paid out of it for their living, there was not very much left to themselves. He was aware that it was often said that living was cheaper in England than in this country, but he denied that statement. He had lived or lodged (as it was called there), paying so much a week for his room, and letting the landlady buy his food for him. He did not live there as workingmen did in this country. For instance, in the morning when he got up to go to work, he got a cup of tea and a piece of bread and butter. At dinner time he got perhaps a little meat, but not always. He generally managed to eat meat at dinner three or four times a week, but never except at dinner. In the evening for tea, as it is called, he sometimes got bread and butter, and, if he wanted to be extravagant he might eat an egg or two, but that was accounted a great extravagance. In that country women worked in iron-mills, and he was sorry to see that they were coming to that same system in this country. The women earned in the Dowlais works about nine pence a day, or 18 cents. They were employed in unloading coal and in throwing coal out of the cars, and otherwise doing the coarse work of men. They were paid about 18 cents a day. If one of them got a shilling a day it was considered good wages.

He contrasted the condition of affairs in that country under free trade with the condition of things in America; and what did he find? He found that the puddler or the boiler in this country was paid $5.50 a ton. He was aware that in some parts of the country men were working for less than that, but in Pittsburgh and west of Pittsburgh they were receiving $5.50 a ton for puddling; and what was the result? The men in the old country got only $1.25 per day at the highest average, while here they got $3.25 or $3.50 a day. It occurred to him as an American citizen that it was not right for American law-makers to go to work and say to men who had left England and come to this country, with the intention of benefiting their own condition, that they must now compete with that same system of labor which they had in England. He ventured to say (and he thought the facts would bear him out) that if the proposed tariff were enacted into a law, the time was not far distant (if workmen had any work at all here) that they would have to compete with English labor, and would have to live just as workmen lived in the old country. As an American citizen he objected to that. He did not believe that the workingmen of America should be compelled to compete with the pauper labor, or the comparatively pauper labor, of England or of any part of Europe. He had a somewhat extensive acquaintance with workingmen in that country. At the Dowlais works, where he had worked, there were employed altogether about 15,000 men, including the iron-ore miners, coal-miners, the blast-furnace men, and the men who worked in the mills. And of all that number he did not know more than two or three men who owned their own homes.

There is another objection which I have to English free trade. They tell us that whenever a country can not manufacture a certain thing as cheaply as another country can the people should go to agricultural employment. That is the old English doctrine of free trade right along, and I wish to ask what has been the result wherever that has been practiced? Take one instance. Take Ireland, for example. We find that Ireland to-day is exporting, and has been exporting for years, somewhere in the neighborhood of 8,000 tons of produce every day, while her people are starving. And this is because she has no diversity of industry. There the people are simply farmers. And if they have got to compete with the cheap labor of Turkey, of India, and of other countries, of course it is impossible for them to live. Every few years they have a famine there and perhaps half a million of their people will die, and another half million or so have to leave the country in order to save their lives. It is the same in the case of Turkey. A little more than two hundred years ago Turkey was feared as a nation and the nations of Europe trembled before her. But how did they manage to subdue her? The English people, I mean the governing classes in England (because the English, generally speaking, have not very much to say in the matter), went to work and by some means got their goods introduced into Turkey at a low rate of duty. Thus, they crushed out all the Turkish manufactures and made Turkey an agricultural country, and to-day the Turkish Empire is called the Sick Man. It is only a question of a few years at most until Turkey shall be divided up among other powers of Europe.

Mr. Williams, continuing, said:

Now, Turkey and India are competing with us in England in the way of agricultural products, and whatever we send to England from America the price of it is controlled by the price of the same article in those countries. If India and Turkey can grow produce cheap and send it to the English market, we have to grow it cheaper than they in order to sell our produce. If we want to bring down American workingmen so that they can compete with workingmen in India and Turkey, where 10 cents a day is considered very high wages, I suppose that Congress can pass such a measure, but I do not know what the American people will say about it.

Mr. A. C. White, of Youngstown, Ohio, speaking on the tariff question, said:

He believed that, at the present time, any tariff legislation would be injurious to the best interests of the country. The workingmen protested against further action being taken in the matter until the tariff bill of last winter should have been sufficiently tried. It was yet an experiment, and it was not known whether that bill would be for good or for evil. A great many of the workingmen held that the tariff legislation of last winter was unnecessary, uncalled for, and unwise.

They believed that this country should have a good protective tariff for various reasons. The workingmen of this country did not desire to be brought down to the level of English workingmen. They believed that workingmen, being American citizens, were entitled to all the rights and privileges belonging to them. They had a right to live decently and respectably and to be able to clothe and educate their children, to send them to college and fit them to be members of Congress and Senators, if need be. The workingmen were part of the people, and they believed that legislation should be for the benefit of the people as a whole.

The time had been when it was claimed that a protective tariff was simply legislation for the benefit of a few against the interest of the many. The saying might have been just and true at that time, but at present it was not true. A majority of the States of this country to-day were iron-producing and iron-manufacturing centers. The iron industry was being built up all over the country. New mills were being put up in different places. In Alabama there was a new iron-mill about to be erected under the auspices of a co-operative society, and there were already two iron-mills there. The workingmen thought that a revision of the tariff at present would necessarily involve a reduction of wages on the 1st of June next, or else would involve a strike. They did not want either.

He further states that if a reduction of the duties should be made a corresponding reduction of wages would necessarily follow, and that protection was the great and only efficient guard against oppression. He says:

The workingmen of Youngstown did not want to be pressed into a position where they would have to consent to a reduction of the present rate of wages; and certainly the wages would have to come down if there was a change in the tariff laws. He believed, further, that if the rate of wages was lowered so that this country could make iron cheaper than Great Britain, and could export iron to Great Britain, Great Britain would in that case become as strong a protectionist as she formally was. If free trade were such a benefit to England as it was represented to be, he wanted to know why Englishmen emigrated to this country in such numbers. The Youngstown mills were full of them, and they all declared that they could not exist any longer in England. If free trade was such a blessing there, why did not those men stay there? They had come here to benefit their condition. No man would think of emigrating unless he wanted to benefit his condition. Conversing with English puddlers in Youngstown, he had learned from them that workingmen there lived the life of dogs, and that the common laboring workingman at Youngstown lives better than a puddler in any part of England.

Of course it was a well-known fact that England was formerly a strong protectionist nation. In the reign of Charles II a law had been passed that no tin should be imported into that country, but that all tin must be used from the king's mine so that he would receive royalty. As President Grant once said, in England, whenever that country developed her manufactures and got so that she could compete with all the manufactures of the world, then she laid aside her protectionist principles and established free trade so as to make a market of the whole world. He [Mr. WHITE] thought that all the iron and other fabrics consumed in this country could be made here, and that foreign importations should be kept out so as to enable them to be made here. This country should not be allowed to become a market for English goods. Better iron could be made to-day in Youngstown than could be made in England. All the ores were to be found in this country, and the price of raw material in the ground was the same here as in England. If anything, England had to pay higher prices for the raw material in the ground. If he understood Secretary Swank's report correctly there was not as much iron made here as the country required. There were three million tons of iron consumed in this country annually, and he believed that Secretary Swank stated in his report that two and a half million tons of that were manufactured in this country; so that they had to import half a million tons in order to meet the requirements of the country. If that quantity had not been imported the making of it would have supplied additional occupation to the workingmen of this country.

As to the question whether protection did protect or not, he would refer to the cotton-tie question. When American manufacturers first went into the cotton-tie industry at Youngstown, the English agents were selling cotton-ties in the South at from 12 to 18 cents a pound. The American manufacturers immediately brought the price down to 4 and 5 and 6 cents a pound, as he was told. In order to manufacture 25,000 tons of cotton-ties, there were 50,000 tons of ore required. The value of that in the city of Cleveland was $262,500. There were 37,000 tons of limestone used in the manufacture of these cotton-ties, and 90,000 tons of coal. The labor in making this quantity of cotton-ties was $45,000, and the whole cost of the ties was $538,000. That would give employment to skilled and unskilled labor—in a mill such as the one he worked in—to 500 men for a year and a half, but they did not make a pound of these cotton-ties in Youngstown now.

It is claimed by some theorists that the cost of living in Europe compared with ours was cheaper, and the purchase-power of a dollar in Europe as compared with ours was greater. The following table will demonstrate the fact concerning it to some extent, and prove it false:

In the glass-bottle trade the Association of Bottle Manufacturers and the skilled artisans come to the front on this issue and declare that it will disturb the market, and the wage prices must be affected by the change. Speaking from the standpoint of an employer, Mr. Bodine, representing the association of the whole country, said:

That industry was different from the one presented here the other day, although very similar. It differed more in results than in any other particular. The same materials that were employed in the making of cylinder window-glass were also employed with slightly varying proportions in the manufacture of bottles. Up to the time of commencing to convert the glass into shape the processes were similar and almost indentical. When the glass was ready to be worked for window-glass, it was poured into cylinders and flattened, and for bottles it was poured into molds of the desired shape. So that many of the reasons stated in regard to window-glass applied with like force to the bottle manufacturers. The duties on bottle-glass had been advanced under the tariff of 1883, and the manufacturers thought that they could show that there were strong reasons for that advance, and that the wonder was now not that the present duty was requisite, but that they had been able to get along with such duty. The industry was one that was well adapted to this country. It consumed almost exclusively the raw materials that existed here and that were widely diffused. It consumed sand and lime and coal and wood and lumber. These were its principal materials. Soda-ash was the only material that was imported, and that was sometimes supplemented by the use of sulphate of soda, a residuum of chemical manufactures which was largely used in the production of window-glass, and to some extent in bottles. This industry, on account of its being so well adapted to the country, had been very early established. It had been among the earliest of the manufactures of this country. Without remembering the exact date at which it commenced, he knew that bottle-glass works had been established in New Jersey as early as 1760. They had continued to grow up to the present time. They had always been protected during the early history of the country by what would seem to be a high rate of specific duty.

Until 1846, under different tariff enactments, the duties had ranged from $1 to $2.25 per gross on bottles of small sizes, and on quarts and over from $2 to $4 a gross. Under the influence of that protection and of the natural adaptability of the manufacture to this country the industry had developed and grown until it was now distributed throughout thirteen States, not being confined to any particular section. There were two furnaces in Massachusetts, two in Connecticut, fifteen in New York, thirty-seven in New Jersey, twenty-six in Pennsylvania (counting both eastern and western portions of that State), three in Maryland, five in Ohio, one in Indiana, ten in Illinois, two in Kentucky, three in Wisconsin, and five in Missouri. The industry had crept so far west as the Pacific, there being two furnaces now in San Francisco and an additional one building. This made a total of one hundred and thirteen furnaces in the whole United States, with a capacity equal to or exceeding the total consumption of bottle-glass in the United States.

The item of material in the manufacture of glass (in spite of some statements made before the committee) amounted to about 40 per cent., of which a large proportion was the labor in preparing it. The total labor in the manufacture of bottles, as also in the manufacture of window-glass, represented about 90 per cent. of the cost. This material, being sand in the soil, or coal in the mine, or lime in the rock, or wood in the tree, was little else but labor before it was ready for the use of glass manufacturers. He repeated that the material in the production of glass was about 40 per cent. of the cost, and that of that 40 per cent. 65 per cent. was labor in preparing the raw material and taking it out of the earth. The direct labor in the manufacture of bottle-glass was about 60 per cent., of which 33 per cent. was skilled labor and the remaining 27 per cent. ordinarily unskilled labor. These figures had been ascertained carefully and in detail. They were facts that were known, and were not the result of any theory.

There was no machinery employed in the making of bottles. Nothing but hand labor was used. The American bottle manufacturers could not have, and did not desire to have, the same prices for labor that existed in Europe; but they must have a rate of duty to compensate for the difference in wages between the two countries, or the American industry would be destroyed.

There were greater reasons for a high duty now than ever before. In the early history of the country, when imports and exports were carried on in sailing vessels, and when the time occupied in ordering and receiving goods was considerable, the distance and delay amounted to a practical protection. All of that protection was now obliterated. The exports from this country being heavy (mainly agricultural products), the steamers that took out those exports brought back freight at low rates. The average rate of freight from Antwerp to New York or Philadelphia was as low or lower than that from a furnace in New Jersey, or New York, or Pittsburgh to Chicago. At the present time contracts for freight for soda-ash were usually made upon a basis of 10s. per ton, whereas, ten or fifteen years ago, these contracts were upon a basis of 20s. a ton. Goods could be ordered from Europe now by cable, and could arrive in this country by steamer at as low a cost for transportation as they could be sent from furnaces in this country to the principal distributing points.

The present rate of duty of 1 cent per pound was an advance upon the duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem as it existed before the act of 1883. The great necessity of this industry to have a rate that would protect it against competing labor on the other side had never been pointed out until last winter, and then it was recognized and received consideration. It was difficult to state exactly what this rate of 1 cent per pound was equivalent to, ad valorem. The Treasury statistics did not keep the imports of bottles separated from other kinds of glassware. But, from the custom-house entries in New York, it had been found that the highest rate of duty on bottles was about 65.6 per cent. on the larger bottles, while that on smaller sizes would run to about half that duty. So that, with a difference of 270 per cent. in the cost of labor, the American manufacturers were competing, under the present tariff, with only a duty of about 66 per cent. He was utterly unable to account for their inability to compete under those circumstances. The necessity of this rate of duty was shown by the fact that, since the passage of the tariff act of 1883, 40 per cent. of the furnaces in the United States which went out of operation at the usual period (the latter part of June) had not yet resumed operations, and could not resume, because bottles could be imported under the present tariff at a price which left no profit to the American manufacturer to make them.

The imports of bottles had become very large within the last four or five years and in 1881 they had reached a considerable amount; but in the year 1882 the imports had more than doubled those of 1881. This was partly because of the establishment of a new industry in the West, which made a very large demand for bottles of a certain kind—lager-beer bottles, which were used by all brewers, of the same kind. This made a large demand for a single article, giving an inducement to the importers to reach that trade, and making it easy for consumers to import, and making it an object for them to import bottles. This beer-bottle industry had grown within the last half-dozen years from about two hundred and fifty gross per annum of new bottles (besides the refilling of old ones) until now it required from ten to fifteen furnaces to keep up the supply. The beer-bottling industry had commenced under the old tariff, and it had grown and flourished as probably no other industry had grown and flourished in so short a period. Of course it was natural that the bottlers of beer should seek to purchase their bottles in the cheapest market, and they had commenced to give their orders abroad.

The imports in 1882 were double what they had been in 1881, and since then they had been still growing. Not only had the change had this effect in regard to this single description of bottles, but foreign manufacturers had had their attention directed to the consumption of bottles in this country, and had gone from the beer bottle into a great many other lines of bottles, so that it would require but a short time before all large consumers of bottles in this country would send their orders abroad unless the present duty were continued. This effect was known and apprehended, and the evidence of it existed. They had seen during the past year bottled importations in a great many lines in which there had never before been importations. And yet the tariff act of 1883 did not give such a rate of duty on bottles when filled as corresponded with the rate on bottles when empty; but the manufacturers had submitted to it thinking that it was the best they could get, and that that was a portion of the trade which would have to be let go. Natural mineral water was now being imported in bottles free of duty, and under cover of that clause bottles labeled natural mineral water were filled with common water. After they came to this country the water was poured out and the bottles resold. No less than 80,000 of ginger-ale bottles had been imported into the city of New York within the last six months. It was admitted on a duty of 20 per cent., with no extra duty on the bottles.

He was not here to urge a change of that rate, not knowing that there was any disposition in that direction, but it was right for him to mention the fact that American bottle manufacturers were seriously injured by this low rate of duty on filled bottles. These bottles were all used over again. The apollinaris bottle was practically a beer bottle. Another natural mineral water (he forgot the name) was imported in a claret bottle, and the whole effect of it had been to transfer to the other side the bottling of all liquids that could be imported in that way.

The duty on bottles did not operate to the injury of the consumers generally. The developed industry of the country in bottles, being equal to the total consumption of the country, had so created competition that the prices now (without respect to the foreign article and on bottles which were not imported) were as low or lower than they had been in 1860; so that the manufacturers having established the industry, and the consumers having the benefit of the competition of that established industry, it required no consideration to see that with one hundred and thirteen different furnaces scattered through thirteen States the prices could never be very high.

In view of this statement showing the enormous difference in labor with which the American bottle-maker had to compete, and as they had never had any advance under the tariff of 1861 except a small 5 per cent. up to 1883, and as the present rate was below the rate of similar goods in the tariff, he trusted that the bottle manufacturers would not be subjected to any decreased rate of duty.

On the circular letter presented to the committee from glass dealers in several of the large cities along the Eastern coast, Mr. Bodine replied as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, March 1, 1884.

To the honorable the Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The manufacturers of green and black bottle-glass respectfully ask your attention to the incorrect and misleading statements in the paper presented by the "bottlers and merchants," dated New York, February 1, 1884.

As verbally stated to your committee, the duty on green-glass bottles, not having been advanced in 1861 in proportion to other manufactures, was changed by the last Congress to correct the disparity.

Hand-labor only being employed in the manufacture, and also in the preparation of materials (which are mainly crude and native), justifies as high a duty as on any goods.

The cost of imported bottles, given in the bottlers' statements alluded to, shows a misstatement of the rate of duty of from 10 to 15 per cent. (i. e., 1 cent per pound on 216 pounds per gross equals 69 to 70 per cent. duty on cost of $3.09).

If the duty is estimated on the valuation from the New York custom-house entries at $3.40 per gross, on a weight of 216 pounds (which is over the average), the duty amounts to the equivalent of 63½ per cent. ad valorem.

For smaller size, lighter-weight bottles, the duty amounts to a very much smaller per cent. ad valorem.

This duty is not "nearly prohibitory," as stated.

Large imports continuing under the present duty of 1 cent per pound, and 40 per cent. of all the furnaces in the country standing idle, clearly show that the cost of importing must be less than the cost of manufacturing.

"Ample protection to American labor" can certainly not be expected by a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem, because official documents show (see statement below from State Department's report on manufacture of glass in Europe, No. 99, March, 1883, page 402) that wages in countries with which we compete are but one-third the rate, either for unskilled or skilled labor, paid in the United States.

"Packing expenses, inland freight, marine insurance, and sea freights" do not cost, as asserted, about 40 to 45 per cent. additional. The cost of packing is distinctly included in their statement, and the inland freights are also included in the price given as foreign cost.

"Sea freights," because of low rates as ballast (now about 7*s.* 6*d.*, and average 10*s.*, per ton by steamer), are less from Europe than from the nearest factory in New Jersey to New York city.

Exports of bottles are not increasing largely, as stated.

Treasury statistics include under one head all kinds of "glassware," and exports are increasing only of table flint and not of bottle-glass.

Export of table glassware is by reason of a system of working with presses, by which the cost is greatly reduced. This system amounts to the use of machinery, which can not be applied in the manufacture of bottles.

The exports of bottles are confined almost exclusively to those filled with beer, fruits, &c. Export of beer has been developed in American bottles, when prices were far higher than present rates, and are rendered profitable, because of cheap grain, fruits, &c., and can well afford, as heretofore, to use American bottles.

"Extravagant prices by manufacturers," as asserted, are not reconcilable with the large number of manufacturers competing for the trade, the capacity of the bottle factories in the United States being greater than the largest consumption.

We therefore urge your honorable committee against any change in the duty upon bottles from the specific rate of 1 cent per pound.

No lower duty will permit manufacture here of large classes of bottles, the importation of which is large under the present duty, and has recently more than doubled the usual annual amount.

F. L. BODINE,
In behalf of the National Vial and Bottle Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. William Manks, of Millville, N. J., an appointed representative of the Glass-Workers' Association of the Eastern Division of the Trade, covering all west of the Alleghany Mountains, made the following statement:

Hon. T. M. FERRELL:

The agitation of a reduction of the tariff by Congress has caused considerable alarm in this State during the past few months, and still continues to be a source of uneasiness among working people. To the working people any reduction of the tariff would result in very serious injury. But such a large reduction as that proposed by the Morrison bill would be disastrous in the extreme to all of the manufacturing industries of our State, and particularly to the glass-manufacturing interests. To the latter it would be ruinous.

I need not say to you that the prosperity of the southern part of New Jersey is due in a very large degree to the glass-manufacturing interests. This you know. The inexhaustible beds of sand would still continue, untouched by the hand of industry, were it not melted into glass, giving remunerative employment to thousands, and sending out throughout the whole country the product of this sand after it had been worked into window-lights, bottles, and beautiful ornaments by the skill of the artisan and the mechanic, consuming large quantities of the coal and iron of Pennsylvania, and contributing to the general prosperity of the country by not only consuming large quantities of manufactured goods but also making the farmers a good market for products of their lands.

But what I more particularly desire to call your attention to is that part of the glass business relating to bottles and vials. There has been a great effort made by interested parties to make the impression that glass bottles are over-protected, and had become a monopoly, the capitalists making immense profits, and the workmen receiving no benefit from the protection of the tariff. The question is asked by the advocates of low tariff: How is it that the tariff on glass bottles being largely increased a year ago, the manufacturers of these bottles a few months afterward demanded a reduction of the blowers' wages of 20 per cent.? This is true; the demand was made, but the blowers have successfully resisted the demand, and most of the factories are in operation or soon will be, without any reduction of wages; and it was this increase of the tariff that enabled these blowers to successfully resent the reduction demanded. Had bottles from Europe come into the country, and sold at the low price which 30 per cent. ad valorem would have enabled importers to have sold them, the fall of glass-blowers' wages would have been inevitable, and to have resisted it would have been madness.

Glass manufacturers are the same as other business men—they purchase as cheaply as they can, and their profits being increased ever so much by high tariff would not induce them to increase the wages of their employés unless they were compelled to do so. But tariff protection will give the employers such profits that their employés can compel them to give their wages in accordance with the profits they receive on their goods, the product of their labor. This can be accomplished by organized labor, and glass-blower strikers, both window-light and bottle, demonstrate it. I freely admit the wages of the working people are very low, but any reduction of the tariff would only reduce them still more. The legislation needed to give them more wages is to encourage organization among them, thereby increasing their resistance power to the rapacity of the unscrupulous manufacturers. By low tariff you decrease the resistance power, and put the poor employé at the mercy of the employer.

The general public is in no way benefited by the low price of bottles; perhaps a few hundred beer-brewers would make a little by it, but the consumers, the beer-drinkers, would pay the same for their drinks were the bottles sold to the brewers for half the amount they pay now. Patent-medicine manufacturers make enormous profits, and the cost of the bottles is not a consideration upon the price charged for the medicine, and with the exception of fruit-jars the general public have very little interest in the price of bottles. The reduction of tariff on bottles would bring ruin upon a number of industrious, useful, and patriotic citizens, with no corresponding good to any, except a few beer-bottlers and patent-medicine makers. The increase in the tariff at the last session of Congress was only on bottles, as stated above. On the general druggist ware there was very little increase on any, and on some of the ware the tariff is lower than before. The change from an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent. to a specific duty of 1 cent per pound really is no increase in the tariff when all the different weights and grades are taken into consideration, but only a change better adapted to the glass trade. Where we are in strong competition with the low wages of Europe, as in the case of beer-bottles and wine-bottles, the present tariff is adopted to protect, while upon small drug ware, where very little protection is needed, the duty is very low.

It is folly to say that the tariff on bottles was adopted without proper consideration. On the contrary, it was the result of mature deliberation by those who understood the wants and necessities of the glass-blowers in the country. It is not true that the present tariff on glass is prohibitory in its operation. On the contrary, a number of large bottling establishments in Milwaukee and other sections of the country import all the bottles they use, and a large importing business is carried on by jobbers in New York and other large cities. At least one-fourth of all the wine, beer, and those grades of bottles sold and used in this country are imported, and the proportion is still greater on carboys, demijohns, &c. These foreign bottles are used not because they are superior in quality, for it is admitted that they are inferior in workmanship, but because they can be obtained at a lower price than American-made bottles. The greater reason that foreign bottles can be sold in our markets at a lower price than those made in this country is on account of the difference in the price of labor in the two countries. A reduction of tariff is a reduction in the wages of labor to the extent of that tariff reduction, or the stoppage of all glass-factories engaged in the bottle manufacture. The freight on bottles is very little protection, and should not be brought into the account, as these bottles are heavy, and are shipped in most cases merely as ballast, very little freight being charged.

But it is charged that the glass-blowers' wages are too high. There is a wrong impression in the country in reference to glass-blowers' wages. The newspapers have published exaggerated statements of large wages made by them. A few very skilled ones have made high wages, but the average wages of druggist glass-blowers, as will be seen by reference to the statistics of the labor bureau, is very little above $1,000 per year, about $3.50 per day, and this average will be decreased this year, as a better quality is demanded for the same price than ever before. Add to this that glass-blowers all work piecework, and thereby are given inducements to exert themselves to their utmost to perform a large amount of work, so as to increase their wages, so much so that many of them have exerted themselves beyond their power of endurance, and the consequence has been loss of health and an early grave. If glass-blowers worked as other tradesmen do, and as they would work if not on piecework, at $2 per day, the blowing of bottles would cost the manufacturers more than it does now. Of course it must be understood that I am speaking of the average, and including the two months in the year when the factories necessarily are out on account of the weather being too hot to blow, and the necessity of building new furnaces. In certain localities the wages would be more than this, but this would not affect the average.

The farmer, too, would be a great loser by a reduction of the tariff in Southern New Jersey. He has a good market for all his products at these manufacturing cities and towns at better prices than he could obtain in the larger cities, which enables him, besides receiving better remuneration for himself, to pay his farm hands better wages. The argument that the price of grain will not be affected by a reduction of the tariff is a false one. The grain farmers of the whole country in the future must look to a home market more than ever before. India is looming up as the great grain country in the world, notwithstanding the immense quantities of grain held in the West for higher prices, yet the prices remain down in London, because the supply is drawn from India, and the grain farmers from this country will hereafter compete in London with the low wages paid for farming in India, and the day is not far distant when our farmers will be driven out of Europe, and even be compelled to compete with the poorer wage-farming of India in the United States House. Their interests lie in encouraging manufactures, so as to give them a home market.

The idea that some Congressmen entertain, that we can have cheap goods by flooding our country with imported ones and still maintain good wages, is preposterous. Our goods have been and will continue to be cheapened by the introduction of labor-saving machinery into our factories and the increased skill and inventive genius of our mechanics, and the price of labor will not be decreased thereby, for as the price is lessened consumption will increase the demand for labor, and thus keep up the wages. But cheap goods through foreign importations must of a necessity cheapen the price of labor. Do we want cheap labor? I think not. In the name of the laboring people, of which I am one, I solemnly protest against this low-tariff cheap-labor legislation. If cheap labor is the best policy for the prosperity of the country, then go back to slavery or import the Chinese by the millions. They, by living on rats and mice, can afford to work cheap enough, but if we do so let us stop all our boasting about the glory and greatness of our country, when the great mass, the laboring people, are reduced, so far as the luxuries and comforts of life are concerned, to the condition of slaves. The agitation of tariff reduction injures the manufacturing interests.

When Congress, through the Ways and Means Committee, commenced an adjustment of the revenue, manufacturers paused; they would not take the work of working stock while there existed any possibility of a reduction of duties, hence the lockouts, strikes, &c., and the large number of working people who have been idle during the past few months, and this state of affairs will continue until this revenue question is permanently settled. If it is settled in the decisive defeat of the Morrison bill, and the country can feel that there will be no further danger of a tariff reduction, the former prosperous condition of the country will be resumed, and if the laboring people will thoroughly organize themselves they can command their share of wages which a protective tariff should give them.

I am, most respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM M. MANKS.

One of the claims advanced for free trade is that the farmers of the country want it. This is a mere supposition, and the facts fail to bear out the further assumption that the protection given to manufactures is fatal to the values of agriculture. Mr. Joseph Nimmo, jr., in an able article in the North American Review on "American manufacturing interests," says:

Contemporaneously with the increase in the value of products of manufacture, from $1,885,861,676 in 1860 to $5,369,579,191 in 1880, there was an increase in the acreage of land in farms from 407,000,000 acres in 1860 to 536,000,000 acres in 1880, an increase of 32 per cent., and an increase in the value of farms of from $6,645,045,007 in 1860 to $10,197,096,776 in 1880, or 53 per cent.

The importance of manufactures to agriculture is indicated by the following facts in regard to the value of products of agriculture consumed in this country and exported to foreign countries: The total value of the products of agriculture in 1880, as before stated, amounted to about $3,600,000,000, this being the value on the farm. The farm value of the exports of products of agriculture during the year ending June 30, 1880, amounted, however, to only about $500,000,000, showing that 86 per cent. of the total value of products of agriculture was consumed in the United States, and that only 14 per cent. was exported to foreign countries. In other words, the quantity consumed at home was six times that sent abroad.

It is a self-evident truth that these great industries are so intimately connected with each other that the one can not exist without the presence of the other.

Mr. J. R. Dodge, statistician of the Agricultural Department, in his observations on this subject, says:

The influence of manufactures, of mining, of any productive industries on local prices, whether of farms, or farm products, or farm labor, is plainly traceable in States, and in various districts within the States, by the furnace fires, the mines, the factories that thickly dot the location where high prices for farm labor prevail.

Again, he says:

The reflex influence of manufactures and mining would accomplish more for agriculture than the most persistent direct efforts for the improvement of agriculture.

We also find in the States which contain large manufacturing interests that the price of labor and land are much higher than in those States where people are not occupied in manufactures. On this point Mr. Dodge says:

In 1870, when wages and prices generally were high, the average wages o farm labor in the first or manufacturing class of States was $34, while in the last, exclusively agricultural, class it was but $15. When the panic came, and years of manufacturing depression followed, mechanics and artisans competed with farm laborers and reduced the price of rural labor. It is a fact that prices at different times furnish an accurate measure both of the industrial status of the laborers and the prosperity of the great industries of the country.

Showing conclusively that in proportion to the success of the industry interests so likewise prospers those of agriculture.

If these observations are correct, and I think they are, this great industry, which is at the foundation of our nation's success, should demand that the raid made on manufactures should cease.

The product of our farms last year and their value, together with the number of persons employed thereby, showing the vast proportions that this interest represents, coupled with that of our manufacturing industries, should cause us to halt and more carefully consider this question before we strike at its life, as this bill proposes, by a horizontal reduction.

The product of our farms last year in stock raised of all kinds was $2,332,915,268, in grain and hay the value was $1,933,956,395, making an aggregate of $4,296,871,663, employing 7,670,493 people of all classes of labor; of these 3,323,876 were what is known as farm hands, the balance being the farmers. Therefore the joint product of the farm is $4,296,871,663, and of the manufacturing establishments $5,369,579,191, making an aggregate total of $9,666,450,854 from farm and manufacturing employments.

To sum up the whole argument, I do not want cheap goods if I am to have them by the robbery of the laborer of his lawful and just wages.

I do not want any change in the tariff duties on imports that will discriminate in favor of foreign manufactured articles as against the American industries and its laborers.

I do not want a change that will impoverish our farm laborers.

I want a tariff that will protect labor as well as capital, and prevent free trade in the one and protection in the other, as it now exists.

I want a condition of things to exist which will make it unnecessary for the employer and the employé to constantly meet each other on the field of battle; and I want to see the day when labor will be recognized and its legitimate rights protected along with capital.

But permit me to repeat my query, Who asks for this legislation so fatal to the people? Does it come from the great industrial and manufacturing States of the country? Does it come from Connecticut with its 4,488 establishments, and an invested capital of $120,480,275, with 103,000 employés, who receive annually over $43,000,000 for wages? Does it come from Rhode Island with its 2,205 establishments, and a capital of over $75,000,000, with its 62,000 employés, who receive annually over $21,000,000 in wages? Or from Massachusetts with its 14,352 establishments, and invested capital of over $303,000,000, with its 352,254 employés, who receive annually over $128,000,000 in wages? Is it heard from New York with 42,739 establishments and an invested capital of $514,246,575, with its 531,533 employés, receiving annually $198,634,029 for wages, or from Pennsylvania, with its 31,232 establishments and an invested capital of $474,510,993, with its 387,072 employés, who receive annually $134,055,904 in wages? Does it come over from Illinois, with its 14,549 establishments and an invested capital of over $140,000,000, with its 144,727 employés, who receive annually over $57,000,000 in wages, or from Ohio, with its 20,699 establishments and an invested capital of $189,000,000, with its 183,000 employés, who receive annually over $62,000,000 for wages? Does New Jersey call for it, with her 7,128 establishments and an invested capital of over $106,000,000, with its 126,000 employés, who receive annually over $46,000,000 in wages? In other words, do the manufactories of the country at large, North, South, East, and West, comprising in the aggregate 253,852 establishments, and whose united capital covers $2,790,272,606, and employés 2,732,595, representing over 10,000,000 of our people, who receive through these channels of trade $947,953,795 for their labor, and whose joint product in value reaches the enormous sum of $5,369,579,191, demand free trade? It is none of these.

I have referred in my remarks to-day to the fact that the legal profession represented upon this floor were given to much theorizing upon this question from a very lofty plane. Noticeable among these is my friend from Michigan [Mr. YAPLE], who finds the boundaries of this sublunary sphere all too small wherein to furnish an argument for free trade and its attendant blessings, as he would term them; he appeals to the Higher Power and declares that God himself is a free-trader.

The gentleman is mistaken. It is not the Lord of Hosts who is a free-trader, but another inhabitant of the other world, the gentleman in black, who presides over the lower regions. It is not the great Creator of the universe, the Divine Manufacturer of the machinery of this world and the grander system of the infinite, who is a free-trader. While He is the free giver of all earthly and heavenly good, He is its everlasting protector, and the highest results and fullest returns are assured to his people by the tariff of repentance and faith which he has laid.

The gentleman has impiously ascribed the attributes and evils of free trade to the great Jehovah. Like the brand of Cain, they have always been the distinguishing mark of Beelzebub since he fell from Paradise to the place which Ingersoll says is not. The Prince of Darkness is the original free-trader, as my friend from Michigan may ascertain by turning to the fourth chapter of Matthew, the eighth and ninth verses. Lucifer revels in the free trade of souls and the chaos of evil it produces in this world, and is ceaseless in his efforts to reduce the rates in his infernal trade. He offers in free exchange his vast commodities of sin, and over his wide-open gates my friend may read, "Free traffic here and no protection." In this free-list he counts his unholy gains. The gentleman should revise his knowledge of the Bible and the memories which are said to cluster around a mother's knee.

Why should we change? The people want none of the so-called blessings provided so liberally in this bill, blessings which turn to Dead Sea fruit in the hands of the laborer and blight the enterprise of the employer.

What we want is the whir of machinery, the music of the spindle, the thunder of the locomotive, the din of the forge, and the roar of the blast-furnace; and let them be commensurate in their strength, importance, and value with the broad domain which year by year they are developing into the grandest country upon the globe, and should not be disturbed by the agitation of this question at the convening of every Congress.

Of those who succeed in stilling this tempest, in quelling this agitation, and in bringing peace and quiet and content to our distracted business, it may be said as Abou Ben Adhem besought the angel to write of him: We pray thee, then, write us as those who love our fellow men.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the bill now under consideration, not because I am opposed to revenue reform or a proper revision of the tariff, but because this bill is not in the direction of either.

The tariff bill of 1883, passed in the hurry and excitement of the closing days of the Forty-seventh Congress, is full of inconsistencies and inequalities; it needs revision; and I would unhesitatingly vote for any measure that looked to the curing of its defects. But, Mr. Chairman, this bill attempts nothing of the kind. It looks not to a reform or revision of the present tariff, but to a reduction of revenue and "war-tariff taxes" by a horizontal reduction of 20 per cent.

It takes the tariff of 1883, with all its gross inequalities and inconsistencies, and makes a general paring down, leaving the irregularities to stand. And we are told that this is but the first of a series of reductions that are to be hereafter made. If the authors of the bill now before the House succeed in their efforts another reduction of 20 per cent. will be attempted in the next Congress. And this avowal explains the real object sought to be attained by the advocates and friends of the bill. They are opposed not only to a protective tariff but to a tariff for revenue as well. They will consent to nothing but a tariff for revenue only, which in my opinion is only another name for free trade.

Have we not heard it declared time and time again that free trade was the international law of the Almighty, and have not the advocates of this bill on the floor of this House during the present session declared openly and boldly for a policy that would give us free trade with the nations of the earth? This bill is but the first step in the direction of free trade, and if such step be taken another will surely follow unless the people in their wisdom, watchful of their interests and jealous of their rights, repudiate and condemn at the polls the action thus taken.

Mr. Chairman, I wish it distinctly understood that I am not in favor of a tariff for protection as I am not in favor of a tariff for revenue only. A tariff for protection is a tariff laid, in my opinion, without warrant or authority of law, and while I do not intend to argue the legal question involved in this statement, I will simply say that the only power given to Congress by the Constitution in the matter of laying a tariff is that contained in the eighth section of article 1:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Nothing in this section confers any power on Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, or excises for the mere purpose of protecting industries. The power conferred is, as the section plainly says, for the purpose of paying the debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. It has been claimed by the advocates of protective tariff that the power to lay such a tariff is conferred by the "general welfare" clause, but I apprehend the number of persons is not large who seriously make such a claim to-day. A tariff for protection, laid without regard to the amount of revenue required by the Government, is not only unauthorized and unconstitutional, but it tends directly to build up gigantic corporations and powerful monopolies. It assists in the creation of an aristocratic and privileged class and has not for its object the protection of American labor and the elevation of American laborers. Under such a tariff I will admit that American labor is protected to a certain extent, but the protection given is only an incident and of uncertain duration.

It has been customary in certain quarters whenever a proposition looking to the revision of the tariff has been made to cry out that our industries were endangered, that our mills and shops were to be closed, that our furnaces were to be blown out and American labor ruined. The cry is never made by the organs of the overgrown corporations of the country that American manufacturers and capitalists are to be injured by a reduction of tariff duties. Oh, no, these self-constituted friends and advocates of the laboring men of the land would have us believe that they think only of the latter's interest and are opposed to tariff revision, because they assume to say that such a proceeding would reduce their wages. And this hypocrisy and deceit by which laboring men have been hoodwinked and gulled in this country for so many years has had its effect. The great body of men who toil and labor have been content in years gone by to accept without questioning the statements made by the advocates of corporate monopolies, and they have allowed themselves to think that a high protective tariff was made and continued for their particular benefit, and that the manufacturers and capitalists of the land were a disinterested lot of men who invested their money and carried on their large establishments chiefly for the benefit and advancement of the labor, skilled and unskilled, of the country. Why, it is only a few years ago that in many portions of the country an attempt to talk to a body of workingmen in favor of a reduction of duties or a revision of the tariff would be like waving a red flag in the face of a mad bull.

But, Mr. Chairman, a new era is dawning. The laboring men and mechanics are beginning to think seriously upon this tariff question. They are studying it as they never studied it before, and they begin to see what others have seen for a long time, that a high protective tariff is not a panacea for all their woes.

The following deliverance by the employés of the silk-factories of Paterson, N. J., is in point. They say:

> No matter what the tariff was, the working class received no benefit from it; their wages were neither advanced when the tariff was increased, nor were they reduced when it was lowered; their condition is worse every day, while the manufacturers have all got rich, built mansions, drive fancy turn-outs, extend and beautify their mills, and live a life of luxury, all on the strength of the protective tariff, which is supposed to benefit employé and employer alike, and which, in fact, only benefits the latter.
> They said they expected the abolition of the tariff would lower their wages, but there would be other advantages that would make up for it, in the shape of cheaper clothing and food, and consequently lower rates. There would be less money in circulation, but they could get more for their money than at the present time.

These men undoubtedly make a mistake when they advocate the abolition of the tariff. They propose to "jump from the frying-pan into the fire," but the position they have taken simply shows the extremity into which they have been driven by the harsh and unjust exactions of a high protective tariff. They speak the simple truth, however, when they say "their wages were neither advanced when the tariff was increased, nor were they reduced when it was lowered." Take the case of the iron and steel workers, and we will find the charge sustained. Bessemer steel rails were not manufactured in the United States and put upon the market until 1867. In 1870 Congress placed a duty on imported rails of $28 per ton. The price of steel rails, which in 1868 was $174 per ton, constantly decreased until 1878, when the highest price was $43.50. The production of the home manufacturers during that year amounted to 499,817 tons, the largest amount produced in any one year up to that time. The price of English rails in that year in currency was $25. With the duty and freightage added, the price in New York was $60. In 1879 there was an increased demand for steel rails, and the price was raised by the American manufacturers from $43.50 to $67.

The production that year was 618,851 tons. Owing to the demand for steel rails, the English manufacturers had raised the price of their productions from $25 to $35 per ton. This, with the duty and freightage added, made the price, delivered in New York, $70. Our manufacturers took advantage of the high tariff then existing to raise the price of the home product, as I have stated. They reaped a rich harvest, but the wages of the men were not increased.

In the recent report by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on the operations of the tariff act, page 17, it is said:

> During the year ended June 30, 1881, the average price of steel rails at works in Eastern Pennsylvania was $61.25 per ton. The cost of English steel rails at the port of New York was during that year about $61.50 per ton.

	Per ton.
Cost "free on board" at English ports	$30 50
Freight	3 00

In 1880 skilled labor at the mills in Eastern Pennsylvania was paid an average rate of $1.98 per day and common or unskilled labor $1.02 per day. I believe the rate of wages paid at present has not materially changed from what it was in 1880, and yet steel rails manufactured in Eastern Pennsylvania are selling to-day for $35—$26.50 less than in 1881. The question therefore presents itself: "Who received the benefits of the tariff of $28 on steel rails in 1881—the men who labored in the mills or the manufacturers?" Undoubtedly the latter. And yet, Mr. Chairman, the advocates of a high protective tariff say that such a tariff is necessary in order to protect American labor. That the duty on steel rails prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1883, was too high was admitted by the Tariff Commissioners. In their report made to the Forty-seventh Congress, on page 18, they say:

The commission has given special consideration to the question of the tariff on steel rails. The present duty has served its purpose in a protective sense; it is now excessive and should be reduced.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat what I said in the early part of my remarks, that a high protective tariff, laid for the sole purpose of protection and without regard to the wants and needs of the Government, tends directly to build up an aristocratic and favored class and to foster monopolies. It makes the rich richer and the poor poorer, for you can not build up an army of millionaires and give into their keeping the financial affairs of the country without making poor and dependent the vast army of toilers of the land. We see the evidences of this fact wherever we turn. Look at Pennsylvania to-day, with her vast number of poor and almost helpless laborers. In my own district, Mr. Chairman, rich as it is in its immense beds of anthracite coal and filled as it is with iron and steel mills, blast-furnaces, locomotive works, silk factories, and manufacturing establishments of almost every kind—in that district, where a high protective tariff has had every opportunity to show its peculiar merits and to demonstrate its benign influence in behalf of American labor, poverty walks abroad and looks into the homes of the mechanics, miners, and laboring men, while wealth sits enthroned in the luxurious homes of the manufacturer and capitalist.

What, Mr. Chairman, has a high protective tariff done for the laboring men of Eastern Pennsylvania? For the past few years it has secured to the unskilled laborer a rate of wages equal to $1 per day. It has given the coal-miners of Lackawanna and Luzerne Counties employment three days in each week, and has afforded them an income from their labor just about large enough to keep soul and body together. I may be met here with the statement that the protective tariff has nothing to do with the mining of anthracite coal, but let me say in answer to that that the men engaged in the protected manufactures in Northeastern Pennsylvania, are the monopolists who control almost wholly the entire anthracite coal business of the State. In their desire to aid, protect, and guard the "interests of American labor" in the section I speak of they have pursued for years the plan of encouraging and stimulating immigration to such an extent that now the number of laborers asking for work exceeds the demand, and as a result those who do work are kept on "half-time" and starvation wages. Their policy, deliberately marked out and pursued, has brought a swarm of Hungarian and other cheap labor into the State, and the "American laborers" for whom they have always claimed to feel such deep solicitude are compelled in many places to compete on American soil with the so-called pauper labor of Europe.

Thus, while a high protective tariff, laid ostensibly in the interest of American labor, has served the purpose of building up great corporations and putting fortunes in the pockets of manufacturers and capitalists, the benefits that might have accrued to the mechanic and laborer have been neutralized and almost entirely taken away by the action of these very manufacturers and capitalists in importing pauper labor to compete with the intelligent labor of our country. The claim of the manufacturers constantly made that they desire a protective tariff in in order that American labor may be protected is a sham and a fraud. They have imported by contract hundreds and thousands of the pauper laborers of Europe, and in my State have set them to work at a rate of wages averaging 60 cents per day. American laborers who formerly did the work now given to the Hungarians have been driven from the mines and shops because of their inability to compete with this pauper labor.

We are constantly met with the charge that the failure to give steady employment to labor results from overproduction. We hear frequently that the market is overstocked with coal, iron, steel, &c., and that a suspension of work for a time becomes, therefore, a necessity. I charge that overproduction in my State is brought about by the deliberate action of the corporations. A system, deliberately devised and steadily pursued for years by the corporations of Eastern Pennsylvania has led to the immigration of thousands of Europeans, whose labor was not required. Coal breakers, iron mills, and manufacturing establishments have been erected, and these immigrants put at work. The result in the anthracite coal-fields has been that for the past two or three years the men have worked "half time" and for small wages.

The wages paid them is just about sufficient to support themselves and families, and they are thus kept in a condition of almost helplessness. Living from day to day, and never having "anything ahead," they are not in a condition to effectively protest against the tyranny of their employers. As was said to me by one of the leading merchants of Scranton a few weeks ago, "The companies have the men where they want them—under their thumbs; it is a great wrong and ought to be remedied."

Independent journalism is destined to do a great deal of good in the discussion of this question. One of the hopeful signs of the times in my section is the advent of the independent journal. Released from party shackles and ring domination it can speak honestly and fearlessly upon all great questions. The Scranton Truth, an independent evening paper, in its issue of April 30, 1884, contained the following:

PROTECT LABOR AS WELL AS CAPITAL.

The importation of degraded pauper labor into the industrial valleys of Pennsylvania by the monopolists who are so clamorous for a protective tariff does not harmonize with their ostentatious professions of friendship for the laboring man. If the doctrine of protection be right it should be adjusted so as to protect the mechanic as well as the millionaire, and sustain "a fair day's wage for a fair day's work," as well as to keep up reasonable profits on invested capital. Any system of protection that fails to do this is a delusion and does not deserve the support of the people.

We believe in a protective tariff that will keep the honest workingman from penury, enable him to support and educate his family, and live comfortably in a home suited to his modest needs. Until this is done it would be absurd to boast about the benefits of protection, or to give any party the credit of using its power in behalf of the toiling masses, who form the bone and sinew of the nation.

During the past few years those who have been most ostentatious in their tariff professions have been most active in importing gangs of pauper laborers into this country to cut down the scale of wages, and crowd sober, industrious, and useful citizens out of the useful walks of life. It is to the conduct of such persons that these valleys are at present indebted for the deep feeling existing against the degraded, poorly-paid, and wretchedly-housed Magyars who are attracting so much attention.

So far as these unfortunate people are concerned they are entitled to more pity than hatred. Most of them have been enticed away from their homes by designing sharks who pictured to them a glowing future in this Republic, and they came here entirely ignorant of the true state of affairs. There should be no unreasonable, bigoted race demonstrations made against them, but Congress ought to be invoked to check the influx and prevent the illegitimate traffic in pauper contract labor which threatens to impoverish the workingmen of America.

Until this is done protection will be a one-sided affair. Let it be general in its application to the laborer as well as the capitalist, and protect the man who toils at the furnace as well as the iron king who fattens on the proceeds of his toil. Any other system of protection is a sham, and it is the duty of the people to call on their Representatives in this behalf, and relegate those who fail to reach the requirements of the age to the shades of private life.

The average cost of steel rails in England during the six months ended December 31, 1883, was $20, the duty per ton was $17, and the freight $3, which made the price of these rails delivered in New York $40. During the same period the average price of steel rails in Eastern Pennsylvania was $36.50. During the six months ended December 31, 1882, we imported steel rails to the amount of 85,618 tons, and notwithstanding the reduction of the duty from $28 to $17 we imported during the corresponding time in 1883 only 6,933 tons. It is a noteworthy fact also that during the calendar year 1883 we produced 1,295,740 tons of steel rails, the largest amount produced in any year excepting 1882, and we exported 34,089 tons, more than double the amount exported in any previous year. The conclusion is inevitable that the present duty on steel rails is high enough, that the old duty of $28 was too high, and unless it can be shown that the price of wages fell with the change of duty another conclusion is inevitable, namely: that under the former duty monopolies were fostered and protected and labor received none of its benefits. The same illustrations may be given and the same arguments will apply to other highly protected articles under the laws that existed prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1883.

That act did not correct all the evils existing under former laws, and it needs revision and correction. Does the bill now under consideration offer us the change so much needed? Does it look to a proper revision of the tariff and revenue laws by proposing a reduction of revenue to a point that will meet the wants and necessities of the Government economically and honestly administered, and by duties so laid that proper and necessary protection will be given to our varied industries, or does it propose to take the first of a series of steps that will eventually give the people of this country absolute free trade with the nations of the world? If any doubt existed, Mr. Chairman, in the minds of members when this bill was first introduced as to its real object and purpose, there can be none now in the light of the arguments made by its advocates on this floor. Nearly every speech made in its behalf has dwelt upon the blessings of the doctrine of free trade.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN], in his able and very eloquent speech in behalf of the Morrison bill, said:

Rational self-interest is the universal motive, and buy where you can buy cheapest and sell where you can sell dearest the fundamental law of exchange. The propriety of the application of this law to domestic trade none disputes. * * * Of these grand struggles none has yet been fought which more strongly challenges the approval of the civilization of our age than the one now waged by American Democracy for the freedom of commerce and the integrity of taxation. * * * Commerce will be rescued from the merciless clutches of monopoly and taxation and emancipated from the wicked uses of protection. To freedom of person and freedom of opinion, so gloriously asserted in our first Revolution, will be not less gloriously added freedom of exchange.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] in his advocacy of this bill denounced the doctrine of protection to home industries and argued in favor of freedom of exchange, and I may be pardoned for saying here and now that the protected industries of this country never had an abler opponent or the doctrine of free trade a more eloquent advocate.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] said in closing his speech on the tariff a few days ago:

We must remove both by legislation and diplomacy every hindering cause that prevents the free exchange of the products of our labor in all the markets of the world. We must unfetter every arm and let every muscle strike for the highest remuneration for its toil. We must let wealth, the creation of labor, grow up in all the homes of our people. Then every industry will spring forward at a bound, and wealth, prosperity, and power will bless the land that is dedicated to free men, free labor, and free trade.

In the criticisms made by the advocates of this bill upon the doctrine of protection, the friends of a "tariff for revenue with incidental protection" have not been forgotten. For exercising the right which they themselves claim, the right to represent the wishes of our constituents and the interests of our districts and States, we have been denounced as false to our party and its doctrines. It is said of us that we claim to belong to one party and vote with another, and we are called the "Republican contingent" and "guerrillas."

Mr. Chairman, the doctrine of incidental protection was declared good Democratic doctrine by the last State convention held in Ohio, and but a few weeks ago at Allentown it was made the principal plank in the platform framed by the united Democracy of the old Keystone State.

The Democratic national platform of 1868 declared in favor of "a tariff for revenue upon foreign imports, and such equal taxation under the internal-revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures, and as will without impairing the revenue impose the least burden upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country."

But a few weeks ago the New York World declared in the course of a learned and exhaustive article—

That extreme protection discriminating in favor of special interests is a fungus of the lobby, an outgrowth of Republican greed and corruption consequent upon the license of the war and the demoralization of a long term of office.

That Democracy is now, as it always has been, in favor of protecting home labor and home industries as far as the support of Government by duties on imports will permit, and is not now and never has been in favor of frequent tariff changes and the disturbance of business interests. There has never been an act on the part of the Democracy to imply that they are opposed to incidental protection.

Mr. Chairman, the doctrine of "a tariff for revenue with incidental protection" is not a new-fangled notion. It was upheld and advocated by Thomas Jefferson, and has received the indorsement of every Democratic President since. Mr. Jefferson in his message to Congress in 1802 said:

Proper protection to American industry is one of the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings.

Andrew Jackson declared that the manufacturing interests of the country "ought to have extended to them adequate protection, that our manufacturers and laborers may be placed in fair competition with those of Europe."

The doctrine of incidental protection was held by President Polk, and in his inaugural address of March 4, 1845, he said:

I have heretofore declared to my fellow-citizens that in my judgment it is the duty of the Government to extend, as far as it may be practicable to do so, by its revenue laws and all other means within its power, fair and just protection to all the great interests of the whole Union, embracing agriculture, manufactures, the mechanic arts, commerce, and navigation. I have also declared my opinion to be in favor of a tariff for revenue, and that in adjusting the details of such a tariff I have sanctioned such moderate discriminating duties as would produce the amount of revenue needed and at the same time afford reasonable incidental protection to our home industry, and that I was opposed to a tariff for protection merely and not for revenue. * * * In executing this power of levying a tariff of duties for the support of Government the raising of revenue should be the object and protection the incident.

James Buchanan said:

The American system consists in affording equal and just legislative protection to all the great interests of the country. It is no respecter of persons. It does not distinguish between the farmer who plows the soil in Pennsylvania and the manufacturer of wool in New England. * * * The Legislature of Pennsylvania have given us what, in my opinion, is the correct version of the American system. They have declared that the best interests of our country demand that every possible exertion should be made to procure the passage of an act of Congress imposing such duties as will enable our manufacturers to enter into fair competition with foreign manufacturers, and protect the farmer, the growers of hemp and wool, and the distillers of spirits from domestic materials against foreign competition. * * * By encouraging domestic industry, whether it be applied to agriculture or manufactures, you promote the best interests of your navigation. You furnish it with domestic exports to scatter over the world.

Such, Mr. Chairman, has been the doctrine and policy of the Democatic party from the beginning. Such is its avowed doctrine to-day in Pennsylvania and Ohio, and such will be its declaration of principles at Cincinnati in July next. And yet Democrats who dare, in opposition to the wishes of other gentlemen, to represent the interests of their constituents and the principles of their party as understood from the beginning, are denounced as a "Republican contingent." For one, I will never yield to a command or factional clamor that would seek to make me act and vote contrary to my settled convictions of right and duty. I repeat what I have already said, that a tariff for protection with revenue as an incident is not warranted or authorized by the Constitution, and should not be. It builds up privileged classes and fosters and protects monopolies.

A tariff for revenue only is simply another name for free trade. It would lay duties for the mere purpose of revenue, and, ignoring as it does the doctrine of incidental protection, would discriminate against our industries. It would open our ports, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] says he trusts it will, to the nations of the earth. It would compel the poorly-paid labor of America to compete in the market with the still more poorly-paid labor of England, Germany, and other countries. It is admitted by statisticians that the average wages paid to American labor is 75 per cent. greater than that paid to English labor, and still greater than that paid to German and other labor.

Do we wish to adopt a policy that will compel the American mechanic who receives two dollars per day to compete in the market with the English mechanic who receives but one, and with the German who receives but 75 cents? Do we want to compel our sugar-growers and manufacturers to compete with the slave labor of Cuba? Are the American people in favor of a policy that will compel the labor of America in all the different branches of industry, agriculture, mining, and manufactures, to compete with the servile, poorly-paid, poorly-clad, and poorly-housed labor of Europe? I think not. And yet that is just what this attempted legislation will do if carried out to its legitimate conclusion. Its advocates say this bill is but "the first step." Should it succeed another will be taken, and when the goal, free trade, is reached, its friends will be satisfied, not before.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] said in a speech delivered in this House on the 25th of April last, "I agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat that there will be another tariff bill, another reduction," and he but voiced the sentiment of the friends of this bill when he said it.

Mr. Chairman, free trade and a high protective tariff are the twin enemies of American industry and American prosperity. I am opposed to both.

I am heartily in favor of "a tariff for revenue, so laid as to give just encouragement and proper protection to our industries without fostering monopolies." If such were the object of this bill, and it were framed with that end in view, it would receive my hearty support. It is not framed with a view of reforming or revising the present tariff, but for the purpose of reducing it. We are told that one of its objects is to reduce revenue and cut down war-tariff taxes. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], who is a member of the Ways and Means Committee, says he doubts whether it will succeed in reducing revenues or not. Is the object to do away with the constantly accumulating surplus in the national Treasury? Then repeal and wipe out the odious and infamous internal-revenue system, with its army of spies and informers. Having done that, proceed to reform and revise the tariff in such a way as to give us a revenue sufficient to meet the expenses of the Government economically administered, and so adjusted as to give proper protection to our industries. Do that, and you will have earned the approbation and applause of the great majority of our people. Pass this bill, and continue an agitation that, if successful, will give protection to English labor and English manufactures at the expense of American labor and American industries, and you will deserve and receive the condemnation of the people.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, when the House voted to consider the bill introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] it was not my intention or desire to offer any remarks during this discussion, but the debate has taken such wide range and so many arguments have been advanced by the friends and advocates of the measure which seem to me to be not only fallacious, but calculated to mislead, I ask the indulgence of the committee that I may state very briefly my objections to the proposed legislation. In 1882 the President appointed a tariff commission, composed of nine practical men, outside of politics and outside of Congress, to investigate and report facts and opinions with a view of enabling Congress to make such a revision of the tariff as might be found to be necessary.

This revision was asked for not only by the commercial and manufacturing interests of the country but by the working classes, not less than 80,000 laboring men sending petitions to the Forty-sixth Congress praying for the appointment of the commission. The commission presented its report in December, 1882, and the Forty-seventh Congress made the revision asked for by the passage of a bill which not only added to the free-list and secured important reductions upon imports, but did its work so well as to make any tariff tinkering at this time wholly unnecessary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why this agitation at this time, why the discussion of a measure day after day which is not only conceded by its advocates to be imperfect and incapable of just application, but in case it should become a law calculated to disturb, disorganize, and impair every industry of the country? Has any horizontal reduction of the tariff or any change in the duties as established by the Forty-seventh Congress been asked for? Has any one of the 80,000 laboring men who petitioned for the appointment of the commission demanded the proposed legislation? Have any of the great industries of the United States declared they wanted any change in the law as passed by the Forty-seventh Congress. As near as I can ascertain the only persons demanding the consideration and the passage of the bill are a few free-trade cranks claiming to represent the Free-Trade League, of the city of New York, but who in fact represent the Cobden Club, of London. I have not forgotten, sir, the large sums of money contributed in 1879 by the English manufacturers to aid the New York Free-Trade League in its warfare upon our domestic manufactures.

Mr. Chairman, there is, perhaps, no question so imperfectly understood, yet of such vital importance to the whole people, as this matter of the protective tariff; and while I claim to possess no superior knowledge of the subject, I do claim that the great industrial interests of the country—the agricultural, the commercial, and the manufacturing interests—are so linked together that you can not injure the one without injury to the other; that you can not advance or extend the one without a corresponding influence upon the other. For this reason, sir, this should not be made a political or sectional question.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to a "tariff for revenue only," or what is known as British free trade. It may work well in England, where an able-bodied man, if he works hard, can earn $3 to $4 per week, but we want none of it in this country. Such a tariff is a discrimination against American and in favor of the half-paid and pauper labor of Europe. Such a system is a discrimination against our domestic and in favor of foreign manufactures.

My distinguished colleague from New York says that the American tariff must go. Sir, he talks like an English manufacturer. This, sir, has been the determination of the English Government ever since the Colonies dissolved their connection with the mother country. From the earliest date England opposed the establishment of manufactories in the American Colonies, its object being to confine their commerce to the exportation of agricultural products and in return supply them with the products of her own manufactories. In 1817 the House of Commons declared that the erection of manufactories in the Colonies was calculated to lessen their dependence upon Great Britain. In 1831 the House of Commons issued an order to inquire into the affairs of the Colonies, charging that in certain localities in New York, New England, and Pennsylvania the people had established woolen mills, and in Massachusetts they had erected a paper mill. All this was regarded as rank treason in the eyes of the mother country.

Horace Greeley says in his Political Economy "that when the Federal Constitution was adopted in 1787, and it was announced that enough States had voted to ratify it, there were instantly great rejoicings in all the seaboard villages, and great processions were formed wherein the laboring classes appeared parading the hammer and the anvil, crying, "Protection to American industry." That since the war ended they had had free trade—the markets glutted with foreign goods and no demand for American labor. "Protection must go," "the American tariff must go," says my distinguished colleague [Mr. HEWITT]; a remarkable declaration from the lips of the most ardent of free-traders, but more remarkable when coming from the distinguished statesman of New York, for if there is any one thing more than another which has made his State the grandest and most powerful State in the Union it is the advantages which her people and her varied industries have received under the operation of a protective tariff.

I will not take the time to argue the question with the gentleman. All I desire to say is that his declaration is against the history of the country under the operations of high protection.

Henry Clay, in a speech delivered on the floor of this House in 1834, said:

> The proposition to be maintained by our adversaries is that manufactures without protection will in due time spring up in the country and sustain themselves in competition with foreign fabrics, however advanced the arts and whatever the degree of protection may be in foreign countries. Now, I contend that this proposition is refuted by all experience, ancient and modern, in every country. If I am asked why unprotected industry should not succeed in a struggle with protected industry, I answer, the fact has ever been so, and that is sufficient. I reply that uniform experience evinces that it can not succeed in such a struggle, and that is sufficient.

And again, in 1832, speaking of the protective tariff passed in 1824, he said:

> If I were to select any term of seven years since the adoption of the present Constitution which exhibited a scene of the most widespread dismay and desolation, it would be exactly that term of seven years which immediately preceded the tariff of 1824.

If the term of seven years were to be selected of the greatest prosperity which this people have enjoyed since the establishment of their present Constitution, it would be exactly that period of seven years which immediately followed the passage of the tariff of 1824.

Mr. Chairman, free trade as a theory is all right; nothing could be more plausible. But when put into practice, so far as being applicable to the wants and conditions of our people, it is a stupendous fraud. It defrauds the farmer, it defrauds the manufacturer, and it defrauds the laboring man. Sir, it is unfortunate for those who advocate and demand the passage of this bill or who favor "a tariff for revenue only" that the facts and history of free trade in this country are against them. When the low-tariff acts of 1834, 1846, and 1857 were passed our markets became glutted with the goods of foreign manufacture, all branches of industry were paralyzed, and all kinds of labor went begging for employment. But when the high-tariff acts of 1824, 1842, and 1861 were inaugurated all kinds of wages advanced, labor was in demand, activity in all branches of industry took the place of inactivity, and business throughout the country revived. If you ask me to give the reasons for such results, I answer that such was the fact, and that is sufficient.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is this bill that splits the great Democratic party in two and occupies the attention of this House from day to day and week to week, to the exclusion of more important legislation? Is it really a measure in the interest of the laboring man of the country? I answer, no, for the reduction proposed makes no discrimination between the luxuries and the necessaries of life. I would vote to put certain articles upon the free-list upon which duties are now exacted, and I would favor the reduction of the duties upon certain imports if such reduction could be made without injury to the laboring classes or the great industries of the country. But such is not this bill. Such legislation in my judgment would meet with no opposition from this side of the House. The bill under discussion makes a sweeping horizontal reduction of 20 per cent., making no discrimination whatever.

Should the bill become a law, how much would it lessen the revenues of the country? No advocate of the measure seems to know. Would the revenue under this bill prove sufficient to meet the current expenses of the Government? No advocate of the measure seems to know. The only fact concerning which there is no doubt or obscurity is that it is legislation in the interest of free trade. This is disclaimed by some who champion the measure, but I quote from the speech of the father of the bill [Mr. MORRISON], delivered upon this floor on the 15th of last month, in which he stated that his bill was but the advance toward and a promise of a more complete revenue reform. Mr. Chairman, the current expenditures of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1883, were $265,408,137; of this amount $59,160,131 was paid to meet the accruing interest upon the nation's debt and $66,012,574 was paid out in pensions to the soldiers.

Sir, the debt must and will be paid to the last dollar, interest and principal; and not less sacred is the nation's obligation to its Union defenders. The pensions must be continued. Under our present system of tariff sufficient revenue is realized from the duties on imports and the internal-revenue taxes on whisky and tobacco to meet all these obligations. Not a dollar direct tax is levied upon the people. Free trade means direct taxation; it means that the farmer, the laboring man, the mechanic, and the manufacturer shall be subjected to direct taxation, and that they and their accumulations shall pay the national debt, the soldiers' pensions, and the expenditures of the Government, instead of a policy which now requires these obligations to be paid by duties on foreign importations and the internal-revenue system, the taxes on distilled spirits, fermented liquors, and tobacco.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of a protective tariff for the reason it protects the farmer and all the great agricultural interests of the country. This is not only true of the New England farmer, but the wool and grain producers of the West, the cotton-growers of the South. There is not a single agricultural interest in the country that is not more prosperous under a high than a low tariff. It protects them by providing a home market. What would the farms be worth without the manufacturer? It is a mistaken idea that the American farmer is dependent upon a foreign market, or that Europe has to come to America for her supplies. As has been stated, 90 per cent. of all the agricultural products of the United States are consumed at home; that while the total value of our agricultural products reached in 1880 the enormous sum of $3,600,000,000, the agricultural exports, all told, did not exceed in value $500,000,000. The Western farmer no longer leaves his crop in the field unharvested or sells forty bushels of wheat for a pair of boots. Such was his actual condition prior to the revision of the tariff in 1824.

The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] in his very able argument—and to my mind the most subtle and ingenious that has been made in favor of the bill during this discussion—attempts to meet this question. He told you that between 1850 and 1860 we had a low tariff and from 1860 to 1880 we had a high tariff. He endeavored to give this House the relative increase in the wealth of our domestic manufactures; but, sir, he forgot to give us the relative increase in the agricultural products of the country during those years. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the increase of our agricultural products from 1860 to 1880, a period of twenty years, and under a high protective tariff, as has been stated. From the official reports I find that from 1860 to 1880 there was an increase in the acreage in farms from 407,000,000 to 536,000,000, an increase in the value of farms from $6,645,000,000 to $10,197,096,770, and that the total value of agricultural products in 1880 was $3,600,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, I have repeatedly heard it stated during this discussion that this legislation was in the interest of the laboring classes, that European labor was as well paid as in the United States. Gentlemen, this sort of talk may do here, but do not talk it to the laboring men themselves. They know better. If all kinds and classes of labor is not better paid, better fed, better clothed, and better housed in the United States than in Europe, will the advocates of a "tariff for revenue only" explain why for the past fifty years there has been a constant stream of immigration from nearly all of the European countries, and at this time more from free-trade England than any other country? From this source the United States has acquired much of its power and greatness, for it is the labor of the country that makes the nation. During the past sixty years the total of this immigration is greater than the entire population of Scotland and Ireland combined, and nearly one-half the present population of England. Between 1820 and June 30, 1880, the aggregate of those who came from Europe to establish homes in this country was 11,597,181; between 1820 and 1879, 9,698,098.

From Ireland came 3,065,761, Scotland 159,547, Wales 17,893, Germany 3,002,092, Italy 70,181, France 313,716, Sweden and Norway 306,092, Switzerland 83,709, Russia 53,147, Austria and Hungary 65,588. Between 1820 and 1880 Ireland seems to have taken the lead. Why Ireland, unless it has enjoyed absolute free trade with the most powerful nation on earth for many years, and for what came these millions of men and women to America unless to better their condition? No language can describe the condition of the Irish peasant and the men and women who fill the English manufactories. The most menial servant in this country enjoys a paradise compared with their condition.

The British Almanac for 1881 states that but 59 per cent. of the Irish laborers eat meat, and these but five ounces per week. From the State Department we find that the average wages of the farm laborer in England without board is $3.60 per week, Scotland $4.25. A good bricklayer in England can earn in a week, if he works industriously and attends closely to his business, $7.60; in Scotland, $7.25; in New York, $12.50; and in Chicago, $11.50. A mason in England, if he is skilled and fully understands his trade, can earn per day from 50 to 72 cents; carpenters, from 71 to 75 cents; blacksmiths, from 67 to 80 cents.

The report of the Tariff Commission gives the following as the wages paid in England and Pittsburgh for the manufacture of iron:

	England.	Pittsburgh.
Puddling, per ton	$1 94	$5 50
Shingling, per ton	29	77
Rolling and puddling mill, per ton	29	68½
Rolling and heating, per ton	1 80	4 80
Common laborer	56	1 30

In England the woolen manufacturer pays his operator an average of $4.50 per week; Massachusetts and Connecticut, $13.43. Our protective tariff increases the wages of the workman. In proportion to the duty imposed his pay is increased, and no one so clearly understands this as he who has worked in the mills and manufactories of foreign nations.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this measure because it is hostile to our domestic and in the interest of foreign manufactures; and this is a matter quite as important to the South and the great West as the East. The New England farmer has prospered because he has had the manufacturer at his door providing him with a market for all of his products. It is an old saying, but none the less true, that the farmer needs the mechanic to consume his surplus of provisions, and the mechanic needs the farmer to use his surplus of fabrics. Alexander H. Stephens, speaking of the future of his State, said that cotton could be made into cloth and thread more cheaply in Georgia than in Massachusetts, and that the future of his people was great and hopeful in prospect if they would be true to themselves in working out their own high destiny.

We have heard a good deal during this discussion about England being the manufacturer of the world. Is it at all surprising that the American can not compete with the English manufacturer? The English manufactories are the growth of six hundred years, and for more than four hundred years they maintained a high protective system. Now, why can not the cotton, woolen, and iron industries of the United States compete with England? Simply because wages in this country are 50 per cent. higher than in England; and you attempt to reduce them to the level of the pauper labor of Europe and you would bring about a commercial revolution. This is not a question whether we may have free salt or a slight reduction in duties upon imports. It is a square issue between English free trade on the one hand and American protection on the other.

Pass this bill, and you would paralyze nearly every great manufacturing industry in the country. I have repeatedly heard it stated during this discussion that our manufacturers were standing in their own light. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], whose speech I have heretofore referred to, stated that the official records show that our manufacturers were more prosperous between 1846 and 1860 than they have ever been since. The history of those years show directly the contrary, or I do not read it correctly. In 1850 the total value of the manufactured products of the United States was $1,019,106,616; in 1860, $1,885,861,676; in 1870, $3,432,415,933; in 1880, $5,369,579,191. The total value of the exports of the products of manufactures in 1860 was $45,658,873; in 1882, $103,132,481; in 1883, $111,890,101. Take the woolen industry of the United States. In 1850 the capital employed was $28,118,650; in 1860, $42,849,932; in 1870, $132,382,319, and in 1880, $159,069,270, nearly six times the amount of capital invested in 1850. The total value of the woolen industries in the United States in 1850 was $49,726,882; in 1860, $80,734,606; in 1870, $217,668,826, and in 1880, $267,182,914, a sum nearly six times that of 1850, and more than three times that of 1860. What is true of the woolen interests is equally true of the silk industry in the United States. Total value of silk manufactured in the United States in 1850 was $1,809,476; in 1860, $6,607,771; in 1870, $12,210,062; but in 1880 it reached the enormous sum of $40,500,000, exceeding the total value of the silk product of Great Britain by upward of $5,000,000.

The undisputed facts are that everywhere protected manufactures are in a healthy and vigorous condition; unprotected manufactures sickly, feeble, and precarious. The condition of Canada is a fair illustration of what a low tariff or no tariff at all will do. Until within the last few years she has had no protection; consequently no great manufacturing industries. Agricultural lands on the American side of the line are at least 50 per cent. higher than on the Canada side. I have referred to Ireland. She has always had perfectly free trade with the richest manufacturing nation in the world. Turkey is another nation where the customs are low. Let the United States manufacture for itself, do its own manufacturing, and England will not long be the manufacturer of the world. A nation that does its own manufacturing and produces its own food creates two markets instead of one.

Mr. Chairman, I have occupied more time than I intended. My only apology is the great and vital importance of the question under consideration. As I stated at the outset of my remarks, it is not a bill in the interest of the laboring classes or any of the great industries of the country. They do not want it. They have not asked for it. On the contrary, they have entered their solemn protests against it. In the language of the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON], it is a bad bill, and the people will have nothing to do with it. God forbid that the wages of the laboring men and women of this country shall ever be put in competition with the half-starved labor of Europe. God forbid, sir, that the condition of the great laboring classes of the United States shall ever be reduced to the misery and wretchedness of the millions that exist in England and Ireland under the operation of free trade. I want to see labor ever honored and respected in this country, our people the most happy and prosperous of all the peoples of the earth, and our nation the grandest the sun shines upon. It is for this, sir, that I oppose the passage of this bill and all attempts to establish free trade in the United States.

Mr. McCOID addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, while opposed to the bill now under consideration, yet being in full sympathy with any action contemplated by Congress looking toward a revision of the present tariff law, and the correction of the inequalities existing therein, and in deference to the expressed wish of a large majority of the Democratic Representatives in this body, and believing that no interest of my people would be jeopardized thereby, I voted for its consideration by the House. Whatever may have been my opinion as to the party policy of a discussion of this question at this time I cheerfully yielded to the demands of my colleagues.

I did this, sir, hoping that a full and free discussion of this bill would enable this House to see the gross injustice of its provisions toward my own and many other sections of our country, and believing that it was possible the gentlemen who have framed it and are so persistently urging its passage could be induced to agree to so amend it as to make it acceptable to those who earnestly desire a revision and reform of the present tariff system. But, sir, the utterances of no less than three of the distinguished gentlemen, members of the Ways and Means Committee, and the especial champions of this bill, to the effect that in framing it "they had yielded everything they intended to yield," coupled with the declarations of the advocates of the measure before this committee, force me to believe that it is the intention to pass it, if possible, just as it is, regardless of the consequences which may follow to the country. Believing now that the interests of all the people of my district are involved in the passage of this bill, I desire as briefly as possible to give my reasons for opposing it. Our national funds are raised chiefly by tariff and internal revenue.

The internal-revenue tax, involving multitudes of officers and operating as a burden and hinderance to special lines of business, has never been justified, except on the ground of necessity. It ought therefore to be repealed, except as to that on whisky, which nobody demands. The yearly surplus in the Treasury of millions of dollars will justify such repeal of part of the internal-revenue system and still leave more money than an economical administration of the Government will require.

The present tariff, in effect, was framed, like the internal-revenue law, to meet conditions growing out of the war. It is larger and higher than any necessity of the Government requires, and it is larger and higher than any theory of protection or revenue tariff will justify. It is also unequal and unfair in its application to different interests of the country, and the Morrison bill would make it more so. This bill, regardless of all principles of revision or reform, by a horizontal reduction perpetuates most of the inequalities of the existing law, and so far as my State is concerned aggravates them by leaving the rest of the country protected and placing West Virginia on the free-list.

The burdens of the people ought to be lightened. We ought to return from a basis of war tax to a peace foundation. We ought not to impose upon our people in any form greater burdens than the necessities of the Government require. But when we shall have reduced our demands upon the masses for money to the amount of our necessities, then both the benefits and the burdens of that amount should be fairly and equitably distributed. This I understand to be the meaning of the Ohio platform, and also the substance of the platform adopted by the Democrats of my own State last month in convention assembled, and on that platform I stand.

This principle and its bearings and relations to the interests of the people of my district I shall discuss hereafter.

By this bill you charge my people with the full measure of burdens that all other protection now afforded to other sections imposes upon them, less your 20 per cent. horizontal reduction; but when I tell you that as a Representative from West Virginia I shall claim for her the same measure of protection which you accord to others of the great States, you answer me with coal, salt, and lumber on the free-list.

I have heretofore alluded to the Ohio platform, to wit:

> We favor a tariff for revenue limited to the necessities of the Government economically administered, and so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive industries at home, afford just compensation to labor, but not to create or foster monopolies.

This I conceive to be the true Democratic doctrine upon this great question, not only as promulgated by the Democratic fathers, but as announced by the Democratic party in its declaration of principles in years past.

There is no question as to the right and duty of Congress under the Constitution to take care that under its tariff laws no detriment shall be done to home industries. One of the first revenue bills passed by the American Congress contained in its preamble a recognition of the importance of adjusting the tariff to encourage American manufactures. And this is an important and valuable fact as a contemporaneous interpretation of the Constitution from a Congress many of whose members had aided in framing that instrument. Incidental protection is not only good constitutional law and policy, but it is sound Democracy. To Thomas Jefferson himself has been attributed the authorship of the phrase "a discriminating tariff," which is the Ohio platform condensed. Jackson was a firm advocate of the doctrine, and in one of his messages he asserts that individual protection is needed as a means of diversifying our industries, as agriculture was being overcrowded. James K. Polk held to the same idea, and Silas Wright first designated it as "incidental protection."

I take it that the Democratic platform of 1868, adopted by the convention which nominated Horatio Seymour, is a fair statement of the views of the Democracy both then and now. That body was the first harmonious national convention of the party held in twelve years. In 1860 the party was torn by factions and rent in twain. In 1864 the South was unrepresented. In 1868 not only did the old Douglas and Breckinridge Democrats come together, but large numbers of Old Line Whigs, especially from the South, then began to co-operate with them. All were united upon the following resolution from the national Democratic platform of 1868:

> And a tariff for revenue upon foreign imports, and such equal taxation under the internal-revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures, and as will without impairing the revenue impose the least burdens upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country.

In 1872 a system of taxation was demanded which should not interfere with the interests of the people, and the discussion of the question of protection or free trade was remitted to the people of the Congressional districts. In 1876 and 1880 greater prominence was given to the main object of the tariff, namely, to raise the revenue; but this was because of abuses which had grown up under Republican administration by which monopolies were protected and production crippled. It was not because the Democratic party had abandoned its historic position as the friend and protector of American industries, nor do I understand that either at Saint Louis or Cincinnati the Democracy turned its back upon the policy of discriminating in favor of American toilers and American products. In fact, Mr. Chairman, the great difference between the parties is not that of free trade on the one hand, which would abolish custom-houses and raise all revenue by direct taxation, and on the other absolute protection, which would exclude foreign imports, and, like free trade, compel all revenues to be raised by direct taxes, but it is whether the tariff shall be adjusted in the interest of the masses or in the interest of the few.

I do not believe that a tariff should attempt to sustain by artificial stimulus enterprises that are alien here or that it should create monopolies to oppress consumers. I do believe that a tariff for revenue can be and should be adjusted to establish business firmly, to develop the dormant resources of the country, and to work out the grand problem of its material greatness by fostering the thrift of toiling millions in the countless pursuits for which a bountiful Providence has furnished here the material and the field.

I represent a district, Mr. Chairman, which has several important interests affected directly by the tariff, and especially by this bill. Coal, lumber, iron, and salt, and, indeed, sir, the material interests of all classes in my district, the farmer, the mechanic, the miner, and laborer, will all be seriously affected by its passage.

Give the West Virginia producer or manufacturer a protection incident to the power of the Government of laying duties on imports, represented by a fair and equitable tax upon the product of his foreign competitor, and you give him what he has a right to demand and what his Government will not wisely deny him—a fair chance in his own markets. Refuse him this and you destroy his business; you lock up the resources he is engaged in developing. To no purpose do you open to him by your policy of free trade "the markets of the world" when by the same policy you bring in a stranger to drive him out of his own.

In my district there are now fifty-nine collieries in successful operation. Although mostly of recent establishment, the product last year was nearly 29,000,000 bushels of coal, besides large quantities of coke made at the mines. Over 13,000,000 bushels of this coal found its way eastward and was marketed mainly in the Eastern seaboard cities. The miner was enabled to carry his product thither by reason of a protection, incident to the power of laying duties upon imports, of 75 cents per ton on foreign coal, which is an ad valorem duty of about 18 per cent. It was in evidence before the Ways and Means Committee of this Congress that the average profit on coal marketed in the Eastern cities does not exceed 15 cents per ton. This is true of shipments from my district. Take off the duty on coal and you give the foreign producer an advantage in the American market of 60 cents per ton over the miner of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia. You compel us to carry all our coal West and South. You make us overstock that market and drive us into it. You deny us the opportunity to sell one-half our product at moderate figures and compel us to take half-price for the remainder.

In my district, sir, the progress of material development has been phenomenal. Capital has been invested there by millions. The wilderness of yesterday is now populous, busy, and prosperous. Thousands and thousands of honest laborers have gone there to find homes. Working in the mines and in the forests, and in industries relative thereto, they have felt the fostering care of incidental protection. Through their efforts, backed by capital and enterprise, the Kanawha and New River valleys are fast becoming the richest and most prosperous sections in either of the Virginias, if not in the entire South. Nor will this stop here if the true Democratic policy is pursued. Stimulated by the results of the past few years, with their vast mineral and timber resources as yet undeveloped, already are projects on foot to open up to the world by railroad communication the great coal-fields and vast forests of the Buckhannon, Elk, Gauley, Greenbrier, Coal, and Guyandotte valleys.

Free trade in coal and lumber means no market for those commodities and probably a stoppage of these enterprises, leaving the hidden and inaccessible wealth of these regions to sleep undeveloped for years. Free trade in coal and lumber means the impoverishment of a large portion of my people and desolation to that country. When employers and employés shall, amidst the wreck of their industries and the ruins of capital; when the farmer of the mountain counties, deprived of the market for his products which he has had at his very door by reason of these enterprises, come to reflect upon their confidence in a Government caring more for the stranger than for its own people, it will be small consolation for them to remember that you "have reformed the revenue system." It will be little comfort to him "who hath not where to lay his head" to be told that you "have opened wide to him the markets of the world."

It is a significant fact that much of the demand for free coal comes from the manufacturing centers. In other words, ultra protection joins hand with ultra free trade in the effort to cripple one of the leading industries of the country. It is said that free fuel means cheap fuel, especially in the East. This must be taken with its limitations. When foreign producers shall have driven American coal out of the markets consumers will be at their mercy. They will no longer be restrained by a healthy competition, and prices will be regulated by their rapacity and the necessities of the consumer. But this is not all. The amount of business done has its effect upon the cost of transportation. Lessen the amount of freight of one kind carried by the railroads and the loss must be made up on some other; if not in quantity, then in rate.

Three great railroads are now carrying coal to the Eastern cities. Who can doubt that the enormous coal trade of the Pennsylvania Central, Baltimore and Ohio, and Chesapeake and Ohio Railroads has its effect upon this tariff of rates, or that if this business were cut off other kinds of business must help bear the loss? If American coal be driven from the Eastern markets to any extent, to the same extent will the cost of carrying other freight be enhanced. The revenue will not be allowed to decrease. The difference will be made up. It may be on grain; it may be on cattle. The Eastern consumer's doubtful saving in the coal-scuttle will be more than set off by the certain loss in the pantry. In short, sir, if by the passage of this bill the coal of the British Provinces, with the great advantages of cheap labor and water transportation, is allowed to become a competitor with American coal, the latter will be driven from the Eastern market. The result will be an abandoned market, lower prices, limited production, and decreased wages.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, allow me to say that I would cheerfully support a measure reducing our tariff taxes, revenue taxes, and all taxes to a peace basis. I am for placing them in the line of governmental necessities as exactions from the people. But the pending proposition, to perpetuate the inequalities of a system which would give elsewhere all the protection and to West Virginia all the free trade, I can not support.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I voted against bringing the pending bill before the House for consideration, because I believed that agitation of the tariff question was uncalled for, unwise, and would be productive of no good result. I had heard of no clamorous demand by the people for legislation upon this subject. So far as I knew no considerable number of petitions had been received praying for Congressional action. I heard of no delegations besieging the Committee on Ways and Means demanding relief from what are called the present unjust burdens. The advocates of the measure were frank enough to say that they did not believe that any measure which the House might pass would secure the concurrence of the Senate or the approval of the President. And hence it seemed to me that the mere pride of opinion was about to embroil the House in an angry and fruitless contest. Eminent and able gentlemen had for years nursed and fostered their pet theory; they had preached repeated crusades against the established policy of this Government; and they appeared to be more anxious that their views should receive the indorsement of this House than that any great public want should be gratified.

But, sir, the bill is before us. It has been discussed for nearly three weeks, and I fail to see any indication to justify this expenditure of time, of energy, and of eloquence.

I should be content to sit silent until the close of this debate but for the fact that an attempt has been made to make support of this bill a test of party fealty; and the further fact that inasmuch as I represent perhaps the largest manufacturing district in the country, my silence might be misconstrued into a weakness of my convictions and a lack of interest in behalf of my constituents.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I protest against the right of any one to make the Morrison bill an article of the political creed of the Democratic party. Such a claim can not be sustained by appealing to any authorized expression of the party's policy. It is not even in accord with the declaration in favor of a "tariff for revenue only." With all their denunciation of the present law as incongruous, inequitable, oppressive, and extortionate, in the interest of manufacturing monopolies, and other like criticisms, not one of the advocates of the pending bill pretends that it will correct the incongruities and inequalities; that it will abolish the alleged oppressive and extortionate features. Not one of them pretends that this bill has been framed upon the theory of "a tariff for revenue only." All of the features of the present law are to be retained except the additions to the free-list; the same inequalities are to continue, for the horizontal reduction will remove none of them. If there is an unjust disproportion between one article taxed $1 and another article taxed 50 cents, the same unjust disproportion will continue if the first is reduced to 80 cents and the second to 40 cents.

We have heard in this discussion a good deal about displaying the courage of convictions without regard to results. Is it claimed by any one that this bill is the bold and manly announcement of the views entertained by its advocates? Some of them are candid enough to say that it is not what they want, but they will accept it as the best they are likely to get. That, of course, is a practical and sensible view, but it silences the high-sounding pretensions to extra courage.

But, Mr. Chairman, the point I wish to make is this: If party lines were to be drawn upon this question why did not the committee report a bill which they could hold up before the world and say, "Here is a tariff for revenue only;" the national Democratic convention declared this to be a cardinal doctrine of political faith; those who oppose it must be condemned as heretics. But the committee did no such thing. Assuming that the general declaration stands as the creed of the party, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] is not bold enough to say that his bill embodies the thought of that convention. So that those who claim the binding force of the loose declaration in favor of a "tariff for revenue only" have no warrant for making this bill a shibboleth of party fealty.

And I deny the authority of a Congressional caucus to formulate a creed for the national party. The eloquent gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] showed some disposition to invoke the terrors of an offended caucus, and to lash into the support of this bill all who follow the Democratic banner. But I rejoice in the fact that caucus is no longer king. Republican Congresses submitted to his inexorable rule. But all Democrats denounced his tyranny then; and I rejoice that there have been enough Democrats independent and brave enough to break the scepter of his power.

I take this occasion, Mr. Chairman, to show how unfair it would be to the masses of the Democratic party for the Representatives in Congress to make a national platform.

Pennsylvania has twelve Democratic Representatives on this floor. They represent more than 400,000 Democratic votes. The States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Mississippi, and Texas combined have twenty-nine Democratic Representatives here, representing about the same number of Democratic votes as are cast in Pennsylvania. Here the Representatives from the five States referred to would outvote the Pennsylvania Democrats two to one. But in a national convention the votes from Pennsylvania will almost equal the votes of the five States combined. How unwise, then, to attempt to set up a standard of political faith here, and how futile to assert the coercive power of a Congressional caucus! When the effort is made to invest the caucus with the infallibility of a Delphic oracle, I repudiate its authority and appeal to the assembled representatives of the Democracy of the entire nation.

But I am told that my party is committed to the doctrine of "a tariff for revenue only." I answer, first, that this bill is in no sense the embodiment or expression of that doctrine. I answer, second, that the vague and general declaration referred to must be construed in connection with other declarations and acts of national Democratic conventions if we would ascertain what the position of the party has been upon this question.

Looking over the national Democratic platforms for the past thirty years I find that in 1852 it was resolved—

> That justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of any other, or to cherish the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our common country.

Different schools of political economy will place different constructions upon this language. I shall postpone a discussion of this point until I get through with the historic portion of my remarks. The convention of 1856 reaffirmed the resolutions of 1852, adding a declaration of opposition to all monopolies and exclusive legislation for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many. Most of those who urge the passage of the Morrison bill claim that a protective tariff is the character of legislation condemned by the convention of 1856. But it is a significant fact that that convention nominated for President an avowed protectionist—James Buchanan. In 1860 the platform was reaffirmed.

In 1864 the country was in the extreme agony of internal war and no allusion was made to economic questions. In 1868 the convention declared in favor of "a tariff for revenue upon foreign imports, and such equal taxation under the internal-revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures, and as will, without impairing the revenue, impose the least burden upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country."

Such language uttered to-day would drive the utterer from the household of Democracy if the decree of the caucus could be enforced.

In 1872 the convention said: "We demand a system of Federal taxation which shall not unnecessarily interfere with the industry of the people." But "recognizing that there are honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of protection and free trade," they remitted the question to the different Congressional districts.

There was a disposition manifested in that convention from which the men of to-day might learn some practical wisdom. There was no effort then to force upon the party an issue upon which there were honest differences.

The convention of 1876 adopted an oration rather than a party code. It said:

> We denounce the present tariff levied upon nearly 4,000 articles as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense. It yields a dwindling, not yearly rising revenue. It has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few. It has cut down the sale of American manufactures at home and abroad.

The entire proclamation is admirable as a phillipic against the many existing abuses. But it indicated an anxiety for additional revenue, whereas it is confessed on all hands that we now have too much. And it manifested some concern about the falling off of manufactures, whereas the complaint now is that the same tariff caused an excess of manufactures. Who will reconcile or explain the diverse conditions in 1876 and in 1883 under the same tariff?

In 1880 the declaration on this great question is grouped into and in a measure smothered under other issues in the announcement of belief in "home rule, honest money, the strict maintenance of the public faith, State and national, and a tariff for revenue only."

But the convention declared that "the Democratic party is the friend of labor and the laboring man." The true meaning of that I shall try to consider before I close.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the face of this recital of the authentic utterances of the representatives of the Democratic party chosen from every section of the land, and assembled for the express purpose of formulating the political creed of the party, how can any man, how dare any man, stigmatize as renegades and traitors those who favor the adjustment of imposts in a manner that will "best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country?

Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen wish to go farther back than the national convention in 1852, and appeal to the fathers of the Republic and the founders of our party, I will cheerfully go with them.

George Washington, in a message to Congress, said:

> The safety and interests of the people require that they should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others.

And the same George Washington approved the first tariff bill enacted by Congress, the preamble of which, like a beacon-light, gleams through the intervening years. It is as follows:

> Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid, &c.

Thomas Jefferson declared proper protection to American industry to be one of the "landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings." And again he congratulated the country that under "protecting duties" new manufacturing interests would become permanent. And the quotation from Jefferson made by Mr. Morrison is a reassertion of his belief in the doctrine of protection, and only limits the extent to which it should be carried.

James Monroe, in his inaugural address, said:

> Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care o our Government.

Andrew Jackson was more specific. He said these industries "ought to have extended to them adequate protection, that our manufacturers and laborers may be placed in fair competition with those of Europe."

And so the succeeding generations of statesmen of the Democratic party felt that proper encouragement to American manufactures was judicious and promotive of the general welfare. And it was reserved to modern theorists to anathematize the enterprising and successful manufacturers as "robbers," "plunderers of the people," "bloated barons aping royalty." These men who have developed the resources and added to the wealth of the country and have given employment to tens of thousands of operatives are made the targets for oratorical ordnance of caliber large and small.

Now, sir, I call attention of the House, and especially this side of the House, to one of the most recent deliverances upon this subject of any representative body of Democrats. Shortly after the introduction of the Morrison bill a meeting was gotten up in New York for the express purpose of indorsing and strengthening that measure. Tammany assembled in force. Two of the Representatives from New York [Messrs. DORSHEIMER and BELMONT] left their official duties here to instruct their clansmen upon this great economic question. Listen to the result:

Resolved, That we favor a tariff so adjusted as to derive our revenue, whenever possible, from luxuries rather than necessaries, and which will discriminate judiciously in favor of our home industries and manufactures.

If there is any Democrat who contends for more than that I do not know where he is.

It is true the Morrison bill was indorsed at the Tammany meeting, but it had to be sugar-coated with three resolutions similar to the one I have quoted.

Call the tariff by whatever name you please, only raise from it all the revenue which the Government requires, and adjust it with a judicious reference to our industrial interests, and those who are called protectionists will make no complaint.

Mr. Chairman, the gravity of this discussion might be enlivened somewhat by a comparison or contrast of the various arguments that have been presented in support of the bill. Some gentlemen asseverate that the present tariff does not protect the laboring men; others, and conspicuous among them the very able and philosophical gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], declare with equal solemnity that it does not protect the manufacturers. But all agree in denouncing it as a protective tariff. So we have the anomaly of protection that does not protect.

Again, some of the advocates of the bill declare that it will reduce the revenue; others believe it will have the contrary effect.

While I am opposed to this bill, Mr. Chairman, there are certain thoughts embodied in most of the speeches made on this side of the House in which I am in full accord, and upon which I believe the entire Democratic party could unite. I believe in rigid economy and the strictest integrity in the administration of public affairs. I believe that the Government is collecting too much revenue, and that the surplus in the Treasury is a dangerous temptation to extravagance and corruption. I believe that taxation should be reduced, and I would commence the reduction by the entire abolition of the internal-revenue system, thereby ridding the country of a tax upon agriculture, of an inquisitorial tax, and of a political bureau for campaign purposes. Then, sir, if it should be found that the revenues were still too large, I would apply the pruning knife to the customs duties. But I would have it done with judgment and skill, and not by an indiscriminate slashing at every dutiable article.

I have already said that there has been no public demand for tariff revision at this time. Neither farmers nor mechanics, producers nor consumers, manufacturers nor workingmen have asked for it.

I was glad to hear the generous and deserved tribute which my friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] paid to the intelligence and usefulness of trades-unions and labor organizations. These associations have a thorough knowledge of their own condition and interests. And they know the condition of and compensation received by competing workmen abroad. They know this, not from casual interviews with foreign manufacturers in their offices or parlors, nor from a holiday inspection of affairs in England and on the continent, but they send their shrewdest and best-informed members to mingle with foreign operatives and report upon their modes of life, the wages they receive, and the cost of living. And these associations, thus informed, have no desire to enjoy the fancied benefits of English free trade.

I think every gentleman who has spoken has professed a desire to promote the interests of the laboring people. I present their united protest against the doctrine of free trade, their united protest against the passage of this bill. And I demand of gentlemen to prove the sincerity of their professed regard for the laboring people by voting against a measure which those people condemn. The judgment of the trades-unions, intelligent and well informed as they are, ought to be conclusive as to whether or not this bill will promote their welfare. I ask Democrats who are the avowed and natural friends of labor to pause before they array against our party this large and influential class of our fellow-citizens.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HALSELL] has quoted a letter from an anonymous correspondent in Birmingham, England, to the Pittsburgh Dispatch, extolling the prosperous condition of the workmen in Birmingham as compared with those of Pittsburgh. Whoever the writer may be, I venture to assert that he can not find among the tens of thousands of workingmen in Pittsburgh a single one who would exchange conditions with those in similar employment in Birmingham.

And in this connection I refer with pride, as a citizen of Pittsburgh and of the United States, to a fact which illustrates the effects of the protective policy upon the energy, the aspirations, and the realizations of the working people. The fact that I allude to is that very many of the wealthiest and largest manufacturing establishments of Pittsburgh were founded and built up into complete success by men who themselves toiled at the puddling-furnace or the rolls, or the ovens of a glass-house. I put that fact against all the rhetoric of doctrinaires as to the practical results of encouragement to our manufacturing enterprises in so far as the laborers are concerned.

Gentlemen tell me that protection has not benefited the wage-workers of the land! Let them go with me to Pittsburgh and see thousands of operatives the owners of their own homesteads, the banks for the savings of the earnings of industry showing millions of dollars on deposit, the children of the toilers educated and their families well housed and well dressed. Can any manufacturing city in free-trade England present such a proud spectacle as this?

It is true there is now great, unusual depression in manufacturing, and in some places much suffering among the poor. But it is absurd to say that this is the result of protection. It is much truer to say that it is partly the result of too much tariff tinkering.

The legislation of last year struck down several industries and threw out of employment all engaged therein. I assert, upon the authority of the American Iron and Steel Association, that tin-plates and cottonties are not now made in this country, and that our iron-wire-rod industry has been almost entirely destroyed by the reduction of the duty in 1883. And it is now proposed to drive additional nails into the coffin of these dead industries, and to carry others to the same cemetery, over whose gates may be written "Free Trade."

Mr. Chairman, I repeat once more that this bill is uncalled for. No one, except the importing merchant, can complain of the duty upon any foreign products. Manufactured goods of all kinds never were so cheap as now, except in 1877 and 1878, when clouds of gloom enveloped our commercial horizon.

And if I had the time I believe I could demonstrate the fact, that farmers and all other consumers of manufactured goods have had to thank the protective policy for a reduction of prices on all the articles in common use. But for this policy we would have been entirely dependent upon foreign manufactures, and, without competition here, who believes that prices would have been lowered? Remove this competition by striking down our manufactures, and prices will inevitably advance.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely regret these differences in our political household. I regret that I can not agree with gentlemen for whom I have the sincerest and profoundest respect. But my view of duty to my constituents, my party, and my country alike prevent.

I have tried to vindicate the Democratic party from the false position in which some of its eminent members seek to place it. I have objected to the bill as anti-Democratic, impracticable, uncalled for, and injurious to the country. If this needless agitation shall cause the defeat of the Democratic party, I wash my hands of all responsibility. If commercial disasters ensue and the land should be overshadowed with gloom, the brilliant gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] will have to find some other figure of rhetoric than "the giant of protection" to account for the shadows upon the fair fields and firesides of our people.

Let the tariff cease to be a foot-ball for political aspirants; remove it from the arena of party strife; let it be settled upon business and upon patriotic principles; let our great industries adjust themselves to the demands of the times, unawed by fears of the intervention of theorists, and prosperity, plenty, and contentment will come again, typified by this glad spring-time, bringing warmth and health and beauty, filling every eye with brightness, every heart with happiness, and every home with joy.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, though usually averse to occupying the time of the House in presenting my sentiments upon any subject, yet it has occurred to me that in this instance I ought to give expression to my views upon the subject of tariff revision, particularly as my vote was not in line with that of my party upon the question of taking up for consideration House bill 5893, "a bill to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes," introduced by the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON]. I do not wish to be misunderstood because of my course on that occasion. I am and always have been thoroughly in sympathy with the policy of protection, but I thought that by the discussion of the question of tariff revision some good might be accomplished through the modification of the existing tariff law, enacted hastily during the short session of the last Congress. The end sought in the enactment of that law was to reduce revenue and to lessen the burdens resting upon the people without disturbing the protected industries; but the unfortunate fact remains that the revenue has not been materially reduced, nor is it likely to be under this law, and into the coffers of the United States Treasury the surplus is flowing at the rate of $100,000,000 during the fiscal year, and is a constant temptation to extravagance and improper appropriations, besides being a needless burden upon the people.

I am clear in my convictions that the policy of protecting the infant industries of our country is the only sound one, and I say this as a commercial man, as an importer of foreign merchandise, doing business in the great commercial metropolis of this nation, the place of all others where one would expect to find free-trade principles and followers, where one would expect to meet its champions in solid phalanx. I venture to assert that although it is the headquarters of the American branch of the Cobden Club, yet that the substantial merchants, bankers, and intelligent citizens are, in the majority of cases, favorable to protection to home industries. It was clearly illustrated in the Presidential election of 1880. New York was the pivotal State. New York was carried by the Republicans upon the platform of protective tariff, and the majority of 21,033 was the result and the outcome of the unusual interest taken in the success of the candidate of the party of protection by these same merchants, bankers, brokers, and citizens generally, who organized clubs and turned out en masse and worked diligently for the enlightenment of the people upon the subject of a protective tariff.

The unfortunate utterances of the candidate of the Democratic party upon this question brought about the defeat of that party and its candidate. The working people took up the subject, and the issue was fought squarely in New York and Brooklyn, and the usual large Democratic majorities were sufficiently cut down to admit of the State giving a majority for the Republican, Garfield. Protective tariff was clearly the issue and protection won in that race.

To show the wonderfully stimulating effect of the protective tariff system upon manufacturing interests I propose to take for illustration the cities of Brooklyn and New York, where the foreign commerce of the country has been so largely concentrated, these two cities being practically one in all business and commercial matters. I have prepared a few statistics, showing the population, number of hands employed in various industries, capital invested, and annual product of said industries; also the amount of the foreign commerce at the port of New York, as ascertained by the United States census in 1860, 1870, and 1880.

According to the census of 1880 the city of New York ranked first in the number of its manufacturing and other industries, there being 11,339; but in amount of capital invested and the value of the annual product she ranked second, the city of Philadelphia being first. The city of Brooklyn, which I have the honor in part to represent, ranked third in the number of its manufacturing and other industries, there being 5,201, but in amount of capital invested and the value of the annual product she ranked fourth, the city of Chicago being third.

The population of the city of Brooklyn rather more than doubled during the twenty years from 1860 to 1880. The number of hands employed in its varied industries ran up from 12,758 in 1860 to 47,587 in 1880, nearly four times as many. The amount of capital invested increased from $12,320,876 in 1860 to $61,646,749 in 1880, an increase of 500 per cent. The annual product ran up from $34,241,520 in 1860 to $177,223,142 in 1880, an increase of over 500 per cent.

The population of the city of New York in 1860 was 805,651, and in 1880 it was 1,206,299, an increase of 50 per cent. The number of hands employed in manufacturing and other industries increased from 90,204 in 1860 to 227,352 in 1880, an increase of 250 per cent. The amount of capital invested increased from $61,212,757 in 1860, to $181,206,356 in 1880, an increase of nearly 300 per cent. The annual product increased from $159,107,369 in 1860 to $472,926,437 in 1880, a like increase of nearly 300 per cent. In both cities the percentage of increase was much larger from 1870 to 1880 than from 1860 to 1870. Eight per cent. of the inhabitants of the city of Brooklyn are employed in manufacturing and mechanical industries, and 20 per cent. of the inhabitants of the city of New York are so employed.

This enormous increase in manufacturing and mechanical industries of the two cities is remarkable in view of the fact that foreign commerce has been supposed to be the interest to be first considered; and yet the increase of foreign commerce at the port of New York has been almost as remarkable, although the manufacturing interests have been gaining upon the foreign commerce. I shall not allude to domestic commerce or the coastwise trade. The foreign commerce at the port of New York in the year 1860, imports and exports, exclusive of specie, was $354,323,895; the value of the industrial product of the two cities, New York and Brooklyn, that year was $193,328,889, rather more than half as much. In 1870 the imports and exports, exclusive of specie, amounted to $499,281,111; the value of the industrial product of the two cities was $393,800,193. In 1880 the imports and exports, exclusive of specie, amounted to $879,999,827, and the value of the industrial product of the two cities was $650,149,579.

During the twenty years the foreign commerce increased 250 per cent. and the manufacturing and industrial products nearly 350 per cent. Fifteen and three-fourths per cent. of the population of the two cities were in the year 1880 employed in these manufacturing and industrial interests. I have gone somewhat minutely into this subject because I have thought it a good illustration of the beneficent results of the protective-tariff laws of which the Republican party has been the exponent. I propose to go a step further, and to show the prosperity of the working people of the two cities and of the State of New York through their accumulations of savings, as indicated by their deposits in the savings-banks of the State. I believe there is no better way of arriving at the financial prosperity of the people than in studying their institutions for savings, but in this exhibit I leave out all trust companies, building and other co-operative organizations, and confine myself simply to the savings-banks. In 1860 the savings-banks of New York and Kings Counties held on deposit to the credit of customers $49,034,133, an average of $215.92 each. In 1870 the amount on deposit was $147,-204,226, an average of $305.34 to each depositor. In 1883 the amount on deposit was $294,208,390, an average of $384.03 each to 766,094 depositors. One in every three of the people of these two counties had a deposit of $384.03 in a savings-bank.

The savings-banks of the entire State of New York held to the credit of their customers in the year 1860 $58,178,160, an average of $208.91 to each depositor. On January 1, 1870, they held $194,360,217, an average of $296.80 to each depositor. On January 1, 1883, they held $412,147,-213 to the credit of 1,095,971 depositors, an average of $376.05 to each; in other words, one in every five of the inhabitants of the State had on deposit in a savings-bank $376.05.

I do not wish to be understood as saying that all of the industries at which the people of the two cities are employed are protected, or that the depositors in savings-banks are all employed in manufacturing or industrial pursuits; but I claim that the great growth of these interests and the general prosperity of the people are largely the result of the protective policy.

I have no thought that the prosperity of the people of the State of New York and of the cities of New York and Brooklyn is exceptional; far from it. I believe that the entire country has shared in a prosperity perhaps the most remarkable in the history of any country at any age of the world. With few exceptions all industries have flourished, the most important exception being the ocean carrying trade, and the decline in this industry is owing to other causes than protection, in fact, is owing to the lack of protection. I copy a few sentences from a memorial to Congress adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of New York city February 4, 1864, and accompanying a carefully prepared comparative statement of the growth of the British and decline of the American carrying trade, with other valuable statistics. It is as follows:

> Your memorialists have endeavored to lay before you the importance of ocean steam navigation and its dependence, in the present stage of mechanical art, upon Government subsidies. They have pointed out the steadiness and regularity with which the British Government, through all periods of distress and financial difficulty, has faithfully supported the system which it inaugurated, establishing regular communication with point after point, as commerce, which the introduction of steam develops, has demanded new facilities. They have endeavored to estimate the harvest of wealth which Great Britain has reaped from the careful husbandry of its statesmen. * * * Our steamers have been driven from the ocean, until now not a solitary one carries our flag to any European port. * * * Not for want of enterprise on the part of her citizens, for the steamers already built can not hold their own upon the seas for the want of that aid and fostering legislation which other governments so liberally supply and without which competition is ruin.

As to what the future of this industry is to be no one is wise enough to tell, but under any circumstances its revival will be slow even with the removal of all surrounding difficulties.

Believing as I do that the policy of protection has been a wise one, I would not propose to change it; but I am thoroughly convinced that the time has come for a modification of the tariff laws with a view to a large reduction of the revenue and a lifting of the burdens resting on the people. The policy of the people of this country has been to collect its revenues largely through a tariff tax upon importations, and I do not believe any other way would be equally acceptable. The question at issue is, and has been almost from the beginning, whether the tariff tax should be for revenue only or for revenue with incidental protection. Upon this question the great statesmen have fought their battles until the subject has been thoroughly canvassed.

But the question of paramount importance now, the one which is staring the nation and its lawmakers in the face, is the reduction of the revenue. The revision of the tariff laws by the Forty-seventh Congress, undertaken with a view to a large reduction of revenue, does not seem to have accomplished that desirable end, and it is estimated that the surplus during the present fiscal year, as I have said before, will reach a hundred million dollars. The effect of the continued accumulation of an enormous surplus is unfortunate; it leads to constant raids upon the Treasury and the bringing in of all sorts of schemes of extravagance, leading to improper appropriations, besides being an unnecessary burden to be borne by the people. To reduce revenue there are three ways: First, through removing part or all of the internal taxes; second, readjusting the tariff laws, adding largely to the free-list; third, raising the tariff so high that it becomes prohibitory, thereby cutting off foreign trade and drawing a wall around our country, isolating it from the brotherhood of nations.

The plan proposed in the bill under consideration is a horizontal reduction of somewhere about 20 per cent., and the addition of coal (except from the Dominion of Canada), salt, and lumber to the free-list. From the discussion of the bill on both sides of the House I am in doubt if it would materially reduce the revenue. It is asserted by those who are favorable to its passage, as well as by those opposed, that it will not effect much reduction. As to the plan itself I have little to say. I think it an exceedingly awkward one, and one which I could not support. I have no doubt but that the effect of its enactment into a law would be ruin to many branches of industry, while others could safely be reduced more than is provided for by the provisions of this bill. In voting to consider the bill I had no expectation that I could vote for the clauses providing for the horizontal reduction, and the discussion which has ensued has convinced me that my judgment was correct, and that the enactment of such a law would be fraught with serious mischief.

To accomplish the end of a reduction of the revenue I would propose a further reduction in the tariff on sugar; I would add largely to the free-list articles which are classed as raw materials, such as jute, jute butts, manila hemp, sisal, tin plates, and a variety of articles which enter into the great manufacturing industries, as well as articles which enter into daily use but are not the product of our own country. By removing the duty on hemp and sisal, for instance, one of the heavy burdens resting upon the ship-building industry would be lifted and the product of our rope manufactories could be sold in foreign countries. The plan suggested would reduce revenue, help our manufactories, and would relieve the farmer and workman.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I yield to my colleague [Mr. SPRIGGS] for five minutes.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I have no ambition to add to the tariff literature of our country over which Jefferson, Jackson, Madison, Clay, Calhoun, and Adams made their greatest, most exhaustive, and brilliant efforts. I desire only in the brief space allotted to me by my distinguished friend from New York to emphasize my action in regard to this bill.

The policy of legislation, or rather the most hopeful one to be adopted, is to legislate as little as possible, disturb affairs as little as may be, let all business pursuits bring things to an equipoise; as it is a practical truth that almost any law if stable is better than the everchanging and unstable.

I would encourage the vital interests of all our varied industries. I would so legislate as to protect the laboring classes of our countrymen, and at the same time I would not disturb or distract. I would not have the manufacturer crushed and driven from business. I would not legislate so as to destroy his capital or hush the busy hum of his machinery. I would not see our laborers crushed by forcing them into competition with pauper labor of foreign lands. Protect the poor from the rich, the weak from the strong, is the voice uttered to us all from the policy of that Government that rests upon the shoulders of her people as the sovereign whole in unity.

It is urged that we raise too much revenue. It may not be desirable to have surplus revenue unappropriated, still it is far from an oppressive evil. To seek a remedy which will crush out our manufacturing interests and bring our labor into competition with cheap labor of foreign countries would be a greater evil than that we seek to remove.

Better bear the ills we have than fly to others we know not of.

I am, therefore, for non-interference at present. Let business affairs settle down upon a system of quiet; or if adopted to laws of adjustment, not hastily or inconsiderately to be disturbed. At any rate, hasty legislation is too far from the advisable for me to approve at this time. There are no products of our own that can allow of free importations without affecting the labor that produced them.

Labor is the foundation of all business affairs; it is the power, wealth, and glory of our nation, and is the only true productive capital of any people. Moneyed capital is its auxiliary; they should go hand in hand; the rights of either are not to be ignored, nor one protected as against the just rights of the other. Tariffs affect more or less either and both, and hence the importance of great caution and study in adjusting them. The author of this bill should at least have been able to have said: "We have carefully considered this bill, and we are satisfied it is wise and will accomplish the needed reform." But instead of that he brings it to us with an apology and says a horizontal reduction "is not the most logical or best, but none other was practicable," and it is with this apology for his deformed bantling that he would send us before the people to excuse ourselves for disturbing the business interests of the country and alarming the laboring masses of our people in this unsettling of the untried laws not yet a year old.

This is of a character with the reasons given by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio for favoring this bill. He supports the bill because he believes it is in the interests of manufacturers and laborers. Nevertheless he said:

I have been surprised at the want of knowledge exhibited by manufacturers with whom I have talked upon this subject.

Again, speaking of the intelligent laborer of the country, he says:

I would the workers of this country would cease to hug to themselves the delusion that protection is a help to them.

Then we are told the intelligent, practical employer and the practical, common-sense employé neither understand their true interest.

As well might a distinguished advocate seek to win his cause before a jury by saying: "Gentlemen of the jury, I concede that the law and the evidence are against me in this case, but I invoke you to remember that you have nothing to do with the law, and I ask you to ignore the evidence; listen to my eloquence and my theory of what the facts ought to be, and I will convince you that I am entitled to your verdict."

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the employer and the employed of this country know better in what their interests consist than the mere free-trade doctrinaire.

Such, briefly, are my views of the policy and principles by which my action should be governed on this bill.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. MILLER, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in our Constitution the jurisdiction and duties of all the departments of the Government are defined and limited. The power of each separate branch or department is limited to the expressed grants of power contained in it, or to those acts necessary to carry out powers expressly granted. By its terms all power not expressly granted to the General Government are reserved to the States or the people. This limitation is contained in the tenth amendment to the Constitution, which reads as follows:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

In connection with this, and as showing the design of the framers of our organic law to limit the powers of the General Government, I read the ninth amendment to the Constitution, as follows:

The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

As I construe this language it limits the power of Congress, as well as the executive and judicial departments of the Government, to certain and well-defined subjects of legislation, and limits its right to legislate upon the subjects committed to it to defined objects and purposes. I do not believe that under a proper construction of the Constitution Congress has unlimited power of legislation upon any subject unless power to do so is given it without restriction. Its powers are limited in legislating upon any subject by the expression of the purpose and object to be accomplished.

The framers of our organic law did not entertain the idea that Congress could by law create wealth and make itself self-supporting. They knew that in the carrying out of the powers committed to the General Government expenses would be incurred, and the money to pay these expenses was to be collected from the people who participated in the benefits it secured. And this power to raise money is contained in the eighth section of the first article:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

The terms of this grant of power to raise money define and limit the purposes for which it is to be raised to three, namely: first, to pay the debt; second, to provide for the common defense; and third, the general welfare of the United States. As to the two first there is little room to enlarge them by construction; their meaning is plain and certain. In other sections of the Constitution the Federal Government is expressly given authority to incur debt, to declare war, to suppress insurrection, and to defend the country against foreign invasion. So these two phrases only give the Congress the power to raise money to meet the expenses necessarily incident to the carrying out of powers expressly granted by other sections of the Constitution, and are not independent grants of a new power. But when we come to the third clause, the general welfare, we are met by the claim that this is a new and independent grant of power, not limited to the carrying out of the other powers granted. To this doctrine I can not agree, and particularly to that broad and most dangerous construction of these words which claims that they give to to the Congress general power to raise money for any purpose that it may for the time consider necessary to the special welfare of particular sections or particular industries.

It is from this simple phrase that gentlemen upon the other side of the House base their claim that Congress has the constitutional right to levy a tribute upon the general public for the benefit of a particular class. It is under this clause that they claim the authority to lay import duties, in order to protect and build up our "infant industries," some of them now more than a century old, yet as clamorously asking for protection as they did in the days of Washington and Jefferson. Each and every species of class legislation, every grant of a monopoly to individuals or corporations, every dollar of the people's money that has been taken directly or indirectly for the benefit of the few and at the expense of the many, has been justified under this "general-welfare" clause of the Constitution.

Is it for the "general welfare" that we are asked to continue a system of protective duties, thereby piling up in our Treasury $100,000,000 annually for which we have no use, and which is over and above all the necessities of a sinking fund and the healthful payment of our public debt as it matures? Is it for the general welfare that we are asked to continue to exclude a healthy and legitimate competition from our commerce, and compel our people to pay a tribute averaging 43 per cent. above the real market price to certain favored interests by which fabulous fortunes are being more rapidly accumulated than ever before known in the world's history? Is it for the general welfare that the workingman is compelled to pay an American manufacturer $20 for a serge overcoat worth in Liverpool eight and one-half dollars? Is it for the general welfare that the poor man has to pay $3 for the wool hat which he can import at $1.50, and in about the same proportion for anything he wears? Is it for the general welfare that when the poor man sets about to build his humble cottage to shelter his wife and children, he must pay a royalty of 100 per cent. upon his nails, 18 per cent. upon his lumber, 60 per cent. upon his window-glass, 41 per cent. upon his linseed-oil, 54 per cent. upon his white lead, 25 per cent. upon his wall-paper and slate, and 14 per cent. upon his shingles, when little or none of these percentages and extra costs go to the support of his Government? For it is only when consumption exceeds the home supply that the Government gets the benefit of the duty laid by the tariff act. So long as the home manufacturer can supply the home demand every retail dealer in his goods is a collector for him of these royalties laid upon consumption, and it is only when the foreign article comes into our custom-houses that the Government official gets the duty for Government use. All the rest goes to build up the splendid private fortunes of the protected industries.

But we are told by gentlemen on the other side of the House that the benefit to the general public from these protected industries consists in the fact that it enables them to pay better wages to their operatives and preserves American labor from competition with foreign labor. If this were true, which I shall hereafter try to show is not the fact, yet it could not be justified under the general-welfare clause, because, according to our last census, our total laboring population was 17,392,000 and of these only 2,739,000 were engaged in these protected pursuits; therefore it can not be for the "general welfare" that over 14,000,000 of laboring men are oppressed for the benefit of less than 3,000,000.

But these gentlemen say that these protected laborers are consumers of agricultural products and build up a home market for our farmers and give a better price for our agricultural products, and thus enable us to regulate the price of our agricultural products by a home market. In relation to that I read the statement made by Mr. Shearman before the Committee on Ways and Means:

The census shows that the entire products of American agriculture in 1880, including all that was consumed by the agriculturists themselves, was valued at $2,213,402,000; agricultural products exported in same year, $683,000,000; amount consumed at home, $1,530,402,000.

The total working population was 17,392,000, of which there were:

Farmers and farm laborers	7,670,000
Manufacturers, mechanics, and manufacturing workmen	2,739,000
Others	6,983,000
Total	17,392,900

Now, as one man eats about as much as another (especially if the first is a farmer), it is perfectly fair to assume that the consumption of agricultural products should be divided equally among all these persons; and, as there are at least as many persons to a family among farmers as among manufacturing workmen, it is not necessary to make any separate computation as to the families supported by the 17,392,000 working population. The agricultural produce of the country was, therefore, disposed of as follows:

Farmers consume of their own products	$673,372,000
Manufacturers and mechanics of all kinds	244,863,000
Other Americans	612,156,000
The foreign market	683,011,000

Thus it appears that the much despised foreign market is worth nearly three times as much to the American farmer as all the manufacturing classes put together. But this is far from being the end of the matter. Deducting from the 2,700,000 persons reckoned as the manufacturing classes all the flour-makers, provision-packers, carpenters and builders, with hundreds of thousands more who are engaged in those kinds of manufacturing which never can be benefited by the protective system (except in the same way that it is supposed to benefit farmers, namely, by providing them custom among protected industries), it is an extravagant estimate to assume that there are as many as 700,000 persons employed in those branches of manufacturing which can possibly derive any benefit from a tariff. As this number amounts to only a trifle more than 4 per cent. of the whole working population, it follows that the entire class of protected manufacturers and mechanics furnished a market in 1880 for less than $62,000,000 of agricultural produce, while the much contemned foreigners provided a market for $683,000,000, or more than eleven times as much as all the protected classes put together.

In order to maintain this paltry market for $62,000,000 of his produce, the American farmer submits to an annual taxation which draws from the country not less than $100,000,000 in excess of anything which honest government requires, with an additional taxation of from $500,000,000 to $700,000,000 per annum in the excessive price of domestic manufactures, exacted for the sole purpose of enabling the manufacturer to pay to his workmen the same wages as the farmer does. Taking the lowest estimate of the amount thus annually paid, and of the proportion which farmers pay out of the whole, the annual expense to the farmers themselves of maintaining this market for $62,000,000 is not less than $250,000,000.

The price of agricultural products are in fact, as we all know, regulated by the foreign demand for our surplus.

It was necessary to show these absurdities of this claim of authority for a protective tariff in order to show what I think is the correct construction of the clause of the Constitution now under consideration. Those of us who deny the correctness of this latitudinarian construction of this Constitution hold that under the term "general welfare," properly construed, there was no substantive grant of independent power to raise money for any purpose, but that those words only grant power to raise money for the general welfare as defined and limited by all the other clauses in the Constitution. I hold that all and the only general welfare for which the Congress has the right to raise money is defined in other sections of the Constitution by express grants of power, just as the clauses to pay the debts and provide for the common defense are given powers in other sections.

In other words, the "general welfare" about which the Congress is given power to raise money is set out in the Constitution itself and limited to these and these only. There may be and are unquestionably a great many things absolutely essential to the general welfare which are not and never have been claimed as subjects of Federal legislation, such as the protection of life and property in the States and the due and proper administration of State laws. If Congress has the general power to legislate for the general welfare, it can raise money to pay the debts of the cities, counties, and States of the Union. It can raise money to build churches, to establish factories, schools, newspapers, art galleries, in the States as it now does in the District of Columbia. It seems to me, therefore, absolutely essential that the interpretation of this clause should not in any case be extended beyond the raising of money to carry out the powers granted in other sections of the Constitution, which define and limit the general welfare, about which Congress may legislate.

Again, while this clause has not, so far as I know, and in the nature of things can not be, the subject of judicial interpretation, yet cases arising under State laws have been the subject of judicial determination by our highest courts, and I shall briefly refer to a few of these as showing how this clause would also be construed.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The Citizens' Savings and Loan Association of Cleveland vs. The City of Topeka (20 Wallace, R., 655), the question being the constitutionality of a law authorizing cities and towns to tax themselves in aid of manufactories, held (I quote from the syllabus of the opinion):

Among the limitations of the right to tax is that it can only be used in aid of a public object, an object which is within the purposes for which governments are established. It can not therefore be exercised in aid of enterprises strictly private or for the benefit of individuals, though in a collateral or remote way the local public may be benefited thereby.

Mr. Webster defines a tax as a rate or sum of money assessed upon the person or property of a citizen for the use of the State.

In Northern Liberties vs. St. John's Church (13 Pennsylvania State Reports, 104) Mr. Justice Coulter, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

I think the common mind has everywhere taken in the understanding that taxes are a public imposition levied by the government for the purpose of carrying on the government in all its machinery and operations; that they are imposed for a public purpose.

Can it be said that duties levied upon imports to build up individual enterprise, to encourage and foster the particular industries of a few at the expense of the many, comes within these definitions of a tax? An import duty is a tax, and according to these learned and distinguished authorities it must be levied for a governmental purpose, and not to foster private enterprise, even though the public may remotely receive a benefit thereby.

Even if the terms "general welfare" are given the broadest signification, yet they can not be made broad enough to cover a protective tariff as defined by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], "Protection for the sake of protection." It can not be for the "general welfare" that the industries of the few are builded up at the expense of the consuming millions. It can not be for the "general welfare" that capital is protected and given illegitimate profits at the expense of the great body of the people who live by their daily labor. It can not be for the general welfare that by the operation of these tariff laws the rich are made richer day by day and the poor grow poorer as the years roll on. It can not be for the general welfare that production is limited to the supply of an exclusive market, and when a surplus is made that work stops, wages cease, and the idle workman becomes a tramp in the land. The great majority of our people are of that class who day by day earn wages to support themselves and their families, and every discriminating duty upon articles of their daily consumption but makes their burden harder to bear and their lives more and more cheerless and hopeless.

The farmer and his help must toil on from early morning until late at night, with no shelter from the summer's sun or winter's rain, and at last he must trust to the seasons and the good providence of the Almighty for his harvests. And yet no law protects him from competition with the world; his surplus products must be sold for what they will bring; there is no plea made to give him a market from which all competition is excluded. He can not shorten hours of work or limit his production; if he does, his children will go unclothed and unfed. But it is not in fact true that these protected industries pay any higher wages than is paid by unprotected industries in proportion to hours of work, skill, and capacity for production.

It is true that American artisans produce more in a given time than most other nations. It is true that American skilled labor is the best and most valuable skilled labor, and therefore most profitable to the employer; but it is not true that protection adds to his wages or gives him any better living.

It has been argued upon this floor that protection equalized itself because of the fact that if A used the articles made by B under protection he paid B a bonus for making it; but on the other hand B used in return articles made by A and paid him back the bonus in that way. In the mean time what becomes of the workmen who made these articles and the balance of the great body of consumers of the articles made by A and B? No equalizing processes come to them to return the bonus they have paid to A and to B; and thus in the name of the revenue A and B gather taxes into their private coffers and grow richer and richer, while the unprotected public grows poorer and poorer by reason of these illegal exactions.

The universal law is that the price of labor is regulated by the inexorable law of supply and demand. When there is little to be done and many seeking work labor will be at starvation prices, while on the other hand when there is much to be done and labor is scarce wages will be high. No amount of legislation, no tariff can be made so high as to change this law; both individuals and corporations do and will continue to act upon this law until the millennial dawn. They get the cheapest labor that answers their purpose to be had in the market; and when, as with us, there is free intercourse between nations and peoples labor, like gold and commodities, will be imported and exported as is profitable to employers and employed. Labor is not protected. There is no law upon our statute-books which prohibits the foreign artisan or skilled laborer from coming to this country and engaging in any of these protected industries. There is no law to prevent the protected manufacturer from employing foreign operatives if they are willing to come here.

If wages were so much better here, as has been intimated on this floor, than in Europe, why is it that these foreign laborers do not come flocking here to better their condition? As a fact it is stated that foreign skilled artisans have come here and have gone again because the wages they had in Europe were really better than their wages here in its power to purchase comfort for their families. The workingman has no assurance that the next steamer from Europe will not bring a competitor for his place, and perhaps competition may be so sharp as to reduce the price of his labor, while protection takes nothing off the price of his living by reason of all this. His wages may be reduced by competition from abroad, but the price of his living can not be because of protection.

Protection, if it protects at all, does it by increasing the market price of protected articles, and thus increases the cost of those articles to the consumer. Probably 40,000,000 of the people of the United States are absolutely dependent upon the toil of muscle and brain of those who earn their living by the sweat of their brow. To them protection comes in the guise of giving them wages for work or a market for the fruits of their labor, while in fact it exacts from them 43 per cent. of their earnings, not to support their Government, but to build up the fortune of more favored citizens. To the workingman it means a reduction in the purchasing power of his wages; it means a decrease in his ability to support himself and his family, a decrease in his ability to lay up anything out of his earnings for old age and sickness or other misfortune; it means to him less of ability to educate his children and make them useful citizens.

In the beginning of our Government we were asked to protect our "infant industries" for just a little while and we will stand alone, and so it has gone on for a century, and still comes the cry, give us ten more years of protection and we can stand alone. One gentleman said England had six hundred years of protection to develop her industries, and so it goes on; like Oliver Twist, they still cry for more.

These protected industries are selfish as other people are, and desire to make all the profit they can with as little outlay as possible, and just so long as Congress will continue to give them a market for their wares, from which all real competition is excluded, they will continue to ask it.

If it be true, and I think it is, that where territory is given from which real competition is excluded, manufacturers having the privilege of this exclusive market will limit their production to the amount necessary to profitably supply this market and no more. In addition to this, protective tariffs increase the cost of most manufactures so as to prevent them from successful competition in the open markets of the world, and thus it diminishes the quantity of production, the demand for labor, and thereby the wages of labor. No one will deny that our skilled labor, our factory labor, is as good as any in the world, that our capacity for machinery is equal or better than any, and yet we are far behind in the amount and value of our manufacturing products exported to a market, and for the same reason that France and Germany are behind England and ahead of us. To show this, I refer to the statement prepared by Mr. Jacob Schoenhoff for the Committee on Ways and Means, as follows:

I take Germany and France, therefore, as examples. English wages are fully 50 per cent. above those of Germany, and on the average at least 30 per cent. above those of France. Besides, the English working week is one of fifty-six hours, while that of Germany is from sixty-six to seventy-two (often seventy-eight) hours, and that of France of seventy-two hours. Yet they all guard themselves by protective tariffs, not against their weaker rivals, but against the very country which pays the highest wages and has the shortest hours.

In cotton goods the imports and exports are:

Countries.	Imports.	Exports.
England	$12,000,000	$380,000,000
Germany (not containing yarns)		23,000,000
France (not containing yarns)	19,000,000	15,000,000

England's position in the commerce of the world in cotton goods is as follows:
Wages—From one-half to one-third higher than in any other European states.
Weekly hours—Fifty-six, against sixty-six and seventy-two on the continent.

English exports in cotton goods and yarns		$380,000,000
Germany exports in cotton goods and yarns	$21,000,000
Germany exports in hosiery, &c	10,000,000
France exports in cotton goods and yarns	19,000,000
United States exports in cotton goods	13,000,000
Holland exports in cotton goods and yarns	11,000,000
Belgium exports in cotton goods	5,500,000
Switzerland exports in cotton goods and yarns	10,000,000
		90,000,000
Excess of English exports in cottons over the rest of the world		290,000,000

If we deduct the exports of yarns, because they are more than balanced by imports from England—nineteen millions—then we have $71,000,000 against $380,000,000. This is a striking illustration of the fallacy of the "pauper-labor theory" in the tariff.

Our factories are not worked to more than half their capacity. Our mines and forges are over half the time idle, to avoid overproduction, because we do not produce for the world's markets, but only for our own. The laborer who is idle has to feed and clothe his family, just as if he was working at fair wages. His life and his strength, which are his capital, are wasting away day by day without profit to him, while the employer's capital remains intact. He only loses interest by its lying idle, when but for protection our manufacturers would have to depend upon the markets of the world and sell in competition with the world; they would run their machinery to the full capacity, they would work full time, make larger quantities of their fabrics at a smaller profit, in order to realize the income which they now get from limited production, and this would give more employment to labor, increase the demand for it, and thus increase wages.

It is a grand mistake to suppose that the cheapest labor is the most profitable. On the contrary, skilled labor which produces most in a given time gets the best price and is the most profitable to employers. Pauper labor and cheap labor is the worst labor and least profitable; it does not and can not compete with skilled or high-priced labor, as has been so fully shown in statements make upon this floor that it is unnecessary for me to repeat them.

Nor is it true, as seems to be assumed upon the other side in this debate, that the price of labor is governed by either the price of or profit upon the article made, but is governed, as I have stated before, by the law of supply and demand.

As an evidence of this I am told that in certain steel-rail works in this country when the price of steel rails was $56 per ton wages for certain laborers were $2 per day. Afterward the price of steel rails was reduced to $40 per ton, but the wages of these same workmen had advanced to $3 per day.

The protective system is not fair to our agricultural population. The surplus of agricultural production is of a character that it can not be long held from market. If more is made than will supply home consumption it must be exported and sold for whatever it will bring, and the price of the whole crop is regulated by the foreign demand. The prices of the cotton, corn, hog product, beef, &c., are regulated really by the foreign market, where it has to compete with the productions of the world. The wheat crop in India has reduced the price of wheat in Chicago to 80 cents per bushel. The cotton crop of Egypt regulates in a great measure the price of cotton in New York, because they come in open competition in the world's markets.

On the other hand, the agriculturist, when he comes to purchase supplies, must go into a market from which all reasonable competition is excluded. If he desires to buy English goods he has to pay freight and tariff in addition to original cost, which practically compels him to purchase from the American manufacturer at a much larger price than he would have to pay in an open market. Thus he is compelled to sell his produce in the cheapest market, because he competes with all the world, and to buy his supplies in the most expensive one, because competition is excluded. And it has only been that our farmers have been able to sustain themselves in this unequal contest by reason of their energy and industry and the natural fertility of our soil.

If the principle of protection is correct, then the Chinese were statesmen and philosophers when they built their wall to prevent communication with the world. Statutes levying taxes and imports just as effectually exclude the world's productions from our country as did the Chinese wall exclude them from China. Legal walls and statutory prohibitions are more powerful than walls of stone and mortar to keep out commerce.

We have heard much of the decadence of American shipping on the floor of this House, and had many touching appeals to our patriotism to relieve our shipping industries, to build up our Navy and our merchant marine, from the other side of this House, and yet when we have clearly pointed out to them the cause of this to be excessive tariff imports they affect not to believe it.

In the literary bureaus for the diffusion of high-tariff ideas, which we call Departments, among the many arguments printed for circulation at the expense of the Government I find the following statement from Mr. Consul Crawford in reference to the effects of the protective policy in Canada upon its shipping interest:

EFFECTS OF THE PROTECTIVE POLICY.

Previous to the adoption of the national policy Canada was almost entirely an agricultural country. The surplus capital sought an investment, and in this, as in all other countries, it sought that which would pay the greatest percentage of profits. In the absence of protection manufacturing industries offered no inducements. Manufactured goods were furnished by England and the United States at prices with which she could not compete.

The Dominion Government followed the example of England in regard to trade and also the policy of granting subsidies to aid in building up and maintaining her commerce. She held out such inducements to capital that the surplus wealth was largely invested in ships and shipping until she stands fourth in rank of commercial nations.

The adoption of the national protective policy in 1878 has had the tendency to turn capital into other channels. Under the fostering care of protection manufactures sprang up all over the Dominion, immense profits were realized, and the manufacturing industries are fast absorbing the surplus capital of the country and drawing large amounts from the outside world. The result of this can not be otherwise than (in spite of subsidies) the decline of her commerce; less numbers of vessels will be built, and the same complaint that is made in the United States will be heard.

The tonnage of vessels built, registered, and entered inwards and outwards, inclusive of coasting vessels, in 1883 is as follows: Tonnage built, 73,576; tonnage registered, 78,229; tonnage entered inwards and outwards, 13,770,735. The quantity of freight handled by the last-named vessels was 3,971,393 tons' weight, and number of crews, 537,668.

Of these vessels which entered the Dominion ports 2,680 bore the United States flag and 7,305 the British flag; 635 were Norwegian and Swedish, 46 were French, and the remainder, 10,781, were distributed among other nationalities. Number of sailing vessels 8,138, and of steamers 2,593.

The number of vessels employed in the coasting trade of Canada, as shown by the arrivals in port, is 38,244, of which 38,085 are British and 158 foreign.

The total tonnage is 8,056,736, and crews numbered 369,524. Of these vessels 17,782 were steamers and 20,462 sailing vessels.

Ships, old or new, sold to other countries numbered 44; tonnage, 23,896; value, $506,538.

From this statement it will be seen that in Canada as in this country like causes produce like effects. Up to 1878 Canada, small in population and wealth, had become fourth in the nations in the amount of her tonnage. Yet since she adopted a protective tariff, in 1878, she is rapidly losing her merchant marine, just as we under a revenue tariff had a merchant marine and a gallant navy. Now, after twenty years, we have no sailors and no ships to carry our merchandise, and no men-of-war to carry our admirals, commanders, and captains out to sea. We are only able to carry them on the pay-rolls of our naval establishment. We have also the pleasure of knowing that we have John Roach & Co.; that we have had a Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Robeson, and that some hundreds of millions of dollars have been appropriated to build war vessels with no results to show for it.

The President recommends a reduction in the revenues so that we may not take from the people more money than is necessary for governmental purposes. Gentlemen on the Republican side of the House propose to do this by increasing the protected features of the tariff and thus prevent importation of goods, which in effect may reduce the revenues of the Government, but will not reduce the burdens of taxation upon the people. It will simply add more of the people's money to the capital and profits of the protected industries. Some on this side of the House propose to repeal the internal-revenue laws; in effect to relieve the consumers of whisky and tobacco from taxes and place the burdens of supporting the Government upon woolens, iron, salt, coal, and all other necessaries of life. People can live without whisky or tobacco, but can not live without clothes, iron, tools, and something to eat.

We propose to reduce the revenue by reducing the revenues from the tariff one-fifth, thus reducing the burdens of the people upon the necessaries of life, thus reducing the cost of living to the great body of the people.

From the foregoing illustrations of its workings I conclude that a protective tariff is not for the general welfare of the United States; that it is not a tax laid for a public purpose, and is therefore unconstitutional.

Mr. NEECE. Mr. Chairman, we are confronted with the Treasury of the United States filled to the overflowing. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury April 30, 1884, shows a surplus of $152,652,973.75. We see by reference to the Bureau of Statistics that there has been a gradual increase in the Treasury for the last nine months, and at the same time there has been a rapid payment of the public debt. The decrease of the public debt since June 30, 1883, is $65,007,487.62. The payment of the public debt in the month of April just passed was $11,958,003.94.

Notwithstanding this rapid payment of the public debt, we see the rapid increase in the Treasury. Where does this money come from? There is but one answer: it comes from taxes collected by the various modes of the Government, which are paid by the people of the United States, not in proportion to what each tax-payer is worth, but upon what each person consumes. The family that is worth comparatively nothing, if provided with the comforts of life, pays as much of this tax in actual dollars and cents as the family who are worth their thousands. We are told by the opponents of the Morrison bill that the present rate of high taxation must be kept up in order to protect the poor—to protect labor, as they put it—a very good thing if true, the truth of which is not sustained by the facts and circumstances, which I shall notice further on.

First, as to the necessity of the present high rate of taxation. It is an admitted fact by all that there is more money in the Treasury than is needed for the wants of the Government. No one denies that proposition. No one denies the fact that at the present rate of taxation money will continue to flow into the Treasury faster than is or will be needed for the legitimate wants of the Government. I have before me the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury of the amount of money necessary to run the Government for the fiscal year 1885. The Secretary is a very modest gentleman, but I never heard of an instance where the estimated receipts were too high or the expenditures too low. It has been the custom of both Republican and Democratic Congresses to make the appropriations considerably under these estimates. Here is the report:

The Secretary of the Treasury in his estimate of receipts for 1885 places them at $343,000,000 and the expenditures at $283,125,304.93, including the sinking fund, or an estimated surplus of $59,874,695.05. Excluding the sinking fund the estimated expenditures will be $236,855,548, showing a surplus of $106,144,452. Assuming that Congress will continue to comply with the law in relation to the sinking fund, we will be collecting from taxation $59,874,695.05 more than it is estimated we need for the Government. The revenues of this fiscal year are thus estimated on the basis of existing laws by the Secretary of the Treasury:

From customs	$195,000,000
From internal-revenue	120,000,000
From sales of public lands	8,000,000
From tax on circulation of national banks	3,000,000
From repayment of interest and sinking fund, Pacific railway companies	2,000,000
From customs fees, fines, penalties, &c	1,200,000
From fees—consular, letters patent, and lands	3,300,000
From proceeds of sales of Government property	300,000
From profits on coinage, &c	4,000,000
From deposits for surveying public lands	500,000
From revenues of the District of Columbia	1,900,000
From miscellaneous sources	3,800,000
Total estimated ordinary receipts	343,000,000

It appears that from customs we will get $195,000,000; from internal-revenue, $120,000,000; from both, $315,000,000; and from all other sources, $28,000,000.

Making the usual deductions that both Republican and Democratic Congresses have heretofore made, we will have for the year 1885 a surplus in the Treasury of at least $100,000,000 over and above what is needed or required for the legitimate needs of the Government. Say that we appropriate every dollar that is asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury and the various Departments of the Government, yet we have the enormous sum of $59,874,695.05 of the people's money, taken from them against their consent, placed out of circulation, not needed by the Government for any legitimate purpose, locked up in the Treasury, or supposed to be.

How are we to justify the continuance of this large surplus in the Treasury with the certainty before our eyes that the surplus is to increase month after month and year after year? To my mind it is a dangerous state of affairs, both as to the moral and financial condition of the country, if this drain upon the people's money is allowed to continue. A scarcity of money among the people is inevitable. "The stream though small will exhaust the fountain, although it be ever so large." The danger to the moral condition of the country is in the enormous amount of money in the Treasury idle. It is a great inducement to misapplication, extravagance upon the part of those who have the management of the Government under their control. Lavish appropriations will be asked for and granted, simply because the money is in the Treasury idle. Appropriations will be made for hundreds of things that ought not to be, simply in order to get the money out of the Treasury. The people's money will be spent with a lavish hand.

And lastly, the great inducement to theft and fraud, for which it seems from recent experience the Government has no remedy in court. The remedies in recent cases have proven to be worse than the disease. Now, if this money could be applied to the payment of the public debt or appropriated for any legitimate purpose for which the interest of the whole people could be benefited I would say "amen." But to maintain a higher rate of taxation than is required for the purpose of raising necessary revenue for the legitimate wants of the Government in my judgment is a crime. The theory that by law you can or ought to take the earnings of one person and without compensation or his consent transfer it to another can not be upheld upon any principle of right or justice. It violates every principle of equity.

Here is the theory (the Ohio theory): a man of means not desiring to go into the more active pursuits invests his money in cheap lands, hillsides, and valleys, and having heard the oft-repeated false theory that sheep will live upon brush and without other food, without labor, and return to the owner a large profit upon his investment, he invests largely in sheep, to learn in a short time that sheep-raising, like other industries, in order to make it profitable requires skill, perseverance, and close attention. Instead of adopting skill and energy like the farmer that raises horses, cattle, hogs, and grain to sell in the markets of the world without any protection only such as the laws of supply and demand afford him, he appeals to Congress to make good his mistake in his attempted speculation. Finding Congress not a very ready listener to his wants, he then appeals to the ring of protectionists to allow him to become one of protection's most exalted members. And after receiving his first lesson he returns and says: "I ask protection in the name of labor. We wool-growers in Ohio must have protection against the pauper laborers of England. You farmers who raise cattle, swine, and grain, and send it broadcast into the world to find a market without any protection, after contributing your mite to save us, can do the best you can for yourselves; the small pittance we exact off of you is very small to make our bad speculation good."

For this we propose to deliver our votes to protect other monopolies, and they are to give us protection, all to be an additional burden upon the other unprotected industries of the United States, and to bear most heavily upon the very class in whose name we received the donation, because at last the increased price, if any, is paid by the consumer. The laborer who clothes his family and himself pays it all at last with interest, and those who wear the cheaper grade of clothing pay more than those who wear the better grade. Examining the schedules, you will see that the tax on the coarse grades of woolen goods are much higher in proportion than the finer grades.

I am in favor of a tariff for revenue; that far have we a right to go, and no farther. I would be opposed to disturbing the present tariff if it was not so apparent that the revenues were so greatly in excess of the necessities of the Government. Such is the fact, and we must meet it. Let us do our duty. Certainly we ought not to be afraid to do our duty, and in the discharge of our duty patriotism ought to be greater than avarice. Selfishness ought not to overbalance our judgment, but in the adjustment of the tariff after determining the amount of money necessary to be raised it ought to be so adjusted as to give the greatest possible protection to labor, and to encourage the investment of capital in manufactories and other industries.

A tariff beyond the requirements of the Government in many instances acts as a prohibition to commerce and, in fact, destroys commerce, breaks down the industries of the country, and instead of protecting labor it impoverishes and robs it. Take, for instance, the present protective tariff made for the necessities of war, but continued nineteen years in peace, and what has been the effect upon our commerce, upon our shipping interests? The Stars and Stripes have ceased to be a common thing upon the high seas, our merchant marine has been compelled to give way to the ships of foreign nations; our sailors and seamen have been driven into the mines and shops, thereby destroying one of the greatest industries in the world, instead of having hundreds of thousands of our people happily employed in the shipping business, who would have been proud to protect the American commerce and make it respected among the nations of the earth.

We have taken a different course; we have killed the goose to get the golden egg. Our carrying trade upon the seas has been transferred to foreigners. Year by year has our commerce been withering, until to-day it is a thing of the past. Here is a table:

Among the details furnished by the report from the Bureau of Statistics upon the commerce and navigation of the United States for 1883 are those relating to the ship-building of the country.

The comparison made by this showing with that of other years is presented in the following table. It gives the total number and tonnage of vessels of all classes, both sail and steam, built in the United States in the years stated:

Year.	Number.	Tonnage.
1874	2,147	432,725
1875	1,301	297,638
1876	1,112	203,585
1877	1,029	176,591
1878	1,258	235,503
1879	1,132	193,030
1880	902	157,409

The whole number of iron vessels built in the United States in 1883 was thirty-five, of which only one was a sailing vessel. These were nearly all built at the yards along the Delaware—twenty-three at Philadelphia and Chester, eight at Wilmington—the others coming, one from Baltimore, one from Buffalo, and two from New York.

This table makes a stronger argument than I can make. It shows a gradual decrease in the number of our ships, a fearful shrinkage in their tonnage capacity; and, Mr. Chairman, a gradual diminution of merchant marine can be traced by the statistics from 1866 to the present time. Is not this the result of protection? If not, then some gentleman please explain, for there is something fearfully wrong somewhere. Our carrying trade on the high seas is dead. I charge it to be the legitimate effect of the protective tariff. No American wishes to go into the carrying business upon the seas, for the reason that our commerce among foreign nations is destroyed. He may load his ship in the harbor at Baltimore or Philadelphia and deliver it at London and the cargo may be sold for a reasonable price, no tariff being charged or exacted by the British Government. How is it with his cargo that he gets in London to return? When he reaches his home he finds his cargo is taxed, if it be woolen goods, all the way from 40 to over 100 per cent.

This great difference of the tariff between the two nations works greatly to our disadvantage. The American ship must return home empty or else bring a load of unprofitable merchandise. The Englishman living in London can load his ship with the goods and wares of his country, deliver them in Canada, and dispose of his cargo free of tariff, drop his ship down to Boston or New York, and there take on a cargo of our grain or pork, and return home carrying an untaxed cargo each way. To my mind it is no wonder we have no merchant marine, notwithstanding we have more natural advantages for ship-building and ship-owning than any nation on the face of the earth. We have more educated mechanics, more material necessary for ship-building. We have the timber, iron, copper, and coal, and can feed our mechanics cheaper and better than any country under the sun.

Why not go upon the high seas and compete with all the nations of the earth for this carrying trade? Why not have hundreds of thousands of our people engaged in this industry? It is because our men of capital have invested in manufactories, and instead of depending on their energies, skill, and science in their business, they have hired lobbies, and from year to year hang around the halls of Congress to get legislation so that they can enrich themselves at the expense of their customers, and they can not help themselves, and all this they ask in the name of labor—a cheat and deception. Look at the persons operating coal-mines in Pennsylvania importing foreign labor to operate their mines in order to force down the labor of their own citizens.

Look at the glass manufacturers in Ohio importing foreign labor in order to break down the wages of their own citizens. Look at the nail manufacturers in the United States combined as one body, and when it is necessary in order not to have a surplus that will affect the market one institution is ordered to stop operation, the employés are discharged or suspended without pay, while the owner receives his regular profits as though his mill was running. They point how anxious they are to protect labor; everything is done in the name of labor; yet the money or bounty pretended to be given to labor must first pass through the hands of the persons who control these institutions, and of the magnificent bounties bestowed to labor they pay to the laborers just that portion that the monopolists do not want. If we are to keep up this high rate of taxation for the benefit of labor, let us change the laws so that the money will go direct to the laborer. Let us not have any humbuggery about it, no middlemen, no guardians without security to handle the bounty for the laborer; he is competent to handle it for himself; if it is his, give it to him, not to a trustee.

Let us see how this tariff is adjusted. Is there a laborer or his employer in the State of Illinois who derives any benefit from the present tariff? We have manufacturers of agricultural implements who use iron and steel in their business, all of which is made dearer by the operation of the tariff. They use lumber of various kinds made higher by the operation of the tariff. The clothes upon the backs of every mechanic, laborer, and their families are made dearer by the operation of the tariff. If he is a manufacturer of wagons the pine lumber necessary for the wagon is taxed from two to three dollars per thousand. The article, whether it be a plow or a wagon, is increased in price by the operation of the tariff. This increase of price—does it benefit the mechanic or laborer whose labor produced the article? Not one cent.

The increased cost in producing the article is placed upon the article when it is put upon the market. The consumer has it to pay in the end, and the article being unavoidably high the consumer economizes all he can, often refraining from purchasing when it is necessary for him to do so, on account of the cost, greatly to the disadvantage of the manufacturer, mechanic, laborer, and purchaser, whose interests are identical, for when the farmer who purchases these farm utensils flourishes the manufacturer reaps a portion of the benefit in increased sales, at fair prices, and in return the mechanic reaps his share of the benefit by the increased demand for his labor. Then whatever prospers agriculture in our country redounds to the benefit of both manufacturer, mechanic, and laborer.

When the farmer is prosperous, then the merchant, mechanic, laborer, and professional man are prosperous, and whatever depresses agriculture injures every person, let his avocation be what it may. We are one people in interest; the law should be made for the benefit of all; it should have its foundation in justice; it ought not to be made for the benefit of one class to the injury of another; the earnings of one class ought not to be taken for the benefit of another without just compensation. The laws ought not to be so adjusted that any one class would have to bear all the burdens of the Government, but each person should pay tax to support the Government in accordance with his ability to pay; no selfish motive should influence our action; every citizen ought to feel that he is to enjoy equal rights under the law.

This bill is not bound to pass in its present shape; you can amend it to your satisfaction; but there is no sincerity in complaining of this bill and at the same time neglecting to offer a better one.

Let us see how the present tariff affects the people of my State, who are largely engaged in farming. Do the farmers of Illinois get any benefit from overtaxation, or what you style protection? Do the laborers on the farm, who to-day are working for less wages than any other class, get any benefit from this system? I think not. Here is a table furnished by the Bureau of Statistics:

The proportions of exports by classes of industry for the past two years are as follows:

Products of—	1882.		1883.
	Value.	Per cent. of total.	Value.	Per cent. of total.
Agriculture	$552,219,819	75.31	$619,269,449	77.00
Manufactures	103,132,481	14.07	111,890,001	13.91
Mining (including mineral oils)	56,278,887	7.67	51,444,857	6.40
Forestry	9,138,934	1.25	9,976,143	1.24
The fisheries	6,197,752	.85	6,276,375	.78
All other commodities	6,271,859	.85	5,366,807	.67
Total	733,239,732	100.00	804,223,632	100.00

This table shows that we exported from the United States during the year 1883, $804,223,632, and that 77 per cent. of that amount was the product of agriculture. This product is shipped abroad to find a market. It is sold in the markets of the world without protection for the best price the owner can get; that is not all, the foreign market determines the price at home. The census of 1880 shows that 43.7 per cent. of the persons engaged in labor in Illinois are agriculturists, while in Pennsylvania only 30.7 of the labor of that State are agriculturists; in Maine only 20.4 are agriculturists. Neither of the two last States import scarcely anything; in Maine—the late census shows that Maine in the year 1880 raised substantially 8,000,000 bushels of potatoes; she finds a home market for her potatoes; there is a tax on potatoes of 15 cents a bushel, which has an effect of keeping the Canadian out of the markets of Boston and New York; the Maine man is protected against the Illinois farmer by 1,500 miles of railroad, while the Wisconsin lumber-dealer is protected from $2 to $3 per 1,000 against the Canadian, although he, with impunity, hires the Canadian to chop his logs and raft them—no tax on hiring Canadians to come into this country to work. Louisiana is protected on her sugar; the New England States upon their woolen manufactures; Pennsylvania upon her iron production; Illinois is by the present tariff compelled to purchase of all of those protected States and submit to the enhanced price, although she could purchase cheaper elsewhere if permitted, while she is compelled to ship her products, as the above table shows, to foreign countries to find a market. Just in proportion as the above table shows that the agriculturist has been compelled to go to foreign markets with her product, just in that proportion is she and all the mechanics and laborers depending upon agriculture for employment cheated by the present tariff. Agriculture forced into foreign markets with 77 per cent. of her products, while manufacturers only have to export 13.91 per cent. of their products; and all the manufacturers of the Western States who export their products are cheated in the same proportion as the farmer. We have given away millions of acres of our pineries, and now we are taxing the farmers of Illinois to give the recipients of the great donations already bestowed upon them additional bounties. To-day we are giving away the public lands to encourage timber-raising, and at the same time paying a bounty to destroy the forests of this country.

What will be the result if this bill is defeated? The revenues must be reduced—every one knows that. The next move upon the part of the protectionists is to repeal the tax upon whisky and tobacco; there is no disguising their design. They seem to prefer cheap whisky and dear sugar. The proposition is to keep the tax up upon the necessaries of life, upon the articles which the poor are compelled to have, and to reduce it upon luxuries. This is a struggle to take the tax off of whisky and place it upon the clothing and other necessaries of life. I prefer to let the tax remain upon whisky and reduce it upon the clothing that rich and poor are compelled to have.

The following extract is taken from a document issued by the representatives of the Louisiana protected industries, and dated New Orleans, March 12, 1884, and I suppose a copy has been furnished every member upon this floor. It seems that Judge Taylor was sent by that society to look after the sugar interests. Here is the extract taken from that document:

We urged upon them the absolute necessity, as we understood it, of combination. They answered this argument by saying that the question of putting sugar on the free-list was a mere question of time, and that they would advise the Louisiana planters to prepare for it and go into some other business.

We saw many members of Congress from different sections of the country, belonging to both political parties, and the expression of opinion by those who are called protectionists in regard to Louisiana interests was this: that Louisiana was knocking at the doors of Congress for protection for one industry, but she was averse to giving protection to other industries; that it was nonsense to talk about protecting sugar if the manufactures and other industries of the United States were not protected.

Mr. KELLEY said he was looked upon as the father of the protection movement, and that he was in favor of protecting sugar and would stand by it as long as he could; but that if Louisiana Representatives voted to place everything else either on the reduced list of tariff duties or the free-list, that so far as he was concerned, if it became necessary, he was willing to sacrifice sugar. He said an argument could be made against sugar which was more taking with the people of the North than that in regard to any other article, because sugar went into the mouth of every man, woman, and child. He further stated that by combination the passage of the Morrison bill could be prevented, and that it would result in the adoption of some policy by which the industries of the whole Union could be protected.

We found it very difficult to get members to talk on the tariff question and this Morrison bill. There were some people who appeared willing to give us a bounty. We said we did not wish a bounty, but desired to be placed on the same basis as other industries which were protected.

This extract shows the means by which votes are to be secured to defeat the Morrison bill.

I will publish with my remarks a letter I have received from a lumber company signed by themselves and their attorney, which shows that they regard it necessary to employ an attorney to look after their interests before Congress, and it also shows how small they regard 10 per cent. when taken out of the pockets of the consumer, but what a tremendous large thing it is when it is to be omitted from the bounties taken from the consumer and transferred to them without consideration:

TONAWANDA, N. Y., March 11, 1884.

DEAR SIR: We notice the progress of the Morrison tariff bill in Congress, and observe that lumber is therein placed upon the free-list. As business men, and in a position to know thoroughly whereof we speak, we beg to bring to your careful consideration several reasons why the bill in its present shape, as regards lumber, should not pass:

First. Everything necessary to produce lumber in Canada is at least 25 per cent. cheaper than in the United States.

Second. Three hundred million dollars and 1,000,000 men are engaged in the business, and a tariff reduction if made would be a direct blow at both the labor and capital therein represented.

Third. The average value of lumber to the consumer may be placed at, say, $20 per thousand. The present duty of $2 per thousand is therefore only 10 per cent., and probably nine-tenths of the people who use lumber are people above the laboring classes; the duty is not in any sense a burden upon the community.

Fourth. The Canadian lumber mills being situated nearer the Eastern States than the mills of the producing pine regions of the United States they have an advantage in the item of freights of at least one-half of the present duty, and if such duty was removed it would give to the Canadians control of the markets of the Eastern States, whither their product is most largely imported, so that the present rate of duty is absolutely necessary in order that Western pine lumber may be shipped to Eastern markets.

Fifth. Careful estimates by practical lumbermen show that there is enough standing timber in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin to last fifty years, thus showing the Government's Foresty Bulletins to be entirely erroneous.

Sixth. There can not possibly be any scarcity of lumber for a century after every tree has been cut in Michigan and Wisconsin, for the reason that there are larger tracts of yellow pine in the Southern States than ever existed of white pine in the Northern States. This can all be used where white pine is now used, and the duty on lumber should be retained, so that the Southern States may have the benefit of Northern capital to develop this vast industry, which will not be done for years if Canadian lumber is admitted free.

Seventh. Consider the difference it will make to the States having these large tracts of yellow pine—Mississippi, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, and North and South Carolina—whether they are developed or left comparatively untouched, as they certainly will be for years if Canadian lumber comes in free of duty.

We certainly hope you will use your influence and vote to prevent the consummation of such a glaring injustice to this large industry, as would be involved in the removal of the present lumber tariff.

Very truly, yours,

GRATWICK, SMITH & FRYER LUMBER CO.
ERASTUS CORNING, Attorney.

Hon. WILLIAM H. NEECE,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, it is difficult if not impossible to say anything new upon the tariff. The first law enacted upon the subject in this country was in the year 1789, immediately after the ratification of the Constitution, and during the ninety-five succeeding years the tariff has been in American politics and policy a great economic question, and the most fruitful theme for learned essays and eloquent discourses. The collection and disbursement of its revenues are the most complicated, difficult, and dangerous functions which this or any other government has to perform.

Difficult, in laying taxes and duties fairly and honestly so that there shall be no unjust discriminations or exactions upon persons or classes; complicated, because many things in conflict require careful consideration to produce harmonious action; and dangerous, because nothing begets greater distrust or sooner destroys the confidence of the citizen in the Government than to feel that he is compelled to contribute unduly to its support, or that when the exactions are just and reasonable his contribution is diverted from the purposes for which he paid it into the Treasury and stolen or converted into a jobbery fund, or applied to some purpose foreign to that for which the Government was ordained and established. No people ever felt more keenly or suffered more flagrant outrages of this character than the white people, the property-owners of my own and other Southern States, during the carpet-bag and negro domination of the reconstruction era.

The spoliation was complete. They stole everything that could be transported and mortgaged the immovables. The people have not forgotten the misgovernment which robbed them then through State action, upheld by Federal bayonets.

The patience and submissiveness with which the people of the United States have endured the inequalities and iniquities of the tariff and internal-revenue laws is marvelous, and proves, if proof were wanting, the patriotism and self-sacrificing disposition of the worst abused and least complaining—the agricultural class—of our population. But, sir, it is not my purpose to enter upon a general discussion of the question, nor to present in detail the various arguments pertaining to it. I shall content myself at this time with a simple statement of facts and conclusions.

It is unnecessary to have recourse to the history of tariff legislation and discussion abroad. All the learning upon the subject throughout the world has at some time in our history been brought forward and utilized in the debates of this House or the other end of the Capitol; and much that is useful, but more that is confusing and mischievous, has gone to the country. I shall not invoke precedents from other countries, since we have a sufficiency in our own, and for the better reason also that the Government of the United States is different from every other in the world, differently situated and surrounded, which modifies the force of foreign precedents and renders them unimportant except as mere abstract information. I shall not present tables of statistics to encumber the RECORD and fill out to respectable length what I may not be able otherwise to say. Figures tell the truth if they do not lie; and statistics, like speculative science, yield a larger dividend to the amount of capital invested than any other enterprise known to mortals.

The taxing or revenue power of the United States is found in section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, which declares that—

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

"Imposts and excises" are the two sources from which the Government derives the bulk of its revenues. From imposts or tariff duties, under the existing law, there will be paid into the Treasury during the present fiscal year about $200,000,000.

From excises or internal-revenue taxes the Treasury will receive during the same period something over one hundred millions. These amounts, with the income from the Post-Office, sale of public lands, and other sources, will, after defraying the current expenses of the Government, including the large appropriation for pensions, leave in the Treasury a surplus annually of from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000. Now, what shall be done with this redundant revenue? There are three ways in which we can dispose of it:

1. We can spend it. But this leads to profligate, extravagant, and perhaps corrupt or unconstitutional and mischievous legislation.

2. We can pay it on the national debt. That is better, but difficulties are there encountered. Only about $254,000,000 of the bonds of the Government, bearing 3 per cent. interest, are now subject to call on thirty days' previous notice. When these are paid the next class to mature are the 4½ per cents, September 1, 1891, by which time a more than sufficient surplus will have accumulated to discharge the whole $250,000,000 of that class. And the only remaining class of bonds then would be the 4 per cent. consuls, which are not payable until the year 1907.

The best economy for States and individuals is to stop the running of interest against them. Millions of dollars would thereby be saved to the people. Interest is the great factor in the solution of financial problems. The stream, though small, will in time exhaust the capacious reservoir at its source, while the receptacle of its accumulated flow will float a palace of wealth.

But there is another side to the question of immediate extinguishment of the public debt. The people of this generation have borne burdens enough. Henceforth lift from their shoulders every burden possible. They will leave to those who succeed them the most magnificent and the wealthiest country in the world, with all the blessings that man in this life is capable of enjoying.

Mr. Chairman, I shall during my service here on all occasions when an opportunity is presented cast my vote to relieve the people of every tax or other burden now imposed upon them beyond the requirements of an economical administration of the Government.

The operation of the sinking fund, and the probable surplus in any event, will gradually extinguish the public debt without imposing greater burdens upon the overtaxed people. The Republican party of Pennsylvania and elsewhere, including, in newspaper phrase, "the Plumed Knight of Maine," advocate the distribution of the surplus among the States. This is inexpedient and expensive, if not impracticable and unconstitutional. But little or none of it would ever be returned to the pockets of the people from whom it was drawn. In the language of Andrew Jaekson in his last annual message I say that—

> The safest and simplest mode of obviating all the difficulties which have been mentioned is to collect only revenue enough to meet the wants of the Government and let the people keep the balance of their proporty in their hands to be used for their own benefit.

Thus we see from every consideration that the true measure of justice to the people is to reduce taxation until that point is reached to which the absolute necessities of the Government fix a limit.

All the Democrats upon this floor, Mr. Chairman, if I am not egregiously mistaken, are in favor of reducing taxation. If I am misinformed—if there be a Democrat here who is opposed to a reduction of taxation, let him put on whatever manhood he possesses and rise in his place now and speak out and let the country as well as the members of this House know who he is; and the places which know him now will after November next know him no more forever.

All, I am happy to know, are in favor of reducing taxation; but just here a divergence begins. Just here, unhappily, begins another trouble. How shall that reduction be made? Reduction! All agreed; but how, when, and where divide us.

The Pennsylvania Democrats, and in fact all who favor the protective policy, advocate the abolition of the internal-revenue system and oppose agitation of the tariff at this time. The abolition of that system would unquestionably relieve against a redundant revenue, and would probably create a deficiency. That system was not too severely characterized by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] when he called it "an infernal system," and the people of the country would rejoice to see it wiped out, and the army of political spies and informers, who have grown fat on official plunder, disbanded and sent to honest vocations for a livelihood. The excise is now collected, I believe, but from three articles—distilled spirits, tobacco, and bank circulation.

The people, with some few exceptions, care nothing about the repeal of these taxes. There has always been discrimination against liquors and tobacco. Nearly or quite all the States thus discriminate in their license laws. I do not believe that the people of Alabama object to the taxes on liquors and tobacco provided the same were collected by some more simple and less offensive method. These are in their nature luxuries, and bad luxuries at best. I would not deny to the people the use of either, for I am opposed to sumptuary laws and believe in allowing the largest possible liberty to the citizen. But who would not prefer that his whisky be taxed rather than his salt? The one is a luxury, the other a necessity. No farmer, merchant, mechanic, or laborer can hesitate to choose between a reduction of taxation upon his food, his clothing, and implements of industry on the one hand, and upon his whisky and tobacco on the other.

It is proposed, however, as a measure of compromise to amend the Morrison bill so as to reduce the tax on tobacco in the same ratio that that bill reduces impost duties, and to fix the duty on fruit brandies at 10 cents per gallon.

My views as to what tariff legislation should be had at the present session were well matured and made known to many before the organization of this House. An evil far greater than a redundancy of revenue cries aloud for remedy.

The shockingly outrageous and unjust monopolies maintained for twenty years will remain, modified, but not eradicated, by the passage of the bill now under consideration. I believed then, and have seen no cause to change my opinion, that the Ways and Means Committee should have gone to work upon a thorough revision of all the tariff schedules, reducing the tariff on some articles 10, 20, 50, or 100 per cent., leaving others at existing rates, and ultimately fixing the duty on all articles upon which the tariff is to operate at the difference in the cost of production of like articles in this country and those manufactured abroad. Had it required this entire session to have perfected such a bill; if it had merely been printed and gone to the Calendar at adjournment, the Democratic party could have gone to the country upon a broader issue and more united than I fear they will upon this great business question.

I trust that the wisdom of the party, when by its representatives assembled at Chicago, will present it thus broadly, though I would not be understood to insinuate that it overshadows in importance all other questions for that body to consider. My opinion, sir, is that the rate of duty in no case can, with justice to the consumer and a fair regard to the producer, be laid at a higher rate than the difference in the cost of production. If manufacturing will not pay when the manufacturer in this country finishes his goods at the same cost that the Englishman does with the advantage to the American of the intervention of an ocean 3,000 miles wide, then it had better be abandoned, for this Government can not afford to continue the perpetration of the great wrong of taxing one class of its citizens for the benefit of another, however desirable it may be that the business of the latter may be firmly established and prosperous. This Government must be fair to all classes of the people to insure their confidence and affection.

American labor and capital must be content with this. Revenue would be under such a tariff the primary and incidental and protection the secondary object. Revenue is constitutionally the primary object of all tariff legislation. But that Congress may also constitutionally make that protection to American industries which necessarily results from and is incidental to the duties laid, an object of no small moment, there can be no doubt. The best advocates of constitutional legislation in this country admitted and utilized it. Mr. Madison said in regard to the enactment of the first tariff law that—

> The States that are most advanced in population and ripe for manufactures ought to have their particular interests attended to in some degree. While these States retained the power of making regulations of trade, they had the power to protect and cherish such institutions. By adopting the present Constitution they have thrown the exercise of this power into other hands. They must have done this with an expectation that those interests would not be neglected here.

But further than I have indicated, further than incidental protection, Congress has no constitutional nor moral right to go. Beyond this the Government fails to get its revenue, because the duties are laid at so high a rate that foreign goods can not pay it. This gives to the home manufacturer a monopoly until he is reduced in prices by home competition, which then too often results in overproduction, the market is ultimately glutted, wages of the operatives are reduced, strikes ensue, the mills stop, and discontent, lawlessness, and communism are the results which illustrate the beneficence of protection for protection's sake.

The other dark side of it is that all the people not thus protected (until relief comes from competition, which requires time, frequently beyond one generation) are coerced into contributing to the enrichment of the protected. All protection, no matter how beneficent in its results it may ultimately prove to be, beyond that which is incidental to or logically results from a tariff for revenue is but legalized robbery. It deserves no milder designation. I am borne out in this assertion by Robert J. Walker, a man whose acquaintance with this subject was quite equal to that of any gentleman on this floor. Mr. Walker says:

> If the marshal were sent by the Federal Government to collect a direct tax from the whole people to be paid over to manufacturing capitalists to enable them to sustain their business or realize a larger profit, it would be the same in effect as the protective duty, which, when analyzed into its simplest elements and reduced to actual results, is a mere subtraction of so much money from the people to increase the resources of the protected property.

The argument of protectionists that exclusive or prohibitory protection cheapens the goods in consequence of home competition has borne and will continue to bear its legitimate fruits. Its tendency is not only to overproduction, failures, and disturbances, but to build a Chinese wall around us and cut off from us all foreign commerce. The United States consume but one-third of the cotton they raise. The other two-thirds go abroad, and the price of it in this country is regulated by the Liverpool market.

There were over 100,000,000 bushels surplus of wheat produced in the United States last year, and this, with the surplus of beef, hog, and other products, can not find a home market. They must go abroad to command remunerative prices. Under this policy of high protection and exclusiveness nothing but bullion or gold coin can be exchanged for the surplus products of the farmers and husbandmen of this country, instead of merchandise, and every one knows who has information or capacity to reason that a less price is realized.

Mr. Chairman, while the Morrison bill in my judgment is not the tariff bill upon which I desired to see the Democratic party go to the country—for it does not revise—it removes none of the inequalities, monopolies, and great wrongs of the existing law; nevertheless it has merit. It provides for free lumber, free coal, and free salt, and I regret to say halts too soon in the enlargement of the free-list. I am not, however, a free-trader, and no one can be unless he is also an advocate of direct taxation. Nor am I in favor of "a tariff for revenue only," since that is impossible unless the duties be laid upon coffee, tea, and such articles only as are not produced in this country. But the Morrison bill offers some relief to the people. It cuts down horizontally about 20 per cent. the duties now existing. This brings them down to the recommendation of the Republican Tariff Commission, and would be enough to commend the bill to the favor of the other side of this Chamber if cheek had not already usurped the place of estoppel in their code of political ethics.

But, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the difference of opinion between myself and the committee, an all-sufficient reason why I shall give the bill my cordial support is that a large majority of my party, in free conference, agreed to support it, and as a true party man I will upon all questions of expediency subordinate my own views to the concurrent opinion of my party friends. I am ready to vote for the bill.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. OATES. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BAGLEY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. OATES (at 11 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 6, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a petition of Henry O. Watrous Post, No. 93, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Wisconsin, located at Spencer, Wis., praying for the enactment of such legislation in regard to pensioning ex-Union soldiers as is recommended by the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of Stephen Bird, of Missouri, executor of the estate of John Bird, deceased, praying that the claim of such estate against the Government of the United States as set forth in the petition be referred to the Court of Claims under the act known as the Bowman act, approved March 3, 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of Dr. P. W. Bradbury, of Saint Louis, Mo., praying for a pension. Heretofore a petition was presented on the same subject, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and reported adversely. I ask now, as this is a petition for a review, with new evidence, that the action of the Senate in agreeing to the adverse report and discharging the committee may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At what date was the report made?

Mr. COCKRELL. It was not put on the Calendar because there was no bill accompanying it, and I have not the date. If the date is material I will let it pass over until I send and get a copy of the adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the vote of the Senate taken hitherto agreeing to an adverse report of the Committee on Pensions on a petition of Dr. P. W. Bradbury, of Saint Louis, Mo., for a pension, be reconsidered, he proposing to present a new petition and additional evidence. Is there objection to the reconsideration? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Missouri will present the petition.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of Dr. P. W. Bradbury, of Saint Louis, praying for a pension, with sundry evidence. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions, and that the papers in the former case be taken from the files of the Secretary and recommitted to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition and the accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Pensions, and if there be no objection it will be ordered that the papers on file relating to the same case be withdrawn from the files and recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAYARD presented resolutions adopted by the Wilmington (Del.) Board of Trade, indorsing the memorial of the Stock Exchange of the city of New York in favor of the suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar and remonstrating against the cessation of the issue of notes of a denomination less than $5; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of the Women's Silk-Culture Association of the United States, in favor of the passage of Senate bill No. 2002, providing for the creation of a silk-culture bureau and the establishment of silk-culture stations throughout the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the legal representative of Thomas Blackwell, late of Union County, Kentucky, praying relief from the faulty and inadequate execution of the act of Congress heretofore passed for the relief of Thomas Blackwell; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. CAMDEN presented the petition of Dr. M. J. Rhees and 100 others, citizens of Wheeling, W. Va., praying for such legislation as will prevent discrimination against any school of medicine in appointments to Government service; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. DOLPH presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying for an appropriation for the survey of the bar at the entrance of the Nehalem River, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of George Wright Post, No. 1, Department of Oregon, Grand Army of the Republic, Portland, Oreg., praying for certain legislation in favor of ex-Union soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of the Women's Silk-Culture Association of the United States, in favor of the passage of Senate bill No. 2002, providing for the creation of a silk-culture bureau and the establishment of silk-culture stations throughout the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the memorial of Albert H. Overman, an inventor of Connecticut, and the memorial of J. C. Parker & Co., and A. G. Dewey & Co., of Quechee, Vt., remonstrating against the repeal or hostile modification of the present patent laws; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MCPHERSON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 562) for the relief of Orville Horwitz, trustee for C. D. De Ford & Co., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 993) for the relief of Maria G. Dunbar, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the resolutions of the Chicago Board of Trade, adopted April 22, 1884, indorsing the report of the special committee of the Chamber of Commerce of New York State in reference to international bills of lading and proposing an amendment to the measure suggested, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1377) granting a pension to Jeremiah P. Swatzell, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred resolutions of the Merchants' Exchange of Buffalo, N. Y., urging that a sufficient appropriation be made for the support of the Signal Service, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 6092) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 862) for the relief of Uriel Crocker, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred a letter in the shape of a petition of citizens of Nashua, N. H., addressed to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], in regard to the appropriation for the support of the militia, and asking for the passage of House bill No. 5057, have instructed me to report the same back to the Senate and to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, as the Senate has already taken action upon that subject.

The report was agreed to, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the paper.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 245) authorizing the loan of certain flags to the Portland Soldiers and Sailors' Monument Association, to report it back, and to request the Senate to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of this joint resolution, and to refer it to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as it directs the Secretary of the Navy to loan these flags.

The committee were discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution, and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2075) granting condemned cannon to the Women's Soldiers' Monument Association of Lansing, Mich., have instructed me to report the same back to the Senate adversely, and to recommend that it be indefinitely postponed, based upon the action and reports in former cases.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 355) to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces, have instructed me to report the same back to the Senate with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting therefor what follows.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to state that in the action of the committee on the report just made I was not able to concur. I simply desire that fact noted, so that I may hereafter, if I believe it to be my duty, oppose the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 365) for the relief of certain officers of the Army, to report the same back to the Senate adversely, as the provisions of this bill are fully covered by the bill just reported, and to recommend that it be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL. The same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 370) to pay certain officers of the Army for services actually rendered during the late war, have also directed me to report the same adversely, and to recommend that it be indefinitely postponed, as the provisions of the House bill No. 355, just reported, as amended, embrace all the classes that ought to be provided for.

The report was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2076) to donate condemned cast-iron cannon and cannon-balls to Post 41, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, for monumental purposes, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1866) granting a pension to John T. Rudy, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1363) granting a pension to Frank S. Hillard, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 475) granting arrears of pension to Emily Agnel, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1609) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Detroit, Mich., reported it with amendments.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1586) for the relief of the surviving members of Company G, First United States Artillery, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

ESTATE OF JOHN W. DEAR.

Mr. MAXEY. By direction of the Committee on Military Affairs I ask that the action of the Senate in agreeing to the adverse report on the bill (S. 644) for the relief of the administrator of the estate of John W. Dear, deceased, be reconsidered. The 15th day of February is the date of the adverse report. The bill as reported adversely in the judgment of the committee was correctly reported, but the claimant desires to present his case in a new form, so as to avail himself of the Bowman act for an examination of the case by the Court of Claims. The committee have no objection to giving him that opportunity, and for that reason I ask that the adverse report be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the vote of the Senate taken on the 15th of February last indefinitely postponing the bill (S. 644) for the relief of the administrator of the estate of John W. Dear, deceased, be reconsidered, with a view to its recommitment to the Committee on Military Affairs. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The bill is recommitted, with the accompanying papers.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2158) granting an increase of pension to Jesse S. Harrold; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2159) granting a pension to John Matheny; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2160) granting a pension to Robert Walker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2161) granting a pension to Harvey Crane; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 2162) granting an increase of pension to Julia M. Michler, widow of Lieut. Col. Nathaniel Michler, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMDEN introduced a bill (S. 2163) to place on the retired-list of the Army the name of Joseph A. J. Lightburn, late brigadier-general, second brigade, second division of the Fifteenth Army Corps; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2164) to facilitate the negotiation of bills of lading and other commercial instruments, and to punish fraud therein; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2165) granting a pension to P. W. Bradbury; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORT ON FISH AND FISHERIES.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1883 be printed, and that there be printed 10,000 extra copies, of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,500 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, and 500 for sale by the Public Printer, under such regulations as the Joint Committee on Printing may prescribe, at a price equal to the additional cost of publication and 10 per cent thereon added, the illustrations to be obtained by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

NEW ORLEANS, BATON ROUGE AND VICKSBURG RAILROAD.

Mr. HILL. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning at the close of the regular morning business I shall ask the consent of the Senate to take up the bill (S. 2031) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and for other purposes, in order that I may make some remarks upon it and have it referred to the appropriate committee.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under the eighth rule.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate, if it be necessary to get unanimous consent, to beg the Senator from Maine not to press that motion this morning. I know that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] is exceedingly anxious to have consideration for what is known as the free-bridge bill. I think that bill has been put in a shape that will involve the necessity of very little time and will provoke very little, if any, discussion. I hope the Senator from Maine will give us the morning hour for the consideration of that bill, it being important in every way as a matter of time as well as in other respects that the bill be considered and go to the other House at the earliest hour possible.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent to say in reply that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has given notice that he will ask the Senate to proceed at the earliest possible moment to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] has given notice that he will ask for the consideration of a land-grant bill to-morrow at some time. I have no doubt that if the majority of the Senate will stay here to a reasonably late hour we can finish the shipping bill to-day. There is no Senator in the world I would be more desirous of gratifying than the Senator from Tennessee, as he well knows, but under the circumstances I do not feel that I can consent.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine. This debate proceeds by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to state to the Senate, if there be no objection, that the Committee on Appropriations have given way now three or four days' time which they think they ought to have had in putting through appropriation bills. I did not feel quite at liberty to crowd off the shipping bill, because I supposed from what was said it would be finished on Monday. It was not finished on Monday, and now if the morning hour is consumed in this way it will not be finished to-day, and the Senator from Colorado will occupy the time to-morrow.

Mr. HILL. Only for about half an hour.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senate declines to take up the shipping bill, in the present condition of business I shall be obliged to ask the Senate to consider the Indian appropriation bill at this time.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in respect to this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator will proceed. This is all proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The bridge bill has had precedence on the Calendar for weeks. I have deferred to every request, to every suggestion of delay except that when a single objection was filed I asked the Senate to take up the bill notwithstanding the objection. The bill was taken up and has been in that position. To await the further action of the committee it was postponed and fixed specially for yesterday. Yesterday I deferred again, and now I am told that if we proceed with the shipping bill, as soon as that is over then is to come up the Indian appropriation bill. I think that is asking a little too much when I want but fifteen or twenty minutes. That being the case, I shall be pardoned for stating that I want to put this matter to the issue. I do not ask for any more time than is actually required to pass the bill after reading it, for it comes with a unanimous report from the committee and is agreed upon by every one except perhaps by a few parties outside in interest. I must be pardoned further for saying that if this issue is presented I shall have to vote against the motion of the Senator from Maine to take up the shipping bill or the motion of any other Senator to give any other bill precedence to the bridge bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the shipping bill.

The question having been put, there were on a division—ayes 22, noes 19.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VOORHEES. May I make an inquiry before the roll is called? I should like the Senator from Virginia to hear me. I have every sympathy with the object which he has in view in the building of the bridge, and I should like to know how much time of the Senate his measure will probably take. I did not hear the Senator's statement when he first made it. What is his wish on the subject?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. So far as I am apprised, the friends of the bill will not ask for ten minutes of time. All they will ask will be a vote on the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. Is it proposed to take up the bridge bill now?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It is up now by right, being at the head of the Calendar. The proposition is now made by the Senator from Maine to postpone the Calendar and take up the shipping bill, and the friends of the bridge bill are opposing that motion.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. FRYE. I shall be very glad to yield twenty minutes for the consideration of the bridge bill.

Mr. HARRIS. My opinion is it will not take thirty minutes to dispose of it——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will suspend. Is there objection to the question being debated? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. BECK. I should like to say a word if I may be allowed to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. BECK. I believe I have the floor on the shipping bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply desire to say that the bill comes back from the Committee on the District of Columbia with a unanimous report, and I think it is in such a shape that no Senator on the floor will object to it. I do not believe that it will necessarily consume thirty minutes to dispose of it. It is important as a question of time that it should be disposed of as early as possible. For that reason, and for that reason only, I voted against the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BECK. I desire only to say one word. I have the floor in the discussion on the shipping bill. I am so impressed with the importance of disposing of the bridge bill that I will agree not to occupy over three minutes, so that we shall save some time by my sitting down.

Mr. FRYE. The power of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky is such and his influence so great in the United States Senate that I accept his proposition with great pleasure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine to proceed to the consideration of the shipping bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. By unanimous consent the Senator from Maine may withdraw the motion, notwithstanding the yeas and nays have been ordered. I understood him to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FRYE. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Maine withdrawing his motion? The Chair hears no objection.

POTOMAC FREE BRIDGE.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make a statement. I knew nothing about the bridge bill except what had been said on the floor of the Senate until last evening a gentleman who said he was interested in the bill made a statement to me about the character of the question, which, if it be true, I should think would be considered by the Senate as a very important one, and the result would be a very much longer debate than the gentlemen who favor the proposition suppose. I do not believe that it is going to be a ten minutes or twenty minutes' question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 1477) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, D. C., was announced as first in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the second amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Virginia that he offer at this time the substitute for the bill formerly reported and let the substitute be read instead of the original bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The substitute is in the hands of another member of the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I ask the Senator having it in charge to offer it now as a substitute, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be treated as the original bill and read for amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. In behalf of the Committee on the District of Columbia I present an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which I ask may be considered as the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] asks unanimous consent, if the Chair correctly understands him, that the substitute now proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] be substituted by unanimous consent for the original bill and the amendments recommended by the committee in its original report, and that this substitute so offered be treated as the original bill for amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection. The substitute will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute, but before concluding was interrupted by

Mr. HARRIS. In line 15 I propose a verbal amendment, to strike out the word "provided."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That word is not contained in the draught the Secretary is reading from.

Mr. HARRIS. It is in the print I hold in my hand.

Mr. ALDRICH. I made the change before sending it to the desk.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment, as follows:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to acquire by purchase a title in fee-simple, free from all liens or claims of lessees or others, the bridge known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and the approaches thereto, and all the rights and franchises connected with said bridge, for a sum not to exceed $125,000, the title to be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States; and said bridge, when so acquired, shall be used as a free bridge, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe; and the Secretary of War is further authorized, in case he shall acquire title to the said bridge, to repair or reconstruct the same: Provided, That in such reconstruction there shall be a suitable draw in such bridge of such length as may be required to accommodate the vessels navigating said river above said bridge; and for the purpose of acquiring such title and repairing and reconstructing said bridge the sum of $240,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for such purpose, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and one-fourth of the expense of such purchase and reconstruction or repair of said bridge shall be charged to and paid by the District of Columbia, and the balance, three-fourths of the sum so expended, shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 2. That if the provisions of the first section of this act authorizing the purchase of the Aqueduct Bridge shall not be fully executed within ninety days from the passage of this act, and the title therefor approved as therein required, then the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, above Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, a substantial iron and masonry bridge, with approaches; and the sum of $220,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction of said bridge and approaches, the same to be maintained as a free bridge for travel: Provided, That the said Secretary of War shall construct a bridge upon such plan as shall cost no more than the amount herein appropriated, and which cost shall include the construction of a substantial iron bridge over the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal and highway, and any and all approaches to the said iron bridge, which said bridge shall not be less than fourteen feet in the clear above the water line of said canal; and not exceeding $15,000 of this appropriation shall be paid out of the Treasury until contracts shall have been entered into with responsible parties, and with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the construction and completion of said bridge, including the masonry, iron work, and approaches, at a cost not to exceed $220,000: And provided also, That a draw of sufficient width to permit the free passage of vessels shall be constructed in said bridge: And provided also, That one-fourth of the expense of the construction of said bridge shall be charged to and paid by the District of Columbia, and the balance (three-fourths) of the sum hereby appropriated shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States: Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall, as soon as possible, cause a survey of the river to be made at the Three Sisters, determine the length, width, and height of said bridge, and the length of draw, and thereupon advertise for plans and price for the construction of such bridge, such advertisement to be inserted in one or more daily newspapers published in Washington, D. C.; New York; Cleveland, Ohio; Detroit, Mich.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Chicago, Ill., and Richmond, Va., for the space of one week: And provided further, That the sum of $15,000 shall be available at once for such investigation and surveys and such contingencies as the Secretary of War shall deem necessary.

Mr. HARRIS. In section 2, line 25, I move to amend by changing the word "bridge" to "bridges;" and after that inserting:

Across the Potomac River and the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

So as to read:

And not exceeding $15,000 of this appropriation shall be paid out of the Treasury until contracts shall have been entered into with responsible parties, and with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the construction and completion of said bridges across the Potomac River and the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, including the masonry, iron work, and approaches, at a cost not to exceed $220,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 26 of the same section, after the word "exceed," I move to insert "in the aggregate;" so as to read:

At a cost not to exceed in the aggregate $220,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. After the the word "dollars," in line 27 of the same section, I move to insert:

Less such sum as may be expended for advertising and making necessary survey.

So as to read:

At a cost not exceeding in the aggregate $220,000, less such sum as may be expended for advertising and making necessary survey.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Tennessee. I notice that one-fourth of the expense of the bridge is to be borne by the District of Columbia. Do I understand that it is to come out of the funds appropriated by Congress and raised by taxation in the District, or is that one-fourth to be paid by taxation on the citizens?

Mr. HARRIS. It is paid by taxation, and the money raised by taxation goes into the general revenue of the District.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does it come out of the portion appropriated to carry on the District government?

Mr. HARRIS. As a matter of fact every dollar of taxation that is collected in the District of Columbia goes into the Treasury of the United States and comes out of the Treasury of the United States as other moneys by acts of appropriation.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was aware of that, but what I wanted to know was whether this one-fourth paid by the District was to be paid out of that portion of money raised by taxation on the District, or whether it was to be paid out of the common fund appropriated by Congress from the money paid by the Treasury as well as that raised by taxation.

Mr. HARRIS. The expenses of the District of Columbia are estimated for as the Departments of the Government are estimated for, and item by item appropriations are made to meet those expenses. Under this provision in this bill one-fourth of this appropriation will come from the revenues of the District raised by taxation out of the taxable property of the District, and three-fourths of it out of the Treasury of the United States. That will be the exact result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 13 of section 1 I notice this language: "The Secretary of War is further authorized, in case he shall acquire title to the said bridge." I suppose the title is to be in the United States. I move to strike out the word "he" and insert the "United States;" so as to read:

In case the United States shall acquire title to the said bridge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. HARRIS. I think there is no objection to the amendment. It is a very proper suggestion.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Tennessee if it is the purpose of the draughtsman of this bill, whoever he may be, that the canal shall be discontinued.

Mr. HARRIS. So far as the bridge is concerned, I answer the Senator from Massachusetts, yes. We do not interfere with the canal company, except upon the piers of the bridge, but the committee was unanimously of opinion that it ought to be discontinued there if we acquire title to the bridge.

Mr. HOAR. What will be the practical effect of that in the judgment of the Senator—that the canal will be discontinued, or will end at Georgetown and not go to Alexandria?

Mr. HARRIS. I shall not undertake to answer as to what the effect will probably be upon the canal. I can answer, however, upon very unmistakable evidence that for several years that canal has been navigated at a cost to the people who own it of $5,000 a year over and above the income from it. I do not think it is very material what effect this may have upon a canal property that costs its owners from four to five thousand dollars to navigate it more than any income they can derive from it.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee, as that statement seems to be somewhat novel that an improvement of this kind should be operated at a loss to the owner, whether the owner of this losing property is a complainant with regard to that loss.

Mr. HARRIS. The answer to the Senator from Iowa is found in this fact: This canal company owns what is known as the Alexandria Canal and the Aqueduct Bridge, which is a toll-bridge. There is a profit in the tolls over the bridge sufficient to sustain the loss on the canal and pay a small profit to the owners of that canal and bridge; but the canal of itself, as the owners assured the committee, involved a loss of somewhere between $4,000 and $5,000 a year to keep it up and navigate it, but that loss was compensated by the tolls upon the bridge.

Mr. WILSON. Then I understand the case amounts to this: that the property in its entirety is a profitable property; that if we sever the two uses and destroy the use as a canal or for the purposes of the canal as an aqueduct, then the property is not a profitable one. Now, it seems to me that we ought to be careful in a property right of that kind not to so frame our legislation as to deprive the owner of that property of the interest he has therein.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. This bill simply proposes to purchase if the parties owning interests in fee or as lessees see proper to accept the terms we offer them. We take nothing from them; we deprive them of no right; we deprive them of no interest; we leave them free to accept our terms or reject them, and if rejected this bill proposes to construct a free bridge at the site of the Three Sisters. That is the whole case.

Mr. WILSON. Now, I should like to understand this point of the case: What objection is there to an allowance of the use of the piers for the purposes of the aqueduct connecting the two sections of the canal, if such use does not interfere materially with the use for bridge purposes?

Mr. HARRIS. In the first place——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator permit me to reply to that?

Mr. HARRIS. With pleasure.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The objection to it is that the aqueduct is not used now for any such purpose, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding. I have been upon that bridge time and again, and the water is backed up over the south side and is shut off from the north side, and what is called the aqueduct conserves no purpose but to hold up the rotten timbers that ought to have been thrown overboard so as to unload the bridge of that much weight.

If you buy that bridge for the Government of the United States, to whom do you propose to reserve the right of property in the aqueduct? To the Alexandria Canal Company, when we are providing in this bill to give them $25,000 more than they have asked in their own argument laid on the desks of Senators here? Do you propose to give it to the lessees, when the lessees themselves, with one exception, tell us that they are a part of the Alexandria Canal Company?

If you are going to buy the bridge, why any reservation for anybody as to the aqueduct? If the Government wants to run a canal that is not used, if the Government wants to run a canal and pay for keeping up the towpath, then make this reservation; or, if you please—for I think it would be much better—make it obligatory on the Government itself when it buys the piers to keep up the aqueduct; but do not make the reservation in favor of somebody having property there for which you have paid more than they deserve and for more than they ever owned. When we pay for this we pay for it all $125,000, putting on the $25,000 to cover the demands of the lessees, the Alexandria Canal Company, to cover what did not appear before the committee at first but what since they have ascertained, the lienholders' claim. Everything is involved, and yet the Senator proposes to make a reservation in favor of somebody.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know, perhaps, anything; I am seeking to find out what there is in this case. I am told that there are some property rights involved here; that the Government and the persons who are interested in these alleged property rights have had some negotiations concerning them, and that they have not agreed upon all the subjects-matter involved. I understand that parties interested would like to maintain an interest there which would allow of the maintenance of the aqueduct. I do not know anything about these things, but I can imagine that persons who believe they have property rights can also believe that they ought to be consulted concerning the changes that may be made in their property.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I can enlighten the Senator on that if he will permit me.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly; I am seeking information.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. There are but three owners of the property in that bridge. The one is the United States Government, the second is the State of Virginia, and the third are what are known as the Wheeler heirs. There is no other property right; the only right asserted here is the right of the lessees. Two out of three of the lessees, so far as they are known, have appeared before the Committee on the District of Columbia; and I want to repeat to the Senator from Iowa that we have absolutely given the parties $25,000 more than they asked in order to secure the title and have given them $30,000 more in this House than they asked for in the other.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I am not entirely satisfied with the situation of this bridge. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia if this proposed purchase will cover whatever right there is in the canal or aqueduct?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the intention of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. That ought to be made perfectly clear. If the United States is to build a bridge across the Potomac River at this point, it ought to have every possible right included here, so that no question of damages may come up hereafter as to the use of this aqueduct.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill provides for the acquiring of every title and every interest affecting the bridge, and then the bill provides for a draw, which is absolutely inconsistent with the possibility of maintaining the aqueduct upon the bridge.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Iowa to read the first page.

Mr. ALLISON. I have read it two or three times, and that is the reason I make the inquiry. If it is perfectly clear I have no further objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is no doubt about the intention of the committee. If any amendments are necessary we shall be glad to accept them.

Mr. ALLISON. The bill reads:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to acquire by purchase a title in fee simple, free from all liens or claims of lessees or others, the bridge known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River—and the approaches thereto, and all the rights and franchises connected with said bridge.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator read a little further?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to insert "all parts and parcels thereof."

Mr. ALLISON. If any further words could be inserted there to make it clear, that whatever rights this canal company——

Mr. HARRIS. Insert after the word "bridge" the words "and the aqueduct attached thereto."

Mr. ALLISON. For one I do not desire that any canal company shall come in here a year or two from now and say, "You have torn down our bridge and destroyed our aqueduct, and we are entitled to damages." Any possible question that may arise there I think ought to be covered in this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator will notice in the tenth line that the title must be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. I know; but it is best to have it clear. Say:

Aqueduct Bridge and all franchises connected therewith.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is already in the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to my colleague that possibly this language might cover the point he suggests: Insert in line 6, after the word "bridge," the words "including its uses for aqueduct and other purposes."

Mr. ALLISON. I think that would make it perfectly clear.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest "and the approaches thereto and the attachments."

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the language is broad enough now to cover all possible rights and franchises of every kind.

Mr. ALLISON. If it is I do not wish any amendment. It was not quite clear to me, and therefore I thought it might not be clear to others.

Mr. DAWES. I should like a little information on the alternative contained in the second section of this bill. I should like to know the propriety of erecting a bridge at the point named and the evidence that it can be erected for any such sum as is provided in the bill.

If I understand this bill, it is a forcing process, by which the owners of the Aqueduct Bridge are to be compelled to convey their property under a threat contained in the second section: "If you do not we will build a bridge by your side up at the Three Sisters, and we appropriate $225,000 for that." I have seen some report of an engineer in former times about the possibility of building a bridge for any such sum at the Three Sisters. The water is represented to be forty feet deep there; the banks are exceedingly bluff and rise very high on both sides, along which there is to be an approach to Georgetown for half a mile, then a bridge across, and then come down on the Virginia side another half mile to get down the banks, which look to me as if they were fifty or sixty feet high of solid rock. I understand that in 1880 we passed a bill requiring the building of a bridge at the Three Sisters, and appropriated $140,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. It passed in 1881, and did not provide for building a bridge at the Three Sisters, but at or near Georgetown, leaving the location to the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. DAWES. At that time the Secretary of War, through the engineers, examined the feasibility of a bridge at the Three Sisters. Now, it must do one of two things: force the aqueduct owners to part with their property at the price fixed here, or enter upon the building of a bridge at the Three Sisters, which will involve $300,000 or $400,000, and will when it is done be half a mile upstream and require a considerable sum of money to make approaches to it, and always be, as compared with this spot, an inconvenient place for a bridge. I think the Aqueduct Bridge should be converted into a free bridge, and I think that the canal, as I am advised now from information, should be preserved and not destroyed.

I do not see how there is any difficulty except from the matter of the draw, and what the possible use of a draw there can be I do not know. That requires the destruction of the canal and requires these parties to take this sum for the bridge and the destruction of the canal at that point.

There has been laid on our desks this morning—I do not know for what purpose and whether there is any authenticity in it—this note, addressed to Senators:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 6, 1884.

SIR: The Alexandria Canal Company and the lessees of the Alexandria Canal Company respectfully represent to the Senate of the United States that they are ready and able to make a title to the United States at once of the piers of the Alexandria Canal for the use of a free bridge in such form as may be deemed best for the United States, reserving to us the right to keep up the canal. We only ask that the canal itself should not be destroyed.

ALEXANDRIA CANAL COMPANY AND LESSEES OF ALEXANDRIA CANAL.

TO SENATOR ——.

I should think that it would be wise for us to make some possible exception and put that exception in the discretion of the Secretary of War, it may be, provided he could make a proper and suitable arrangement to preserve the canal under the bridge, or something of that kind.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I desire to say in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts that the Government of the United States has expended $400,000 on the construction of the piers across the Potomac River now sustaining the Alexandria Aqueduct and the bridge over it.

When the charter to the Alexandria Canal Company was granted, it was granted for the exclusive purpose of a canal. Later on the canal company obtained authority to construct a bridge over it for ordinary travel, for which the canal company charge those using it an exorbitant toll.

For the last ten years the tonnage of that canal, the gross number of tons per annum passing from Georgetown to Alexandria and returning, does not exceed 200,000, which at 5 cents a ton does not produce revenue enough to keep the canal in repair.

The persons now controlling the canal and bridge during the days of reconstruction obtained a lease upon it for ninety-nine years, and they now hold all the franchises of the canal for that time, including the bridge, and it is of no earthly value to them except the amount of tolls they exact from persons passing to and from Georgetown and Virginia, principally from those who visit Arlington. It is a great outrage that a toll-bridge charging an enormous fare should be in existence in this District and be permitted to levy toll on every man, woman, and child who passes from this city to Arlington.

The lessees of this bridge know perfectly well that the canal is obsolete, that it has passed out of existence as a useful channel of commerce, and never can be of use again; and the proposition they have made, not only at this session but for the past four or five years, is that the United States, which has paid more than one-half the cost of the piers, shall now have the use of these piers for $100,000, and so construct the superstructure that they may have a viaduct under it for canal or railroad purposes, as they may see fit to utilize it hereafter. If you accept that proposition your superstructure will cost you double the amount that it will cost for an ordinary bridge.

In addition to that, the improvements which are being made in the Potomac River, narrowing the channel, filling up the flats, and putting into a park all of that immense river front, confines the section used for commerce at Georgetown to an extent not exceeding 3,000 feet. When that is completed there will not be sufficient room to accommodate the tonnage that now exists, and the present aqueduct, without a draw, closes up that magnificent portion of the river above Georgetown, where the water exceeds forty, ay, one hundred feet. It is absolutely necessary for the commerce of the city that whenever you shall reconstruct that bridge there shall be a draw in it, which will destroy the aqueduct. It is absolutely necessary that you should acquire title in fee to this aqueduct; otherwise your superstructure will cost you $300,000 instead of $150,000.

Those are the facts which were presented to the committee, and which I am perfectly familiar with, and which the representatives of the Alexandria Canal Company could not deny.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALDRICH. The title should be changed in the manner suggested in the printed bill sent to the Chair. The amendment sent to me by the Chair has the correct title in it, "A bill to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, D. C."

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that the title had better be, "A bill to authorize the purchase of the Aqueduct Bridge or," and then add what the Senator from Rhode Island has suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the title be amended to read: "A bill to authorize the purchase of the Aqueduct Bridge or the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, D. C."

The amendment was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 1st instant an act (S. 652) to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in the case of the Spanish ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla, and on the 3d instant an act (S. 465) for the relief of Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker.

UNVEILING OF THE MARSHALL STATUE.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate will, at 1 o'clock p. m. on Saturday, May 10, instant, attend as a body the ceremony of unveiling the statue of John Marshall, late Chief-Justice of the United States.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

Mr. HALE. My colleague not being in his seat, I renew the motion he made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the shipping bill, so called.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MCPHERSON to the amendment of Mr. VEST.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, on yesterday I answered as best I could, notwithstanding a good deal of interruption, the arguments presented by the two Senators from Maine and others in regard to the propositions of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and I had expected this morning to reply as best I might to the arguments presented on yesterday by the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], but his speech does not appear in the RECORD this morning. It is withheld for revision, and as I heard it very indistinctly I am not able to say anything accurately in regard to its contents, and therefore will not attempt to reply to anything he said. I might do him injustice.

I am the more inclined to say nothing further now because I have had serious difficulty as to how we could get along with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri on a Senate bill; but the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] yesterday, in response to a suggestion I made that perhaps we were not considering the measure in a practical manner here, said:

Mr. FRYE. I had the House bill laid on the table when it came over here from the House for the very purpose of moving, when in my judgment, as the Senator having this bill in charge, the proper time had arrived, to take up the House bill.

Mr. BECK. I am glad to hear it.

When the House bill is before us, as it is suggested by the Senator from Maine that it will be, all difficulties in amending it and considering the questions involved will be removed, all questions as to the right of the Senate to originate bills extending the free-list in our tariff laws or removing taxation from anything will no longer exist.

As I pledged myself to say nothing unnecessarily this morning, that is all I care to say at present, except this: A little unpleasantness occurred yesterday between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and myself, and it has been suggested to me by friends that I displayed more temper than was proper in regard to it. I only desire to say, before taking my seat, that there is no Senator on this floor for whom I have a higher respect, or for whom I have better cause to have a higher respect, than for the Senator from Massachusetts. I had asked him on yesterday what I thought were important questions in regard to a business proposition, and when he did not answer my question, at least to my satisfaction, but closed by saying, "There is a discrimination between our own citizens and foreigners, and that is what hurts the feelings of the Senator from Kentucky," I could not then help expressing my denial of a suggestion of that sort somewhat emphatically. I have leading protection newspapers before me—I do not care to read from them—sent me, I have no doubt, very kindly, with marked paragraphs; leading papers published in New York and Philadelphia, that are quite lavish in their abuse of both the Senator from Missouri and myself as being unpatriotic in our efforts, and as working in the interest of other peoples. Of course I could not answer these attacks; but when the Senator from Massachusetts used the expression he did, if I had remained silent these papers in their next issue would not only have alleged that all they had said was true, but that I had been charged on the floor of the Senate and had remained silent, and therefore confessed the truth of what they had said, and I would have had the papers sent to me marked in the same friendly spirit.

I do not think that the Senator from Massachusetts would like to have that sort of miserable slander charged against him in influential papers published in the leading cities of the country. It was not so much that I thought he believed that anything of that sort was true, or that he intended to make a distinct charge, as it was the certainty of future publications that I could not explain that perhaps caused me to show more irritability than I ought.

One other thing. I believe I have never impugned any man's motives. But just as we were closing yesterday I protested against any limitation of debate, believing that the substitution of the House bill for consideration might involve a great deal of debate, and not desiring that any gentleman should be in a false position because of debate being ordered to be closed at a given hour, when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] used this expression—

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say a word in that connection. The inability of the Senator from Kentucky to agree to that arrangement puts it somewhat under his own control, as we adjourn with that Senator on the floor. I have been so unfortunate as to twice misunderstand that he had yielded the floor. I should like to know whether he will occupy all the time of the debate to-morrow—

I said in a petulent way, for which I apologize now:

Mr. BECK. I shall behave quite as well as the Senator from Indiana did in the last great debate that was up.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not know what the Senator alludes to at all.

What I did allude to, to be frank about it, was that when the education bill was up an hour was fixed for closing the debate, and without any fault on the part of the Senator from Indiana he made the closing speech. He spoke to the end of the closing hour, and quite a number of others (I was not among them) found fault with him, perhaps thinking they ought to have a right to reply, but the hour fixed cut them off; and in a petulant way I referred to it, that to avoid a repetition of that condition of things I did not want an hour fixed for closing the debate. I beg his pardon for the remark I made. He knows I am incapable of saying an unkind thing to him or about him.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I had intended to ask the indulgence of the Senate this morning at some length, but the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, who has just taken his seat, so like him when he is really and actually the Senator from Kentucky, have entirely taken away the necessity and the disposition for my occupying the attention of the Senate at all this morning.

I had last night but one complaint against the Senator from Kentucky. He and I are not strangers, and I thought he knew, I felt that he knew, that it was impossible for me intentionally to use a word that would disparage his personal character; and if he had been willing last night for me to have said so and taken back any words that had escaped from me which seemed on my part to convey an entirely different meaning I should have forgotten the scene of last night. In saying that the Senator's feelings were hurt because there was in the pending measure a discrimination between foreigners and Americans in the coastwise trade I never for a moment entertained the idea or thought that I was conveying the idea that he was unpatriotic, but that, according to the school to which the Senator belongs, the great efforts the Senator has made—I know sincerely, because I know that all he does here he does sincerely—are to the effect to break down all discriminations in matters of this kind between foreigners and Americans; and it was when he had carried the argument to the point that that was all there was in the "monopoly" alleged that the Senator, I thought a little impatiently, refused me a chance to continue the debate a little further.

The Senator's remarks this morning are of such a character that I do not feel disposed to occupy the attention of the Senate any further in reference to this matter. Nothing that the Senator can say or may be disposed to say can heighten my regard for him or can in any way impair my respect for him.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I am exceedingly gratified that the Senator from Kentucky has explained the reference which he made last evening. I felt unconscious that I had infringed upon anybody's rights or feelings in the educational debate. It was not necessary for the Senator from Kentucky to make any apology, nor do I think any apology is due from me. I am glad, however, of the explanation, because I did not understand his allusion. I came to the conclusion that a remark which I made in a similar temper and spirit dwelt on the Senator's ear unpleasantly. That was the original provocation, and I had come to the conclusion that it grated on the Senator from Kentucky. I need not say to him that the kindly feeling expressed on his part is warmly reciprocated. We are not here a great while in this world anyhow, and may as well be pleasant to each other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. HALE. Let that be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out in the first section of the amendment of Mr. VEST, lines 9 and 10, the words "engines, boiler plates and tubes, and machinery," and in lieu thereof to insert:

Boiler-plates, tubes, flues of all descriptions, furnaces, pig-iron, and yellow-metal for castings, iron and steel blooms, shaft-forgings not turned or fitted, and all other material, metallic or otherwise, used in the construction of marine boilers and engines.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I understand that the Senator from Missouri who offered the original amendment will accept not only this amendment of mine, but all the amendments I have offered by way of bettering his amendment. I wish to have my amendments incorporated in the text of the proposition of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. I am willing to modify my amendment by accepting the amendments of the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri modifies his amendment as indicated.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator from Missouri asks me as to the amendment in the second line of the second section, striking out "seven," found in my amendment, and inserting "six." I desire as far as possible to conform to the wishes of the Senator, and in return will say that if in the first section, in the thirteenth and fourteenth lines, he will permit an amendment striking out "1st day of January, 1885," and inserting "after the passage of this act," which will give six months' time additional for the importation of the raw material, I will agree to strike off a year of the time I proposed should elapse before the ship can be brought in.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then I move to strike out "seven," in the second section, second line, and insert "six;" and in the fourteenth line of the first section to strike out "1st day of January, 1885," and insert "after the passage of this act."

Mr. VEST. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri further modifies his amendment in the manner which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 2, strike out the word "seven" and insert "six;" so as to read:

That from and after the 1st day of January, 1886, any citizen or citizens of the United States may purchase the whole of any steam or sail vessel.

In section 1, line 14, strike out "1st day of January, 1885," and insert in lieu thereof "passage of this act;" so as to read:

To be built and furnished in the United States after the passage of this act.

Mr. MCPHERSON. There is one other amendment the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] suggests which I find improves the proposition; before the words "or repair," in the twelfth line, which have been put in by way of amendment, to insert the word "alteration;" so as to read, "for the construction and equipment, alteration or repair, in whole or in part, of vessels;" and then after the word "tubes," inserted in the tenth line, to insert the word "paints."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Missouri still further modifies his amendment as stated.

Mr. VEST. I accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified, and will be reported as modified.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment as modified, as follows:

SEC. —. That section 2513 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows, namely:

"SEC. 2513. All or any part of the materials, whether wood, steel, iron, copper, yellow-metal, bolts, spikes, sheathing, treenails; canvas for sails, whether flax or cotton; rigging and cordage, whether hemp, manila hemp, or iron wire; anchors and cables; iron or steel plates, castings and forgings; angle irons, beams, masts, yards, rivets, bolts, nuts, screws, boiler-plates, tubes, paints, flues of all descriptions, furnaces, pig-iron and yellow-metal for castings, iron and steel blooms, shaft-forgings not turned or fitted, and all other material, metallic or otherwise, used in the construction of marine boilers and engines, and all other materials and appliances which may be necessary for the construction and equipment, alteration or repair, in whole or in part, of vessels, whether steam or sail vessels, to be built and furnished in the United States after the passage of this act, may be imported in bond, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and upon proof that such materials have been used for such purpose, no duties shall be collected or paid thereon."

SEC. —. That from and after the 1st day of January, 1886, any citizen or citizens of the United States may purchase the whole of any steam or sail vessel, not less than 3,000 tons net register, no matter where said vessel may have been built, whether within the United States or in a foreign country, or whether said vessel may have been owned in whole or in part by an alien or aliens; and said vessel shall be registered free of duty, as to her hull, spars, appliances, outfit, and equipment (including boilers, engines, and machinery, if a steam-vessel), as a vessel of the United States, by the collector in any port of entry of the United States to whom application for such registry may be made by said citizen or citizens, in the same manner as though said vessel had been built in the United States: Provided, That such ships shall be excluded from the coastwise trade.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I concur with what was said by the Senator from Kentucky in objecting to the sudden closing of the debate. This is really one of the most important bills that can be before Congress. In this earth we are one of the greatest people in numbers, in intelligence, in wealth, in extent of territory and variety of climate, in commercial and nautical spirit, and yet have no flag upon the ocean, and have to procure the carrying of all our many products to the markets of the world in vessels of other people.

There is a reason for this if we are wise enough to find it and patriotic enough to apply the remedy when found, and in the hope of contributing to such a result I venture to make a few remarks in this debate.

We recognize the fact that the whole universe is governed by laws which emanate from their maker, God, and that the moral and physical world are alike subject to these laws. The very highest and noblest aim of human science is to ascertain and define these laws in order that we may conform our actions and our conduct thereto; and the nations which have most successfully done this are those which have made the greatest progress in wealth and civilization. In the nature of things this is so. No law, human or divine, can be violated with impunity. If the agriculturist sows in defiance of the seasons, he will lose both his labor and his seed; if the constructor build in any manner contrary to the laws of mechanics, he will meet with confusion and calamity. So, a government founded upon principles in defiance of the moral nature of the people over whom it is established will languish unhappily and eventually perish. So, too, laws which are enacted in defiance of the well-known principles of political economy will hinder progress and obstruct the accumulation of wealth. Violated law will vindicate itself in some way and at some time, and in such manner as is commensurate with the offense; and if it be not so, then we are sure that what we have assumed to be a law is not such.

The ancients reduced this sentiment to the maxim concerning the mills of the gods, which they said ground slowly, but exceeding fine.

It is the business of the statesman to discern and to define the laws of political economy. The best method of doing this all will agree to be the observing the primary instincts of human nature as exhibited in the experience of mankind. When we see the same results following the same causes and the same things done again and again by the same people and under the same circumstances, we assume properly that we have found a law of political economy; and that law once found and made known, it would be just as gross folly to violate it as it would be to build a house in violation of the law of gravitation.

Now, sir, not to enter upon a discussion of those principles of political economy which are not fully established by the consent of the intelligent world, there are yet certain fundamental laws which are as certainly proven as any law of physics. Some of these may be said to be: First, that the more freedom which is given to trade the more prosperous trade will be; second, that prices of human products will be regulated by the supply and demand; and third, that it is the interest of mankind to buy in the cheapest market and to sell in the dearest.

I may say that these are natural laws, not the artificial creations of scientists or theorists. They are implanted by the Creator in the moral world, and are as much God's laws as any laws of physics. I may say further that any violation of them is punished by the loss of public wealth. Restrictions upon trade are notorious for the effect they produce in rendering trade unproductive; and any taxes laid upon commerce, except where absolutely necessary to protect it by good government, are so much taken needlessly from its profits. In addition to that, we are every day witnessing the fact that the interference of the law in the operations of trade is an unknown factor and a more disturbing one than if its effects were known.

We have applications to us from all quarters by those of our fellow-citizens who are protected by tariff laws to give them stability, as change is ruinous. "We know not what to do because we know not what law Congress is going to pass," say they; "give us stability." And yet, sir, the men who want stability and who thus deprecate the interference of law are the men who for one hundred years have besieged this body with applications to pass laws for increasing duties and the like in their behalf; and the moment they get the laws to suit them they say, "Stop now; we want stability;" but so soon as they begin to feel competition or a diminution of profits from any cause they forget their cry for stability and again say, "Give us a little more duty, and then give us stability."

Since the adjournment of the last Congress this country has been agitated by two parties, one claiming that the present existing tariff was unequal, burdensome, and bringing more money to the Treasury than was required by the Government, was an unnecessary tax upon the people and must be reduced; the other claiming that agitation would ruin them, that they needed stability and fixedness, that they could not know what changes were coming, and especially, they said, the present law had not had a fair chance, and we must give it sufficient time to test its efficiency. Thus pleading for Congressional non-interference they immediately demanded in the same breath a restoration of the duties on wool, and promised if that was done and a few other things were increased also they would want nothing more except stability. This shows conclusively that the attempt to regulate the price of anything by statute is a violation of a well-known law of political economy and will always produce confusion and trouble.

If wheat be abundant it will be cheap; if it be scarce it will be dear; and no law that human ingenuity can enact can change that order of things which nature has established. So if wages are low laws can not make them higher while the whole world is pouring in a supply of labor. I claim that this earth, as long as it has existed, has never witnessed a greater piece of folly than is seen in our attempt by high-tariff duties to keep up the price of labor on the one hand while we invite all the laborers of the world to come in on the other. In other words, we have been attempting to keep up the price of an article by positively glutting the market with it! I must do those who do that the justice to say that the folly is not theirs, but pertains to those who submit to it. When the manufacturer manages to buy his labor in a free-trade market and to sell his goods in a protected market we can lay the charge of folly only at the door of the consumer and the workman. Nor can we avoid mingling with our wonder some deserved contempt for the meek victims of such fraud.

Those who declare that wages can be increased by statute, strange as the logic is, only claim that it is a law of political economy adapted to the United States. Being calculated for this meridian, as almanacs are, it is admitted that it fails everywhere else in the known world. Our country, it seems, refuses to be subjected to the laws which govern ordinary humanity. Now, can that be a principle of political economy which is partial and local in its application? You may raise the price of goods by the tariff, but the wealth which the producers of those goods gain comes by the loss of the consumer; and the total loss of the public is the difference between the artificial home price of the goods consumed and the natural or foreign price. The law will avenge itself in that way.

Now a word with reference to the maxim which dictates that men shall buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest. You may take a boy 10 years old and give him a quarter with which to buy candy, and he will start to the shop with which he is acquainted and where he has bought candy before; but if he meets a boy on the way who tells him of another shop where he can get a stick of candy one inch longer than in the shop in which he is accustomed to trade, he will go miles to get that longer stick of candy for his money. If he has a top to sell and he can hear anywhere of a boy who will give him 5 cents more for his top than any other boy has offered him, he will search for that boy diligently and until he finds him. That is the primary instinct, another form of self-preservation, a wise selfishness underlying a great principle.

Now, sir, those who are in favor of attempting to increase prices of products by law violate this natural principle of political economy every day. You not only violate it, but you absolutely reverse it. You make the farmers of America buy everything that they have to buy in the dearest market in the world and sell everything that they have to sell in the cheapest market in the world. That is what you do, and with your especial pet and favorite and scapegoat for all your wickedness and sins committed against political economy, the American laborer, you do still worse; because, if the British pauper who is to compete with him does not come of his own accord to take the bread from the mouth of the American, you send for him across the ocean and pay the cost of his coming; so that our workman has to sell his commodity, his labor, in the cheapest market in the world and buy his supplies in the dearest. So that your boasted protective system simply means protection for capital and free trade in flesh and blood. Stripped of its sophistries and falsehoods that is what it is.

It would be a contradiction in terms to say that these violations of law did not produce loss and injury. Of all the laws ever made in defiance of the true principles of economy, those which forbid the purchase of ships in any market where they can be had on the best terms it seems to me are the most utterly absurd and unwise. There might have been some excuse for their adoption by the nations of Europe at the time they were first introduced, for then the principles of political economy were not understood. Then all the nations of the world were established and maintained by military force or political intrigue. They lived in a state of constant hostility and jealousy toward each other; trade with all its beneficent influences was not understood, and there was very little of it done in the world. The accummulation of wealth by commerce was not the chief aim of statesmen. Plunder and conquest were relied upon for the exaltation of nations in those days.

The first navigation law that we have any account of by the English was in the reign of Richard the Second, in 1379, which enacted that no goods should leave England or be received at any port in England except in an English ship. Sir, would you believe, if you did not know the fact to be true, that that is precisely our coastwise trade at this day? That we have not got any further in progress than the days of Richard the Second, five hundred years ago? No ship can sail in any of the waters of the United States except it be the property of the people of the United States, and has been built in the United States. Under the operation of these navigation laws our marine, as soon as it struck competition, began to decline; and it has gone down steadily until it has absolutely disappeared, not from the face of the earth, but from the face of the deep; it is dead. That was our policy.

Now observe the British policy. As soon as she found that her navigation laws stood in the way of her trade she repealed them, and under the operation of free-ship laws she is now and has been carrying 60 per cent. of the trade of the whole world. She carries most of ours on the open seas. In the year 1882, as I saw it stated in a respectable newspaper—I do not know how true it is—out of the millions of bushels of American wheat that went abroad to seek a market not a single solitary bushel left our shores in an American ship.

Observe well these facts, Mr. President: Here is one country pursuing one policy which brings death to its shipping on the ocean, and here is another country near by which pursues an opposite policy, which brings prosperity and wealth; still we hesitate, and still we bring in little tinkering bills, and still we rub a little camphor under the nose of a dying man as if that would bring him to life; still we cling to the error which has ruined us. Why? Simply because we have adopted the protective policy of shutting out our industries from all competition with the world, and our ships at sea, with all the wealth and strength they might give us, are sacrificed in order to protect a few ship-builders.

It seems to me that every reason given for keeping these laws upon the statute-book is really a reason for their repeal. If it is done to protect the workmen in the ship-yards, then it is most partial and unjust. I understand that in the ship-yards that build sea-going craft we have not more than 10,000 workmen, and that among all the men in this country who are trained as sailors or who would have taken to the sea to make their bread if they had had ships to go to sea in there are at least 200,000. The interest of those 200,000 is to be sacrificed for the special interest of 10,000. We keep 200,000 men from making their bread upon the sea, from carrying our flag and increasing our strength and consequence among the people of the world in order that we may give higher wages to 10,000 people in our ship-yards than are paid to workmen in the ship-yards in England. We surrender to the foreigner rather than confess the failure of protection!

When we had wooden ships our facilities for building them were such that it compensated for the difference in the price of labor in the two countries, and we could compete and did compete successfully with our commercial rival, England, for many years; but when a change of policy came about and a change in the method of ship-building and iron steamers were adopted, instead of having iron steamers for ourselves and giving our ship-builders all the opportunities they desired to enable them to compete with those of England in the way of cheap material, in the interests of the iron and steel manufacturers of Pennsylvania we made material so high and kept up wages so high that we could not compete, and so we went off the ocean. Failing to build our ships, common sense dictated that we should buy them, the true object being to have ships as implements of commerce. We should then at least have had a navy carrying our own products under our own flag. But as it is we preferred to do nothing; we would have no ships unless we could make them, and as we could not make them we have neither ships nor sailors, and the whole marine interest of our country has been sacrificed in this insane and wicked way.

But we are told as an excuse for this that it is absolutely necessary that we should have ship-yards in case of war, that we should have places where we could built great ships, and where we could train seamen, and so on. That is the ever-ready excuse I have heard ever since I have been in the Senate, and I read long before I came here that it was necessary to have a high protective tariff for everything in order that we might be independent in case of war. A very high duty had to be placed on wool hats in order that we might not be dependent upon England for hats in "case of war." The duty on blankets was placed up about 100 per cent. in order that we might not be dependent upon England for blankets "in case of war." On everything that you can mention the highest duties were justified by supposing what we would do "in case of war." Yet for nearly a quarter of a century the party that has used this argument of imposing high taxes on everything in order to be ready in case of war has been in power, and has left the country absolutely helpless. We have neither navy, nor forts, nor fortifications, nor guns upon our coast or in our harbors that could stand for twenty-four hours before the great ironclads of the world if we were so assailed.

Suppose we had a war to-morrow, I wonder what our defense would be. We have no ships. It would take months if not years to build any with the yards that we have, and if built we have not the personnel of a sailor corps to man them, at least we have but a very small one. What would our defenses be? I wonder if Mr. John Roach would defend us against foreign enemies. I admit his power; I admit that he controls this Congress to a very great extent and has for very many years past; I admit that he has scared 50,000,000 of American people out of their common senses and made them believe that their only salvation in peace or war has been in levying high duties to protect his ship-yards. I admit all that, but I doubt very much whether Mr. John Roach could protect us against a foreign enemy. Then I do not know but the next resort would be to an increase of tariff duties. Perhaps if we could raise the tariff high enough we could keep the enemy out.

I know a duty of a hundred per cent. can keep out a ship with a cargo of blankets and cutlery, but whether one of 150 per cent. would keep out a cargo of Krupp guns and ammunition I am not so sure. It would hardly do so. I once heard of a country store being robbed in one of the counties of North Carolina and that a note was found on the counter, left by the thief, in which he apologized for not taking more goods; he said they were so high-priced he could not afford to steal them. Probably high prices and dear living in this country would keep off the enemy, but I should be afraid to risk it. I think this talk about being ready in case of war is the merest pretense possible, and is only employed to cover the gross selfishness of the protective policy.

But being permitted to buy ships, it is said we could not compete with Europe, because our sea-wages are higher than those of foreigners. Then why not man them with foreign sailors? The answer is, that would not be patriotic. But it is quite patriotic to have neither American ships nor sailors on the ocean. Besides, it so happens that the few ships we now have are manned by foreign paupers. It has been asserted in this debate that 95 per cent. of the sailors now in the service of the mercantile marine of the United States are foreigners, and a very shabby set at that. What would be the objection to Americans purchasing ships that would carry their flag over the ocean and manning them by foreigners if foreigners would work cheaper than our men, making those paupers earn money for us? But as it is we have neither ships, nor sailors, nor commerce upon the high-seas except such as is borne by the vessels of other nations.

The meaning of this assertion of our inability to compete at sea apologizes for the real object of this bill, which is that we must have subsidies to support this business. You admit that it is a losing business to private individuals, and therefore they will not engage in it, but you claim that it is statesmanship and wisdom for Congress to tax the people in order to support individuals in a losing business. I can not see that that which would be folly in a private man of business would be wisdom in the United States of America. Why do we want ships to send them to sea unless there is profit in it? Why should the Government hire, or subsidize, which is the same thing, ships to go through the form of carrying commerce and carrying our flag to other countries when there is no profit in it to the owner? If there be no profit to the owner, how much is there to the Government?

And suppose we should do that, what would become of all those who were not subsidized? We can not subsidize them all. We can only subsidize one line between two given points, and all other lines would not only then have to compete with the free ships and the cheap ships and sailors of England and of Europe but with the subsidized and highly protected lines of their own country. It would be of no use to any one except to the few men engaged in ship-building in this country and the specially subsidized lines.

The truth is, the whole idea of our present navigation policy is based upon and justified by an utter absurdity and impossibility. You can not keep up artificial prices of things to compete with the same things at natural prices. You can not build a ship for $300,000 that can compete on equal terms with as good a ship built for $200,000. You can not compete even in a ship of the same cost with sailors who are paid 40 per cent. less than ours. You can not train sailors to be ready in case of war in our merchant marine unless we have a merchant marine. You can not keep seamen's wages up by keeping the price of ship-building material so high that we have no ships to build or to sail in. You can not prevent this foreign competition, because, and I thank God for it, the ocean is free and refuses to be bound by these laws which violate the principles of political economy on land. You can bind the land and you can station policemen everywhere to observe and keep the laws with which you fetter it; but when you come to the sea it is the highway of nations; all men may pass freely thereover, but no man can stop thereon or have an abiding-place there. It acknowledges no laws except those which regulate the surging of its billows and the solitudes of its awful depths. Certain courtesies and police arrangements with reference to its character as a highway are observed by common consent of the civilized world, and that is all. It is the vast expanse which separates the jurisdiction of nations; it is the grand reservation of the Almighty on our planet wherein no petty thieving laws of human cunning can abide for a moment. Man's control stops with the shore, thank God.

But you can keep our own people from going to the sea, which you have done most effectually. You can sacrifice the interests of 200,000 sailors for the supposed interest of 10,000 ship-builders, and for the real interest of John Roach and four or five others. You can force the American people, year by year, to pay to foreigners $150,000,000 for carrying them and their goods to and fro upon the high seas; and then in the interest of a little stump-tailed monopoly your orators and newspapers can raise the slanderous and contemptible cry of "British gold" against the very men who want to take these $150,000,000 away from the British and give them to our own ship-owners and sailors. That is what you can do, and it is about all you are doing, except to excite the contempt of all men who reason upon things from the experience of mankind.

Capt. John Codman was so denounced the other day in this Chamber. I am authorized by him to denounce as false any statement to the effect that he is suborned or in the pay of foreign ship-owners. He is an American sailor whose business has been ruined by these laws, and he has just as much right here and is entitled to quite as much respect as Mr. John Roach, who seeks to plunder the American people in the name of patriotism by high protective laws. In Heaven's name why should England or foreign ship-owners send an agent here to disturb the laws under which she is growing rich? How could an agent, be he paid with ever so much of her gold, better subserve her interests than do those who on this floor, without pay, vote to keep these laws on our statute-books in her behalf?

The real object of this bill is disclosed in those sections which ask for a subsidy. Senators will do anything and everything except make the candid confession that high tariffs and barbarous navigation laws have driven us from the seas. Such an acknowledgment would be fatal to the intrenched monopolists of this country. The ships that carried our flag once in triumph have been swept from the ocean, and the only remedy which statesmanship has to propose is a little more of the disease that killed the patient.

We are called upon on the one hand to imitate England, and on the other we are denounced for trying to imitate her. We are called upon to imitate England in every folly and every blunder that she has made. We are called upon to go back to the mistakes that she committed long, long ago, before trade was universal and governed by a national code, before its beneficence was known to the world, and to repeat all the faults that she made and adhered to for so long. In other words, we are invited solemnly, like provincials, to shine in the cast-off garments of Great Britain, but not to dress ourselves in any of her wisdom and success. I for one decline to commit my country any longer by my influence to the imitation of the ancient and long-since obsolete navigation laws of England.

It is not pretended that the bill can revive the mercantile marine. I believe the Senator from Maine told us the other day he did not expect it to be revived by this bill; he expected it to be helped. Sir, it is the merest tinkering. What are its provisions? One is that under certain conditions a foreigner may absolutely be an officer of a vessel until it arrives in an American port; another, that in certain cases seamen may be discharged and may get a month's extra pay; in others, that they may be discharged and under certain circumstances may be sent home at the expense of the Government or of the vessel whose fault it is that they were discharged. Another wise provision is that each vessel shall be provided with a "slop-chest." Another is that they shall receive relief from certain consular exactions and protection against the beldames who keep the sailors' boarding-houses of the country, and the like. All this may be well enough, all good enough as far as they go, and they go far enough unless they were better. But they do not touch the seat of the disease under which our maritime navy has decayed unto death. Besides, they are merely aids to a living institution, and we require restoratives for a dead one.

The consequences which are to follow if we should adopt this free-ship policy I admit look very fearful as portrayed by the two Senators from Maine. One of the great fears is that three or four hundred old ships, out of model and now partly rotted, which are owned in England, if this bill becomes a law will be brought to this country and broken up and sold for old material and old iron, to the great detriment of the manufacturing interests of Pennsylvania. If I had not heard that with my own ears and read it in the RECORD I should not have believed it. To the great detriment of the interests of Pennsylvania! If a few cargoes of old iron can ruin the Pennsylvania iron and steel manufacturers, I ask every sensible man, ought they not to die, and die to-morrow, and have no funeral? We have paid thousands and thousands of millions of dollars in the shape of bounties and high-tariff duties for the purpose of establishing those great iron and steel works that were to take old England by the throat and outglow her furnaces and smother her fires, and they are now to tumble down like the walls of Jericho at the rattle of old iron. Have we not made a poor bargain indeed? It would really seem so.

Another danger, the Senator says, is that if we repeal our navigation laws, in case of European war foreigners will take shelter under our flag and sail under it until after the war and then return to their own. Well, what would be the harm if they did? They can do so now in other countries. And suppose they did return after the war to their own country, would we be any worse then than we are now? I can not see that we should be.

Another danger is, that if people once get a taste of free ships for the foreign trade they will soon want it for the coastwise trade. I heard the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] put that question to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], and he put it as though it contained a dilemma, on the horns of which the Senator would be impaled if he dared to answer fairly. How long would it be, said he, if you give them free foreign ships until they will want free coastwise ships? How long would it be, sure enough, and what would it matter if it was so? Is this a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, or is it a government of John Roach for John Roach and by John Roach? Have the great majority of the people of this country no rights which Mr. Roach is bound to respect? Are our people capable of self-government? Have they sense enough left to see their own interests and to follow them? Suppose that they should want free ships in the coastwise trade, is the Senator or the Senate or anybody else to say them nay? If a majority of the American people pronounces for it who is to say no to them? What harm would it do to anybody? Do not the foreigners already come here and engage in anything and everything that we do? Are they not to be found in every single one of our industries, both as employers and as employés, both as capitalists and as laborers? Do they not own our railroads, many of them? Do they not work in all our mines, or many of them? Do they not own our lands in the West by the millions of acres? Have they not great joint-stock companies all over this country engaged in speculation of every kind? I have here the London Economist, in which is set forth a list of the cattle companies formed in this country, some of them declaring a dividend of 20 per cent.:

Arkansas Valley Land and Cattle, limited.
Cattle Ranche and Land, limited, preference.
Colorado Ranche, limited.
Dakota Stock and Grazing, limited.
Hansford Land and Cattle, limited.
Maxwell Cattle, 8 per cent. mortgage.
Matador Land and Cattle, limited.
Missouri Land and Live-Stock, limited.
Nevada Land and Cattle, limited.
Powder River Cattle, limited, ordinary.
Powder River Cattle, preference.
Prairie Cattle, limited, first issue.
Prairie Cattle, limited, second issue.
Prairie Cattle, limited, third issue.
Swan Land and Cattle, limited.
Texas Land and Cattle, limited.
United States Cattle Ranche, limited.
Western Land and Cattle, limited.
Western Land and Cattle, preference.
Western Ranches, limited.

There are some twenty joint-stock companies of foreigners, investing millions of dollars and owning millions and millions of acres of our land and declaring some of them a dividend of 20 per cent. upon them, and yet you say that it would be ruin if a man ran a little corn-cracker on one of the rivers or sounds of the United States unless it was made in the United States and had a United States registration and ownership? Is there anything more absurd?

The influence of foreigners among us is great in more dangerous ways than honest trade. I do not know how true it is, but it is a national scandal that it was British gold which caused the demonetization of American silver and provided for the payment of the interest on the public debt in gold. Yet we can not permit anybody to own a ship in this country unless he be an American, and the ship American built with the imprimatur of some American ship-builder upon it.

We have all got rich by protective tariff, said the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] the other day; our people are now rich; the farmers have all got rich by the protective tariff. Not so, Mr. President. I maintain that nobody has got rich by the tariff except the manufacturers. It is impossible that anybody should have made any money except the manufacturers, and they have made their money at the consumers' loss.

Wheat is now 75 cents a bushel in Liverpool, or was at the last quotation I noticed, where not long ago it was $1.15. Is that peculiarly and particularly beneficial to the farmers of the West? What is the cause of that? Owing to the fact that the high protective tariff prevents people from bringing in something to buy wheat with, the consumption of our wheat abroad is necessarily restricted. A foreigner wanting to come for wheat naturally wants to fill his ships with something to exchange for wheat; for it is an understood fact that all commerce is exchange; and when he finds that owing to the tariff he can not bring in his goods with which to exchange he hunts his bread in some other direction. I have a statement here, taken partly from the London Economist and partly from our own statistical reports, in relation to the wheat which is consumed by Great Britain, and I will read it to the Senate. In 1881 Great Britain imported 57,042,669 hundredweight of wheat, of which the United States furnished 36,038,074 hundredweight, or very considerably over half—three-fifths, in fact. In 1882 Great Britain imported 64,171,022 hundredweight, of which the United States furnished 35,059,623 hundredweight, a million and some odd hundredweight less, and still less in proportion to amount imported. In 1883 Great Britain imported 64,080,444 hundredweight, of which the United States furnished 25,065,832, less than two-fifths. While the importations of Great Britain remained about the same, the exportation of our wheat to Great Britain and her consumption of it decreased every year until the decrease amounted in the three years of 1881, 1882, 1883, to 10,972,000 hundredweight.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Would it interfere with the Senator's argument if I should ask him a question?

Mr. VANCE. Not at all.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The question I should like to have the Senator answer is, was that diminution in the amount of export of our wheat to England due to natural commercial causes or to artificial causes? Was it not due to the most extraordinary methods pursued by speculators in the country, who had raised the price of grain by reason of speculation 10 cents a bushel in this country above the cost of grain in Liverpool?

Mr. VANCE. I am not able to tell the Senator whether that was the cause or not. I have no means of knowing what the effect of speculation on the trade was during those years; but I know that the decline in the amount taken by Great Britain of our wheat is commensurate with the decline of our exportations for those years, for I looked over the census tables on the subject.

Mr. MCPHERSON. But the Senator does not really answer the question.

Mr. VANCE. I could not in any other way than I have answered.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. VANCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. With a surplus in this country of 100,000,000 bushels of grain above the possible wants and needs of our people, with the absolute certainty that that grain must find a market abroad, why was it that the grain was not shipped abroad? The grain is here, it is not needed by the people of the United States; it seems not to be needed by anybody just now. The reason of its not being exported and sent abroad was because of a most extraordinary condition of affairs as regards speculation, the insane idea which got possession of the people's mind that the grain would be worth at some future day a great deal more than it was at the day the people abroad needed it. I submit to the honorable Senator that it is no argument to say that the British Government or the British people or the European people at one time took from us 36,000,000 busheis of grain and at another time only 25,000,000 bushels. I say it may be attributed to artificial reasons rather than to natural commercial causes.

Mr. VANCE. I submit that to get up and tell me that my argument is no argument is not asking a question.

Mr. MCPHERSON. But the Senator undertook to answer it. I was only dealing with his answer, not with his original argument.

Mr. VANCE. I beg pardon of the Senator; I have not yet undertaken to answer his question as he last puts it. I will though. I expressed my inability to answer the question as the Senator originally framed it, but as he now states it in the form of a question as to why our wheat did not go abroad and replies himself that it was due to speculative causes, I must be permitted to say to the Senator I do not think that is true. When I see a plain and palpable reason for anything lying upon the surface I prefer to take it rather than to hunt around for a speculative one which may be true or may not be true. When the wheat, as he says, was here and England did not take it, I think the plain and palpable reason was because we would not take England's goods in exchange for it.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the question whether prior to the first year which the Senator took as his limit, 1880, there was not a constant increase of our exportations of wheat to England, beginning with about 1860 and 1861, to some thirty-five or forty million bushels? I have not in my memory the exact amount.

Mr. VANCE. Are you through with your question?

Mr. HOAR. That is part of the question. I will put the three questions at once, if the Senator will pardon me, and then he will see the bearing of each of them. Is it not also true that the tariff, which the Senator thinks has caused the diminution of the last three years, was in operation during all the time of this vast increase, so that whether we were increasing or diminishing the same cause existed? Is it not further true that about three years ago England completed the vast system of railroad communication with India which enabled India (which raised wheat at 35 cents a bushel when it costs us 60 cents to raise it) to take her wheat to the seaboard?

Mr. VANCE. The Senator has not only asked me the questions, three of them at a time, but I think he has answered them. I was going on to say on that very point that it is a part of the history of the country that for many years, from 1860 on, our importations of breadstuffs to Europe, and especially to England, increased with wonderful rapidity, but that for many years with that increase our tariff was also constantly increasing, which made it more difficult for England to purchase; and the Senator knows as well as I do that it takes a considerable length of time for a nation to change the sources of its supplies.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator does not quite apprehend my question, if he will pardon me. My question went a little further. Whether the increase in our exports of wheat to Europe did not begin when the high tariff of 1861, the Morrill tariff, was put on, and if it did not go on increasing ever since until within three years, with a high tariff all the time.

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator will allow me to finish I think I will answer him fairly. I was proceeding to say that when England found her breadstuffs were costing her so high and that the nation to which she principally looked for them was cutting off her trade by high duties, she began at once the task of finding other sources of bread. She began to stimulate the production of wheat not only in Canada and in Manitoba, the great northwestern wheat territory, but in India, a country that had hitherto been supposed incapable of producing more breadstuffs than would supply its own population, in Roumania, in New Zealand, and in Australia. From all those distant lands, all being her own except Roumania, and Egypt, over which she had a protectorate, the Senator will see that the production of wheat and its importation into England has been gradually increasing year by year in the same manner that our importations increased, and that all this effort to create sources of bread took time; that it is only within the last few years that England has been able to get any considerable portion of her bread from these new sources; that she has built extensive railroads; that she has loaned millions of pounds to railroad companies for the purpose of penetrating those regions of the uplands of India that are fit for wheat-growing; and that her system of railroads contemplated and in process of construction will reach very soon a country where wheat can be produced, according to the information that I have derived personally from citizens of that country, at 4 shillings a quarter, which is equal to 12½ cents a bushel.

All this I say was caused by our tariff duties, for England would not have incurred these enormous outlays if she could have purchased her bread by exchanging her products with us as nature and common sense dictated. But for our restrictive duties she never would have turned away from the convenient plains of Iowa to go round the globe to seek her people's bread at vast expense in the foothills of the Himalayas or on the steppes of Australia.

When England has reached by rail that portion of India fitted to the cereal, and has stimulated the production of wheat in that land where labor is so wonderfully cheap, I think we may be safe in assuming that the product of our wheat fields in the Northwest, all that is over home production, will command not more than 50 cents per bushel. Yet our farmers are getting rich! Their product goes down according to the laws of trade, but the tools with which they have to cultivate the ground, to produce the wheat, the clothing which they wear and which their families wear, and the medicine with which they doctor themselves in sickness—the prices of those are all kept up for the benefit of the manufacturers of this country.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator think that if we should take off the tariff wheat would stop developing in India?

Mr. VANCE. I do. That is to say, I think if our protective tariff was brought down to such reasonable limits as would enable England to buy our wheat and pay for it with her productions it would stop her vast efforts to stimulate wheat-growing, and her demand would keep every farmer in this country employed in raising wheat for the English market at profitable prices. I simply believe that statement, and I know that whether it be true or not it would be better than the present system, which is constantly decreasing the prices of the farmer's products without a compensating reduction of his expenses.

I will mention also, as perhaps the Senator is aware, that England produces about one-third of her own wheat. The climate of England is subject to many variations, and wheat grown there is subject to many casualties. In bad wheat years the exportations of course are greater from this country than they are during good wheat years.

I have here a statement showing in what countries England made up her supplies after the falling off in the supplies from the United States. From Russia she imported in 1881 4,018,895 hundredweights of wheat; in 1882, 9,571,021 hundredweights; in 1883, 13,293,358 hundredweights. From Turkey she imported in 1881, 33,532 hundredweights of wheat; in 1882, 526,439 hundredweights: in 1883, 1,128,074 hundredweights. She imported from Chili in 1881, 1,091,803 hundredweights of wheat; in 1882, 1,656,361 hundredweights; in 1883, 2,310,126 hundredweights, and paid for it nearly all with her cotton goods that we might have sold if we had had the liberality of trade she exhibits. The British East Indies produced in 1881 7,308,842 hundredweights of wheat for the British market; in 1882, 8,477,479 hundredweights; in 1883, 11,243,497 hundredweights, making a total increase of purchases from those four countries of 15,521,993 hundredweights of wheat.

How easy it is for England to supply herself with cheap food. And yet our farmers have been told in the West, as they were once told in the South in regard to cotton, that they in those great plains of the West now have the bread of the world in their hands and can make the world buy their wheat whether we take anything from the rest of the world or not. That is the argument. There never was a greater mistake. England can furnish her people with bread without taking a single bushel from us; and the policy which prevents us from exchanging our bread and provisions for her goods is one which will soon force her to do it: a policy which feeds and fattens the manufacturing interest of this country at the expense of the farmer; and no amount of broad, flat assertion that the farmers will get rich upon such a system as this can make anybody believe it who understands anything about it.

Why, sir, the Senator from New York said the other day, if I understood him correctly, that he did not want any ships unless they could be built at home and manned with stalwart American seamen. That I suppose would run through everything else. He should not want any sugar for his coffee unless it has been made here at home. He should not want any coffee unless it is grown down here in the Botanic Gardens. He should not want any tea nor any linen. He should not want any wine, any spices or fruits, or anything else in the world except it is produced in the United States. Moreover he will not send a telegraphic message across the ocean, and he will not go across the ocean himself on any pretext whatever, because he can not sail across in an American ship or send a message across by an American wire. That is a sort of patriotism that I do not profess and that I fancy the Senator does not practice.

I am informed, I do not know whether I be correctly informed or not, that no nation which has once repealed its navigation laws and tried the policy of free ships has ever returned to it. France gives a bounty on ship-building, it is said. So she does; but she allows her citizens to buy ships freely wherever they please, and she even gives a half bounty to a ship built abroad provided she is owned by a French citizen, the object being to furnish France with ships, to promote ship-owning and not ship-building. We say the building is the all-important matter, not the owning; but with the French the test is the owning and the having and the using of the vessel.

Germany did not repeal her navigation laws, as has been stated here, with regard to the power of purchasing free ships, because she never had any to repeal. The free cities, Hamburg, Bremen, and Lubeck, were such before their consolidation into the German Empire, and they had the right to buy free ships wherever they could and desired, and when they were consolidated with the German Empire not many years ago that right of the free purchase of ships was reserved. The fact that Germany now builds most of her iron vessels, as has been boastingly stated here, arises from the fact that having iron vessels she had to have ship-yards to repair them in; and the ship-yards being once established, the building followed as a matter of course. Before she adopted the policy of free ships she had neither yards nor ships; now she has ships and she has yards.

The Senator from Maine when told about the destruction of the American merchant sea-going marine, falls back very triumphantly on the flourishing coastwise trade. Yes, of course, we have some vessels on our coast and upon our inland navigable waters. It could not be otherwise, because no competition has ever been permitted to come here. Mr. Roach says "we protected our coasting trade as we did our manufactures, and so saved it." Just so. There is no trouble about that. We can save almost anything and keep it alive by cutting off the rough usage of the competing world and levying taxes to support it. Yet we tried to protect our sea-going ships by the same laws, and where are they? In the building of sea-going steam vessels within the last fifteen years free-trade England, as I am informed (I have not the accurate statistics), beats us about twenty to one. In the last year (1883) she built about 900,000 tons of such vessels, of which about 125,000 tons were sold to foreigners. Great as we think ourselves on the interior waters and upon the land where we can make prices high by law, whenever we come to the great sea and get out of sight of land and out of the jurisdiction of those laws we are seized with sea-sickness and go to the bottom.

I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. Without it the bill is not worth a cent—not worth the snap of my finger. It will do no harm, it will do no good, to pass it without the amendment so far as I can see, except that section which provides for a subsidy, to which I am utterly opposed.

But there is one way, Mr. President, by which we can restore our flag to the ocean and can punish our great commercial rival, and that is by repealing all our treaties and re-enacting the statute of Richard II in 1379, and refuse to let any foreign ship land goods upon our shores. Then, no doubt, foreign nations would unreasonably retaliate by refusing to let any ship of ours land goods upon their shores. Then this miserable foreign trade, this unprofitable foreign trade, this vexatious foreign trade, that is so contrary to the principles of American protection would be at an end, and we could revel in all the blessings and glories of a home market and make each other rich by trading with and taxing and cheating each other to our heart's content, with no foreign pauper to molest us with his competition or make us afraid with his cheap goods.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] as modified by him.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri to assent to a further modification of his amendment on line 13 of section 1, after the words "United States," to insert "for foreign or domestic ownership."

Mr. VEST. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair). The amendment will be modified accordingly.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state as explanatory of the modification that section 2513 of the Revised Statutes, which was the statute of June 18, 1872, was intended, to my personal knowledge, I having participated in the debates of that day, to allow American ship-builders to construct vessels for foreign account, and to that end to admit the articles named, lumber, timber, hemp, &c., free of duty. But when the Treasury Department came to construe this law they made a decision, which under their practice seems to be irrevocable, that in order to take advantage of this section the ship must be an American-owned ship. Now, I happen to know, for I was acting in co-operation with the Senator from Michigan, Mr. Chandler, who was a friend of the construction of ships on foreign account, that the very object was to enable American ship-yards to be occupied in the construction of ships for foreign account; and yet the construction given to the law by the Treasury Department completely destroyed that intent, as probably the Senator from Maine is aware. Therefore that which was meant to be an occupation to American ship-yards and ship-carpenters was deprived of its object by the construction given by the Treasury Department.

Now, in order to prevent anything of that affecting what may be called the free-material clause proposed by the Senator from Missouri, on which we are now about to vote, I propose to insert, in line 13, the words "for foreign or domestic ownership," so that it will enable the American shipwrights to be employed to build vessels for foreign ownership, and that I am sure we all desire shall not be excluded by any hostile construction such as was put on section 2513 of the existing law.

Mr. FRYE. I call the Senator's attention to section 17 of this bill. I had a very vivid recollection of the Senator's purpose in making such a provision as he now speaks of, and there is a section which directly in terms provides for the building of vessels on foreign account, and for the rebate of duty in case the vessel is partly built of articles of domestic manufacture.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is correct; I appreciate that provision; but as I thought the amendment was offered in different terms, I proposed to make it in full accord with the intent of the existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. The chair understands that the modification of the Senator from Delaware, which he has explained, is one already accepted by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BAYARD. It is accepted by the Senator from Missouri and incorporated in his amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, it was my purpose yesterday to have indulged in more extended remarks upon this bill than I shall to-day. In fact, I should be willing to let the vote be taken without any observations at all on my part but for the fact that it seems best to me to briefly state the reasons which will govern my action on this very important measure.

There is a certain attractiveness in the term "free" that wins regard for it even when applied to things where it is very often much out of place. "Free ships" means free trade in all that appertains to the construction of a ship, including the vast amount of labor which is involved.

Sir, when this question was first sprung upon the Senate many, perhaps myself among the number, failed to realize at once the magnitude of the interests involved. Our fathers who made the Constitution provided the navigation laws we are now considering. They were passed in the first administration of Washington; they became a part of the laws of this country in 1792 and have remained so till now. They have survived ninety-two years—I believe that is the correct calculation—and of that period the Democratic party has had control of this Government for near fifty years. The Democratic party has had twelve administrations, covering forty-eight years. We on this side of the Chamber have administered the affairs of the United States more than one-half the time the American Union has been in existence, and during all that time these navigation laws have been on the statute-books and have been in force. Consequently I do not see how I am called upon in any party sense to favor their repeal.

I have looked over the administrations of this Government somewhat. I find various names of Secretaries of the Treasury whom I have been taught to believe knew as much on this subject almost as some modern statesmen who expatiate on it with great force and possibly some wisdom. These laws were enacted under the auspices of Alexander Hamilton. On many questions of government no man differs more widely from Hamilton's views than I do, but I believe nobody has ever questioned his great ability as a financier. I believe no scheme of finance was ever more successful than that of which Alexander Hamilton was the founder. He established solid credit and commercial prosperity.

Alexander Hamilton was the founder of our system of finance under General Washington. Oliver Wolcott served one term under that administration, filling out the eight years. I find that Albert Gallatin was Secretary of the Treasury twelve years. He was Secretary of the Treasury during the entire period Thomas Jefferson was President of the United States and during one term under James Madison. He found no fault with these navigation laws and thought it was due to the prosperity and the honor of the Government that the American register should carry American-built and American-owned ships. His policy enabled the American people to go through the war of 1812 in honor and triumph. American-built ships, though few in number, maintained American glory on the ocean.

The bare fact that men of such eminence as I am mentioning thought as they did on this subject is not final and conclusive, but I expect to show why, independent of the weight of their names, they were right. This line of policy was pursued by every administration to the present without any call for serious modification. During the administration of James K. Polk, when it is sometimes said the Democratic party was nearer free trade than at any other time, even Robert J. Walker never called for the repeal of these laws and for free trade in ships.

Indeed, may I not pause to ask why men who deal in ships should be relieved of the burden of import duties with which to raise revenue any more than the man who deals in plows? Why should he not pay taxation duty as well as the man who buys farm implements? There is no free trade in plows, and there is no free trade in harrows, nor in mowers, nor in reapers. It seems to me that ships can bear the burden of duty for revenue as well as these humbler instruments of life and business.

Once Kentucky had a statesman, a strong man, at the head of the Treasury Department. There is no greater or stronger or purer name connected with Kentucky history than that of James Guthrie, not even excepting that of Mr. Clay. There has been no wiser or sounder man in the Treasury Department than Mr. Guthrie. We were not instructed by him according to the lights that are shining so brilliantly here now. I want to find whose company I am in. I hear that we are to be read out of the party at both ends of the Capitol. I want to ascertain whether a man who stands with Andrew Jackson, James K. Polk, James Guthrie, Thomas Jefferson, and Albert Gallatin can be read out of the Democratic party by those who are violating all the principles of the founders of the party.

Mr. President, passing from that view of the question, I wish to state in brief what this great measure is. Senators need not look at it as a small matter; it is a stupendous question—nothing less than the turning over of our ship-building to a foreign power. It is nothing less than abdicating that branch of industry. It is nothing less than saying to England that her ship-yards shall furnish every ship which we navigate; that we will buy of her every keel we put afloat; that we will patronize her cheap labor, and that she shall have all the profits of this mighty industry.

It is the question of closing every ship-yard in the United States. A ship is composed of ten cents' worth of material and ninety cents' worth of labor. England can and does furnish this labor at one-half the wages we pay our people. When ships are purchased from England, in order that our American ship-yard can compete with them they must cut down the laborer's wages 50 per cent., or surrender the work of ship-building to another power. The policy of this Government has been different from this; the policy of this Government has been that in time of peace we should prepare for war. How completely should we be at the mercy of our great adversary if she had all the building of our ships in her warlike hands!

Why, Mr. President, are we ever to see the day when the American flag shall fly the sea only on hulls built in British ship-yards? Let me say to Senators on this floor that they may not be aware of the sentiment of their countrymen on that subject. The Senator from Missouri, with all his great gifts and eloquence, was driven to make a strange statement a few days ago in this debate. In discussion with the Senator from Maine as to whether buying English ships would promote the ship industry in this country, he exclaimed that at least we could repair these ships in our ship-yards and thus keep up some sort of interest in ship-building. England would build and we would repair. I mistake the temper of the American people if they want the matter put in that shape; that our ship industry shall consist in raising the American flag over British hulls, and when they are old and worn and put down again for repairs they may be repaired in our ship-yards.

The argument that we can get ships such as we want from foreign powers and that this will promote the ship industry in this country is the most illogical proposition I have ever heard. You might as well expect to make me believe that it would promote the raising of corn to encourage the purchase of all we want from abroad as to tell me that it will build up ship-yards and supply labor with employment in the ship industry by purchasing all the ships we want put on the seas from somebody else.

I repeat, sir, this measure is the abandonment on the part of the United States of the entire work of ship-building, turning it over to a power never friendly to us and only too glad to sweep all our ships from the ocean. Senators here are asked to do this. The public men of Great Britain, you may be sure, have taken notice of the fact that this measure is here. Whenever there is a question on which there is an English side and an American side I take the American side of the line. There is no doubt in my mind which is the English side of this subject. This measure will be hailed with joy by every member of the British Parliament true to his own country. It is the abdication by America in favor of Great Britain; it is a concession to England such as they would give many millions to possess. I stand for my own country on this and on all other questions.

Sir, what American interest demands this legislation? Does the shipping interest ask it? Is it the labor interest? I stand for American labor. I was born in its ranks. Does American labor ask for this? Where are your petitions? Where is the popular movement? On the contrary, I will venture my reputation for some knowledge of the popular mind that every labor organization in the United States is against it. I mean not merely the labor organizations that are in ship-yards, but everywhere. They sympathize with each other. Workingmen of all classes, the workers in the iron furnaces, the workers in the various factories, bound together and allied by all their interests and their thousand ties, are against this measure, one and all. Where is then the American interest for it?

I have said already that the man who wants to buy a ship is more able to pay the duty upon it than the man who buys a plow. If free trade is right, let it apply to everything; let us not pick out some one thing on which men are well able to pay the duty.. I have heard something of tariff in my day.

Mr. FRYE. Right there I should like to put into the Senator's speech, before he starts on any other proposition, a telegram which I have just received. The statement of the Senator is that the laboring men do not demand it, nor do the ship-builders demand it, nor the men who propose to buy ships. I read this dispatch:

NEW YORK, May 5, 1884.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

We, the owners of American-built iron steamships, from two to five thousand tons each, aggregating over 75,000 tons, engaged in foreign trade to West Indies, South America, Mexico, China, and Australia, protest against the free-ship amendment to navigation laws, we preferring ships built under our own supervision, the materials being superior, and urge the passage of proposed bill for fair compensation for mail service, which would be an inducement to increase our fleet at once.

J. B. HOUSTON,
President Pacific Mail Steamship Company.
JAMES E. WARD & CO.,
New York and Cuban Mail Steamship Company.
S. W. ROWELL,
Secretary United States and Brazil Mail Steamship Company.
F. ALEXANDRE & SONS,
New York and Mexican Line.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Maine. I was sure that I stated what was the general sentiment upon this subject. I was doing no more, however, than in a general way seeking to convey what I am sure is the fact, that there is no interest crying out or calling for this revolutionary legislation, calling for a change of policy, a change of laws as old as the Government itself.

I was proceeding to say that in all tariff discussions I have heretofore heard that the articles free of duty should be the necessaries of life, and under that term "necessaries of life" are usually included the articles of clothing with which the husbandman clothes himself, articles of husbandry with which he plows his grounds and cultivates his fields, and also articles which go into domestic use in every-day domestic life. I have never heard before that the man who is able to float ships on the high seas must have them come in duty free as a necessity of life to him.

If we are to have free trade, let it commence with salt and other articles of prime necessity to human life, which the poor must have as well as the rich, and which they are not able to purchase at the increased price which the duty places upon them. Let us not commence by relieving the millionaire; let us not commence with those most capable of paying the duty if the duty is a burden. Let the revenues by impost duties be paid by those who are able to send ships down to the sea rather than by the farmer and the mechanic in the fields and in the shops.

No, Mr. President, I have yet to hear a single reason to justify a vote for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, revolutionizing, as I have already said, the policy of the Government from its beginning. It is a subject on which to go slow; it is a subject full of teaching to this side of the Chamber as well as to the other; it is a subject full of mighty interest to American labor. It is full of interest to the patriotic thought likewise, for I say again no true-hearted American wants to see an American merchant marine with its keel laid by English cheap labor carrying the American flag.

Sir, I will tell Senators who differ from me why, in my judgment, the American merchant marine has declined. We have not treated it fairly, and the other side of the Chamber is more responsible for that treatment than we are. The Republican party have had this Government for the last quarter of a century almost. During all that time there has existed on the statute-book the most iniquitous and outrageous legislation that it has been my evil fortune to look at during my career as a Senator. Here are laws—take section 3976 of the Revised Statutes and section 4203 of the same, and they are unparalleled. They amount to a thorough system of black-mail upon our ships when they go out upon the ocean. Ships in the foreign trade are compelled to receive the United States mail at the port of shipment and at a port in a foreign country at a price that does not pay for handling the mail-bags, carry that mail, and discharge it at an expense to themselves of thousands and tens of thousands of dollars. A system of that kind would drive any American ship from the sea.

The laws I have cited are also thoroughly unconstitutional. If I understand the Constitution the Government has no right to take a man's property without proper compensation. The Government has no right to say to the owner of a ship, "You shall carry the United States mail for $25, when it is worth $500 to do it." It is robbery, it is a disgraceful plunder of private property, and has driven American ship-owners out of the business and compelled them to abandon it.

Sir, instead of a generous policy, instead of a healthful policy building up our merchant marine, we have proceeded during the last twenty-five or thirty or perhaps more years with the spoliation and the destruction of their just rights. Repeal these laws; go further and fix generous rates of freight, help instead of hurt, and you have the cure for your declining merchant marine. It has declined, Senators say; yes, but if you want to give it the final finishing blow, this amendment will turn the whole business over to England, and we shall have none.

Mr. President, I am an American in my feelings on this question. I believe we have the power to do what any other government or people can do. Our institutions are freer to promote the energies and develop manhood than any other government, and if we want ships, if it is our interest to have them, let us build them. If we would have ship-yards, let us protect our laborers in ship-yards. I am not afraid to say so. If there shall ever come a time when we build them in competition with all others, then there will be a season of universal free trade, but as long as we are raising a revenue of over two hundred millions a year out of duties laid on foreign imports, I am not going to commence with free ships, which will strike a blow at every branch of industry and at the bread of the laboring man and his wife and children.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to submit a very few observations upon the amendment now before the Senate. The question of the encouragement and the revival of the American foreign carrying trade is evidently entirely disconnected, as a matter of reason and necessity, with the question of the American ship-building interest. It has been admitted in the argument here, and is certainly true, that we have no American foreign carrying trade; that it is subject to great discouragement; that for reasons which have been generally discussed and conceded, that because of the greater proximity of coal and iron to navigation, because of the greater cheapness of labor, because of the superior financial facilities and of government aid, there is a disadvantage in the American ship-building interest and in the carrying trade as compared with England and foreign countries generally.

Now, the argument, admitting the weak and dying condition of the American foreign carrying trade, proposes a remedy, and what is the remedy? It is to continue the connection and burden the foreign carrying trade which it is proposed to revive with an additional debt of one-third greater than is borne by the foreign carrying trade. It is to require the support of the American ship-building interest by the American foreign carrying trade, which all admit to be in a weak and dying condition. Why the necessity for continuing this connection? If it be necessary—and we may admit all the arguments which gentlemen make as to the necessity for an American ship-building industry—I am not averse to it. I am willing for one to give that aid, whatever it may be, which may be necessary and efficacious to the building of an American ship-building industry; but the question for us to consider is, what is that aid? Is it to be done by burdening that industry with an unnecessary cost by requiring the two to be inseparable? I think not.

It occurs to me that if an American foreign carrying trade with $170,000,000 saved to American interests be a necessity, if an American foreign carrying trade to create American sailors be an object of public policy, as I think it is, then we must look to the reasons and the means by which it may be established, and not assert that we can do it by attaching to it the necessity for supporting the American ship-building industry. If we must have that industry, let us aid it by imposing the support of it upon other industries; select some healthy, strong, and vigorous industry, or let us impose the necessity of building up the ship-building industry, if required, upon the general taxable interests of the country, upon its whole resources; let us treat it as a national industry. Let us say that the same reasons which demand that you should have navy-yards, or a navy, or preparation for war, make the encouragement of the ship-building industry by Americans in private hands and not of public policy and encourage it in the proper way; but is it not utterly unreasonable to say that the American foreign carrying trade, now burdened and dying, must be saddled with the support of the ship-building industry? What argument and what reason is there in a proposition of that kind? Certainly none. Unquestionably the two are entirely distinct. If you can have an American foreign carrying trade, if you can save $150,000,000, if you can have American sailors, and yet without having the ships built in the United States, why not do it? If to have a ship-building industry you must encourage the building of American ships, why not do it directly? Why cling to a policy which has failed to do it? Unquestionably you stand in the presence of the fact that under the existing legislation the restrictive policy of the navigation laws has not built up an American foreign carrying trade, nor built up to any great and enlarged extent your American ship-yards. They have certainly signally failed in respect to the American foreign carrying trade.

You have, then, no argument, no proposition in reason on which to stand for connecting these two industries, and for saying that the foreign carrying trade which you propose to create and which is to be the nursery of your seamen, which is to save you $150,000,000 in freight and transportation, which is to carry your respectability and prestige and the character of your country to all foreign nations—there is no reason for your saying that you can create this American foreign carrying trade totally distinct from the ship-building interest by law, requiring it to support the ship-building industry of this country.

Mr. President, this proposition of American labor as we hear it here is one that I shall not contradict at this time. Beyond all question it is true that whatever legislation is necessary to give comfortable living, to give compensatory wages, to American labor it is the duty of this Government to undertake; and if your institutions are such as to be a barrier in that way they must be reformed, because labor is the great interest of every country, and the laws must be addressed to the comfort and the well-being of the people who are the laboring people and who are ninety-nine one-hundredths of every country and every State. But we can not violate the laws of economy. You can not by law fix the wages of labor in any other way than by encouraging business pursuits out of the earnings of which the laborer may be paid. You can not regulate by law the distribution of that labor. You may encourage it; you may have friendly legislation by which the laborer can have his fair share of the distribution of the proceeds of labor, of the earnings, of the fruits of labor, of its salable value; but you can not by law fix and determine that amount. It rests upon principles of economy, upon supply and demand, and you can not create a competition between that which is cheaper and that which is dearer. You must go back, and before you can furnish compensation of any kind higher or lower to the American seaman you must create the foreign carrying trade for him, you must encourage and find some laws by which there may be earnings in which to pay him, and having done that, you can by legislation directed especially to that end provide for American seamen. You can provide for their education, for their training, you can provide for their compensation within a reasonable extent, but you can not do it until you have the business, until you have the trade, until you have the earnings out of which that compensation must be made.

Therefore, sir, I can not see the force of the arguments which have been made on the other side, on which it is proposed to continue this connection between the foreign carrying trade of this country and the ship-building interests of the United States. In Alabama and in Pensacola we have perhaps as fine and as great advantages for ship-building as can be found anywhere. We ought to have a ship-yard and a ship-building industry in Pensacola. We ought to have the iron and the coal of Birminghan, which are equal to any in the world, equal in cheapness, equal in proximity to navigation, equal in quality, applied to the construction of ships. There is no place in the world where it could be done more cheaply or with more excellence than there, and I would be willing to vote whatever encouragement was necessary to that end.

But to undertake to continue a system that has utterly failed, that has no direct connection with it, into which other causes and controlling causes intervene to prevent us from creating a ship-building interest, is utterly unwise. Who will undertake to say that you can relieve the causes of higher wages in America and lower ones in Great Britain? Who will undertake to say that you can remove the greater financial facilities abroad, the more direct government aid extended to the running of ships and to the building of ships and the mail compensation and the moneyed aid by government in time of failure? Who will undertake to say that you can supply these advantages by continuing the burden of the entire support of the ship-building industry upon the carrying trade of this country, now almost entirely extinct?

Why, sir, the proposition has no connection; it is not founded in reason, upon anything connected with the business, nor is it connected with the protective system. You might have your protection mountain high and still not touch the question of encouraging an American ship-building industry. You have the fact as now exhibited that with all your tariffs you have no ship-building industry for the foreign carrying trade, and you do not compete with England or any other country; your ships are passing away, and for some cause, it matters not what, connecting, as you still do under your navigation laws, the foreign carrying trade with the necessity of supporting the ship-building industry, it has utterly failed of its purpose.

I shall then, Mr. President, without undertaking to detain the Senate by any further argument on this subject, vote for the amendment for the purchase of foreign ships, for free ships. At the same time I am free to say that I am not one of those who are unwilling, if the aid of the Government, economically, is needed, for the development of the ship-building interest of this country and toward the creation of an American commercial marine. I regard the commercial marine, the foreign carrying trade of this country, as standing in the same relation as all the appropriations for the Navy, as the appropriations for the common defense, as a preparation for time of war. Whatever may be a necessary means, judicious, prudent, economical, necessary to effect that object, shall at all times receive my support.

Mr. PLUMB addressed the Senate. [See Appendix.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

ALLEGED ELECTION OUTRAGES IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from a committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the report will be received.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate of January 29, 1884, to inquire into certain alleged occurrences in the State of Mississippi, to submit a report thereon, accompanied by the testimony taken.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As a member of the committee I desire to say for the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] and myself that we differ entirely from the conclusions of the majority of the committee, but have not had an opportunity to prepare our views upon the subject. The Senator from Louisiana is not in the city, and I had not seen the report of the majority of the committee until this morning. As a consequence we have been unable to prepare our views after ascertaining that we should not be able to join in the report of the committee. I shall therefore ask the courtesy of the Senate, at such time as we may be able to prepare our views, that we may have the privilege of presenting them and have them printed in connection with the report of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HOAR and others. No objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the blll (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. GIBSON. Before the vote is taken I should like to have read an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as additional sections:

SEC. —. There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all goods, wares, and merchandise which shall be imported on vessels built in the United States and wholly owned by citizens thereof only 90 per cent. of the several duties and rates of duty imposed by the tariff act of March 3, 1883.

SEC. —. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and are hereby, repealed.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss either the amendment I have offered or the general question. I merely desire to say that if that amendment could be attached to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri I would vote for his amendment, but inasmuch as the amendment controverts our treaties with the great powers and therefore can not be adopted by the Senate, I shall feel constrained to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HALE. I raise the point of order that that being an amendment——

Mr. GIBSON. I am not pressing the amendment.

Mr. HALE. The Senator withdraws it?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. HALE. Then let us have a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BAYARD. But for the notification of the Senator from Maine that he desired a vote to be taken upon the measure to-day I should have preferred a vote later. At the same time I have no idea of delaying the Senate for the purpose of any preparation on my part to discuss this most important measure.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Delaware would prefer to speak in the morning, I will move an executive session.

Mr. BAYARD. I should prefer not to speak at all, either to-day or to-morrow, and certainly not this evening unless it be the pleasure of the Senate, following the suggestion of my friend from Maine made yesterday, to come to a vote to-night upon the bill. If the Senator thinks that we ought to come to a vote upon the bill to-day, I am not disposed to stand in the way either by a long discussion or by any discussion, and yet at the same time I make the suggestion to him and to those who may desire to assist the very natural feeling of a Senator placed in charge of an important measure to bring his duties to a close. I know something of it for I have before now been intrusted by the Senate with the conduct of measures, and I know how anxious a man is to come to a decision, especially where he has thoroughly examined the subject and has made up his own mind.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, I think no Senator will object to an adjournment. It is nearly half past 4 o'clock now, and I suggest that we go into executive session.

Mr. FRYE. To-morrow will be entirely taken up. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] has notified the Senate that he desires to occupy the floor. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has notified the Senate that he will immediately follow with an appropriation bill, and another appropriation bill follows that. The Senator must remember that these bills have got to go back to the House of Representatives; that the session is now drawing into the summer heat; and while I would yield almost everything but principle to the Senator from Delaware, having a profound respect for him, I can not yield in this matter unless the majority compel me to do so. I shall ask the friends of the shipping bill to take a final vote on the bill to-night some time. I hope the Senator from Delaware will excuse me in the condition of the business of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is perfectly right; I do not make that question at all. He has his duty to perform, and I have no doubt he is endeavoring to do it according to his best lights and conscience. I have not the least objection to that. I would only suggest to the Senator from Maine, as he speaks of the bill going back to the House, that this bill has never come from the House.

Mr. FRYE. Before the Senator commences his speech I will deal with him with entire frankness. When the House bill came here I made a motion that it lie on the table, the full subject having been considered by the Committee on Commerce and they having made a report. The House bill is on the table. It contains some wise provisions, but it does not contain one-fifth part of what is contained in the Senate bill and in the amendments that the Senate committee instructed me to offer to it.

Mr. BAYARD. On which the committee are unanimous?

Mr. FRYE. On which we are unanimous. What I propose to do is this: As soon as the Senate has passed judgment upon the various amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce, and when the bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate, I shall make a motion, if I obtain the floor, to proceed to consider the House bill. Then I shall offer as an amendment to the House bill every provision which the Senate has affirmed to be right by its vote, a single vote settling that question. That seemed to me to be the better way, and that is the way I adopted.

Mr. BAYARD. I think that is a very sensible manner of treating this question.

Mr. FRYE. I am happy to hear the Senator say so.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am aware that House bill No. 2228 and Senate bill No. 1448 proceed together in line with the removal of burdens and obstructions by way of consular fees, tonnage dues, taxation, and like charges upon American shipping. I have endeavored to compare the provisions of these two bills, and I find that up to a certain point they run entirely together. Then comes the Senate advances upon the House proposition, and they extend other and further measures of relief, in which I am disposed generally to concur. But after that there are two counter-propositions. The House has proposed the measure that has given rise to nearly the whole of the debate upon the admission of free ships. The Senate per contra proposes to subsidize postal steamship lines. Here are two propositions which have been made antagonistic by the action of the two Houses. The House has not favored such aid to postal service, but it has proposed to admit ships to American registry free of duty.

There are, therefore, two features, one proposed by the other House and one by the Senate, to which each House is mutually opposed. If this bill could contain only those measures which are to strip from American shipping the present weight of excessive and unnecessary fees and charges and the new arrangements in regard to shipping seamen and seamen's wages I should vote for it without hesitation and without one moment of debate. But we are not to be allowed to do that.

The proposition of the committee of the Senate of supplying the losses at the present cost of running and operating lines of American ships in connection with foreign countries by more liberal or extra allowance from the Treasury, disguise it as you may or describe it as you will, is to pay money out of the Treasury to support a non-paying private business.

That touches a principle in regard to which I have very decided opinions, and in regard to the dangers of which I have very profound convictions; and that is, there can be in a popular Government like ours no proposition more dangerous and unwarranted than to turn the currents of public money and power into the channels of private business and profit; that the moment you shall embark upon such aid to private undertaking you open the Treasury not to those who really need its aid but to those whose power, already established, enables them to control its contents. That is the reason why we never have had a petitioner coming here to ask a subsidy who was not a millionaire or a rich and powerful corporation represented by astute and active agents.

There is a principle contained in the Senate bill that you are to sustain a private business that could not otherwise sustain itself by subsidies from the public Treasury. I believe that issue is made before the American people in many shapes. I believe its true nature and results are now coming gradually to be comprehended, and when it is comprehended the danger that lies at its root will be understood, and the American people will feel that it is no proper function of our Government to interfere in the private undertakings of its citizens so as to favor one individual above his natural competitors. Whether they shall come individually or as a class, whether they shall come demanding it because of their numbers, wealth, and importance, or come beseeching it because of their poverty, it matters not what is the pretext of the demand, the claim is that public property, the common wealth, can be taken for private use. That can not be done justly or legitimately. The powers of the Government were meant equally for all; the Treasury of the Government is filled by the labors and taxes drawn from all; and there can be no more fatal principle in a government so largely conformed to numbers as ours, a government so popular in its principle as ours, than to say, that which belongs to the people at large, that which taxation has drawn from all, can be properly diverted to the private interest of an individual or a class.

That is the Senate proposition. I do not care to discuss it further. It has fallen to my lot before now to say why I would not support in any way a bill that leads to such a result, and I will not further enlarge upon the subject.

On the other hand comes the proposition from the House of admitting ships to the American registry free of duty. That is really but half the proposition. The other half seems to have been left out, although by reading the debate that occurred in another place, and from the private information that I have received, it was evidently intended that coupled with the free admission of ships to American registry should also be provided the admission of the materials of which those ships were built, free of duty.

Surely no argument would be required to show the necessity for this. The value of any manufactured article, indeed of any article that is used by mankind, is in greater or in less part created by the human labor bestowed in its production. To import, therefore, a highly composite manufacture free of duty, and yet to levy a duty upon every element that entered into its construction, would be the most obvious, unjust, and absurd discrimination against the labor, ingenuity, and skill of the country into which the import was made. I take it for granted there is no man who is in favor of the admission of free ships who would not couple it with the admission of all the component parts of a ship and every material of which it is constructed also free of duty.

I have signified my earnest desire, to see American shipping freed from every burden, from every unnecessary friction in the way of transacting its business. There was a period of my life when I thought I should be a merchant, and I endeavored then and had opportunities then for comprehending something of the shipping business. I have spent my life in a community where shipping was a very large interest. I have seen vessels of all classes and sizes, from the smallest to the largest freight or passenger ship, constructed almost within the sight of my home. I have had personal friendships and professional intercourse among men engaged in this business and among those who were engaged in navigation in all quarters of the globe. Therefore I claim not only to have great interest but to have some knowledge arising from an earnest examination into the business of ship-building, ship-owning, and of foreign and domestic commerce.

As this debate has progressed one thing must become obvious to every man who has attended to it, and that is the impossibility of treating either ship-building or ship-owning as a thing separate and apart from the general business of the country, in which it is imbedded and inextricably intertwined.

When you speak of admitting duty-free the materials which enter into the construction of a ship, what do you mean by material and by raw material? Did not the discussion of last year and of every previous year on the tariff question disclose the fact that what is one man's raw material is another man's finished product; that all material brought to a condition of usefulness is a combination and result of labor and skill?

I remember well two manufacturers of a certain class of iron or steel, one living in the city of Philadelphia and the other in the city of Chicago or some town farther west, when we had under consideration the rate of duty to be imposed upon steel ingots, the tires of locomotives, and the like, both interested in the protection of their relative industries, meeting as antagonists, and why? Because the finished product of the Philadelphian was the commencement of the manufacture of his fellow-manufacturer farther west. From one illustration you can learn all. It is unnecessary to multiply the instances, for they are countless, in which the same principle could be illustrated.

We talk of ships, we discuss navigation, but who can discuss navigation without discussing commerce? How can commerce and navigation be separated? How shall you discuss commerce without the instrumentalities by which commerce is to be conducted, and how shall you deal with those instrumentalities without considering the principles upon which commerce must be conducted? It is plainly impossible to conduct commerce on the high seas without ships, and to sustain ships you must have commerce between the nations. A policy that shall obstruct commerce between nations will injure navigation, and a policy that promotes commerce will assist navigation. Therefore a commercial navy is a necessary adjunct to commerce. These are truisms, but nevertheless they lie at the basis of the discussion upon which we have entered.

We have witnessed in the last thirty years the most remarkable changes, revolutions in the conditions under which the commerce of the world is conducted, so that what was competent and useful thirty years ago can no longer be considered so to-day. We have seen the change in our day from sailing vessels to steamships, from the side-wheel steamer to the screw propeller, from construction of wood to iron, and very lately from iron to steel. Every one of these progressive changes has made that which was antecedent impracticable and virtually useless in the competition of commerce. There is not a man to-day building a railway who would dream of constructing its rails of iron. Steel is to-day a necessity for railway building, and it is fast becoming so in respect to ships. The superior strength, greater lightness, superior durability, coupled with what is now its equal cheapness, has made steel and not iron the prevailing element in metallic construction.

These changes have taken place, as it so happens, at a time when the United States were scarcely able or ready to take advantage of them. There was a terrible gap in our history of progress when this country was engaged in a civil war on an enormous and frightful scale, in which the grapple and the contest was unhappily between Americans as against Americans and not with a foreign foe, in which every victory was in fact a loss among ourselves, and in the midst of that, driven by necessity, which is the mother of invention, the rapid advance in the change of the material of which ships are constructed and the substitution of the invention of the screw for the side wheel was made by Great Britain, our most powerful rival in the field of commerce.

What has been the result? That in these discoveries we have lagged so far that we have practically no commercial navy engaged in the foreign trade; that the profit gained by freights and the employment of navigators both have been lost to the American people and have been gained by their rivals in the world's commerce. I have heard here, I know not how accurately stated, that $150,000,000 annually is paid for the transportation of goods upon the high seas, of which the Americans were fairly entitled according to their ante-bellum standing to some 85 per cent. and upon which at the present time they obtain but 15 per cent. For that reason it is said we should adopt a policy that will make it possible for us to regain this great freight-carrying profit. I think that we ought. There is no reason why it should continue to be so, and if we discover the reasons that prevent it it is our plain duty to remove them.

It is not necessary for me to depict to the Senate or to enlarge upon the value, indeed upon the necessity to a commercial nation, of having a commercial navy under its own control. It may be said in short that a country which has no corps, no class of trained and skillful navigators, a country which has no ships to be navigated, can not pretend to stand in the first nor the second rank, nor indeed to be classed at all with commercial nations.

The manufacturing and producing interests of this country are growing with incredible force and in a manner most satisfactory to every patriotic American. It is perfectly plain that our capacity of production and manufacture far exceeds our home demand, and yet from a system of tariff taxation which now prevails among us, our manufacturers and producers can not compete profitably in other markets than our own.

There is but one class of American citizens who export the result of their labors and sell them at a living profit outside of their own country. That is the agricultural class of this country, and that class receives not one stiver of benefit by taxation under the name of a protective tariff.

The fact stands—I here state it and no one will rise and deny it—that there is not a raw material, as it is called, breadstuffs, petroleum, cotton, lumber, nay, there is scarcely an article of manufacture produced by American labor that has a protective tax laid in its favor that finds a profitable market abroad. All of those things which are sent abroad, that constitute our balance of trade, that tend to give employment for ships on the high seas, that are to fill the ships that we long to see floating under the American flag—every such commodity, call it raw material or manufacture or what you will, is unprotected under the laws of the United States.

Take the question of our mechanics. As ship-builders we see the fruits of their labor and their skill in what is known as our coastwise trade. And let not that coastwise trade be dwarfed in the minds or imaginations of men. It is not the coastwise trade of a little island like Great Britain, nor of France, nor of Germany with her half-dozen points of access to the seaboard. It is 13,000 miles of seacoast, with its countless ports and harbors. It is a coastwise trade that circumvents the continent of South America, because between the Pacific States reaching to Alaska to the Atlantic States reaching to the northernmost part of Maine, vessels which traverse those 9,000 miles are engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. Vessels for this trade of the largest size, of the greatest capacity, are constructed solely by American skill and labor, and they form a commercial marine of which the people of this country well may be proud, and the superiors to which do not exist anywhere.

I saw a few months ago a vessel launched within half a mile of my own home, and here within two weeks I noticed her arrival at Portland, in Oregon, a steamship of some 3,000 tons burden built in the modest little city of Wilmington, running with perfect safety from the capes of the Delaware around Cape Horn and up the coast of South America and Mexico to Portland, Oreg., and making a rate of speed of which I have no knowledge of any record that is superior. Where are there such specimens of marine architecture, skill, luxury, and power as those floating palaces which you see upon the American bays and rivers? They are never seen or known in other countries than our own. There are dozens of steamships and steamboats that will carry from two to three thousand passengers with safety and an unequaled speed; and all that is the result of the mechanical skill of Americans, something of which we not only are proud, but something in the presence of which we experience a sense of security because we know that when that constructive skill and power shall be needed for the maintenance of our national honor or defense the means are here and that they can and will be exerted in aid of both.

I have a right with some degree of pride, that ought to be shared by every man in this Chamber, to refer to the exhibition of skill constantly given by American shipwrights. The steam-yatcht Nourmahal, launched the other day for a wealthy citizen of New York (also built by a firm in the city in which I live, who have built and furnished to the Government men-of-war, monitors, vessels of all sizes and descriptions), is to-day unparalleled in luxury, in skill of construction, in beauty as a craft of that kind.

This is part of the coastwise trade; this is part of the American skill; and the proposition is now under the amendment of the Senator from Missouri (which I take to be an essential part of the free-ship propositions) to place these men in fair competition with free material, with ship-builders elsewhere, and my answer is I believe they are ready for it. They are not petitioning the Government for aid or for subsidies. They are asking only, and will ever obtain through me, a fair field and no favor. They are simply asking that whatever may be the laws made in this country the principle of equality shall be fairly preserved as nearly as you can arrange it.

There is a difference of opinion among these parties in respect of their capability of competing even with free material, with the untaxed material and operatives of other countries, and it is as yet an experiment whether they can do so successfully or not. I would have rather tried the experiment and continued it a little longer of stripping American ship-building and ship-owning of the present unnecessary burdens caused by unwise shipping laws, excessive consular taxes, and other burdens which are sought to be lifted from them either by the House bill or still more effectively by the Senate bill in those clauses which relate to it, before we came to trying the question of the free ship and the free material. But it is obvious to me that competition is that which we need; that a greater commercial freedom is that which the people of this country require; that there must be something like reciprocity of trade, an outlet for the exchange of productions and the results of American labor and skill; otherwise we shall have this wretched condition of convulsed home markets, of paralyzed labor, of enforced idleness with all the dreadful consequences upon those who live by the labor of their hands which we have witnessed growing upon us month by month and year by year.

Mr. President, the question is mighty; it is complex. It is not simply the question of the rate of wages, but two other conditions must be annexed to that to make them satisfactory: that the purchasing power of those wages shall be sufficient comfortably to support an industrious man, and that his employment shall be steady, constant, and not interrupted and spasmodic, as has been the rule under the present tariff system. I have not taken up a newspaper for weeks, nay for months, but I have seen the proof of interrupted, irregular occupation of men, not voluntary idlers, not men prone to disturbance, but men who were willing to continue steadily occupied provided the work of every day could supply the wants of every day for themselves and their dependent families.

If the people of this country and those who assume to make laws for and govern them shall not be sensible of the needs and reasonable requirements of those whose task it is to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their faces, then I say they must look for difficulties, for social disorder, and danger that will not only imperil the happiness and welfare of the workingman but which will endanger the accumulations of the labor of others.

This question has too many sides to be discussed at this hour and in this way, for I have no speech prepared, but merely am giving those views which by the pleasure of the Senate I am obliged to give at this time and somewhat inconveniently to myself.

I wish to place on record on the subject of the building of ships two letters from men whose life has been dedicated to this work. They are both leading ship-builders in the town in which I live, and I do not believe there are in the United States any other two men better qualified to speak or more disposed to speak candidly and truthfully upon this subject. I will ask the Secretary to read this letter addressed to me on the subject of free material and free ships.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WILMINGTON, DEL., May 1, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your telegram of even date asking if, with materials admitted free, I should oppose free ships for foreign trade, and also an expression relative to an import duty of $15 per ton.

I have replied that I should not oppose free ships for foreign trade should materials be admitted free of duty.

This is only so far as relates to the interest of the ship-builder in the question, for I am satisfied from a personal examination of the matter that a given sum of money expended for labor alone in an American iron-ship yard will produce as much return as the same sum expended in a foreign one, and simply because the American workman is supplemented by much more and more efficient labor-saving machinery than is to be found in use abroad, and further, the American week is sixty hours, while that of the English and Scotch is fifty-four hours.

There is little, if any, difference between the price of a given ship, specifications being the same, here and in England, and with the advantage of free materials the American builder will be able to offer the merchants of his country ships as cheap as they can obtain them abroad.

With an import duty of $15 per ton, or even $12, the American builder would have the advantage.

But the solution of the problem of the restoration of the carrying trade of the world in large measure to American ships or those enjoying an American register is not to be found by any means in reducing the cost of vessels. Nearly or quite all of the items which constitute the sum total of expense of running ships are greater to those under American registry than to any others, and to such an extent does this reach that if the American merchant were able to procure his ships new for nothing he still could not successfully compete with those of either Italy, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, or England.

It would be a long story to tell you in detail why this is. It is, however, summed up in this: that the American ship buys her goods (the expenses of running) in a taxed market and sells her wares (her freight rates and passenger tickets) in the open and untaxed one of the world.

Congress is powerless to compel the employer of an American vessel, the purchaser of her wares in the port of Hong-Kong or in Madras, to pay 20 per cent. more for the goods than an Englishman is willing to accept for the same, as it has full power to do in Baltimore with the purchaser of a woolen blanket, and by consequence the ship-owner suffers and wisely abstains from ordering ships to be built at all.

I am unable to see any remedy for the decline of American ship-owning so long as the unwise attempt of the American people to keep their standards of value above the world's level by means of import duties remains in practice. When returning good sense or the force of resultant circumstances shall have brought about a change, then we may hope to see the American flag again on the ocean.

I am, very truly, yours,

WILLIAM G. GIBBONS.

Hon. T. F. BAYARD,
United States Senate, Washington.

Mr. BAYARD. It is right that I should in connection with that send up a second letter from another eminent ship-builder of the same city.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE HARLAN AND HOLLINGSWORTH COMPANY,
Wilmington, Del., May 1, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I was in Philadelphia when your telegram was received or would have replied promptly.

Free materials are not of much use to iron-ship builders in this country for the reasons—

First. That American materials are much superior to what is used by the English in their iron ships, and hence the American iron will be preferred for this reason.

Second. The loss of time in getting orders filled in England and delivering the same in our yard, say sixty to ninety days, will always be a drawback to the use of English iron. Our experience is that when a party decides to order a steamship or steamboat he wants it completed with all the dispatch possible, and would hardly be willing to wait the time necessary to import it.

Third. As a very large portion of the iron used in iron hulls and boilers is what we call pattern-iron, and can not be ordered as soon as the contract is made, but is ordered from time to time as we come to it in the progress of construction, it will be seen that free materials would not benefit iron-ship builders much, because they could not largely avail themselves of it.

Fourth. Free materials would benefit wooden-ship builders very considerably.

If a free-ship bill were to pass Congress of course it would be eminently just to admit materials free of duty.

We do not hesitate to say that it would be a great misfortune to the iron-ship builders of this country for such a bill to pass Congress in face of the fact that we have skilled labor and materials of every kind, and the ship-builders and mechanics are able to build all the ships that will be needed for the foreign trade, and no necessity to open a market for foreign builders.

If such a bill were to pass it would only be just that a duty of say $15 per gross ton on freight ships should be imposed, and say $20 per gross ton on the passenger ship, in order that this class of imports should be placed on the same general footing of other articles, and do no one any injustice.

This answers your questions according to our best judgment, although rather briefly done.

Very truly, yours, &c.,

J. TAYLOR GAUSE, President.

Hon. THOMAS F. BAYARD,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BAYARD. Here are two independent views from men whose opinions are entitled to great respect on every score. It will be observed that the gentleman whose letter was first read believes that, with free material, American skill and labor and the superiority of the labor-saving machinery of the United States would enable our ship-builders fairly and successfully to compete with the foreign makers. The other doubts that, because from the peculiarity of the construction of iron ships every plate must be made as a piece of machinery and have its place in the ship, and scarcely any two have the same angle and the same measurement, except they are in immediate correspondence on each side of the ship from each other; and that, therefore, as these plates must be rolled and made to suit the peculiar configuration and model of the ship, it is impracticable to attempt to import them to order except with the delay to which he has referred.

The amendment before the Senate will, in my judgment, go further to aid this occupation of ship-building than heretofore has been possible by creating great yards of repair. It has been only by a vast use of highly taxed material that a ship, either sailing or steam, wood or iron, could be repaired in this country. They have been compelled to put back in a crippled condition in search of a port where untaxed materials could be had in which to repair. But the present amendment, if it should be adopted, will necessarily permit all material necessary for the alteration and repair of ships to be imported free of duty. An accident arising on a voyage to this country can be remedied by the workshops of this country, a thing which to-day is never done except in extreme cases, for they will make the most superficial attempt at repair and await the larger and more extensive expenditures in a port where they can get their materials untaxed. If materials should be untaxed, then repair will be made in this country as well and perhaps better and more conveniently than abroad. Therefore I can see much greater advantages to our ship-builders and ship-owners from the present amendment than I was able to place before the intelligent correspondent whose letter was last read to the Senate.

Now, sir, looking at this question, as I am trying to do, from all sides, I can see in this admission of free material to build ships an inequality before the law as affecting other citizens. I never have been able to restrict my sense of public duty to the interests of those who live around my own home. I never have been able to restrict my sense of public duty to the interests of any one class in this country or any one occupation of men; and it seems to me plain that if two men shall approach the custom-house, one importing material to build a ship and he gets it free and untaxed, and another, engaged in another occupation equally meritorious and laudable, seeks to introduce the same material and is admonished that he must pay from 50 to 60 or 70 or 80 or 100 per cent., the inequality before the law is too manifest, it is too unjust. It is obviously an objection to a scheme that shall make it necessary in order to enable a manufacture to be carried on in this country that inequality before the law should accompany the privilege. Yet this is but one illustration of the disabilities placed upon the American mechanic in his competition with his rivals in other countries by the level of high prices for everything produced by our tariff. He is necessarily excluded from every other than his home market by a system that increases home competition and increases the cost of production.

There is, I know, a great difference between vessel property and other property. The ocean, the high sea, is the home of a ship. She is but an occasional visitor to the shore. The land, where local law prevails, is that which she sees at rare intervals. Nine-tenths, nineteen-twentieths of the life of a ship is spent outside of the jurisdiction of any nation. Neither the protecting hand nor the taxing power of a nation can reach a vessel on the high seas; but when she shall come but for a moment to her home port, then it is proposed to saddle her with all the weight of taxation placed upon other descriptions of property which regularly and necessarily have the protective arm of the local law extended over them. If allegiance is correlative to protection, possibly taxation should have its correlative of protection, and, therefore, where protection can not be given, taxation ought not in justice to be levied. All that I recognize; and I can well understand how it is naturally impossible to send a piece of property abroad into the untaxed markets of the world burdened with its home taxation and expect it favorably to compete with those free from such burdens. It can not be in reason, it is not so in fact; and if an illustration were needed, look at the condition of the American commercial marine to-day; it is the inevitable result.

You speak of labor necessary to carry on this business of navigation. What is the labor employed in navigating a ship? Untaxed and absolutely free to men of all nations and colors; 95 per cent., as we are told, and I suppose told truly, of all the men engaged in navigating vessels that leave and arrive at the American ports, whether under the American flag or not, are foreigners. There is absolutely free competition, free trade in the fullest sense of the word in the labor employed in navigating American ships. No suggestion of "protection" to American labor in that business, and none in fact to labor in any other line of business. As to labor, it is simply a question of demand and supply, with every inducement to make the supply as ample as possible, so that labor shall be purchased at the lowest possible rates that the freest competition can create.

There is no such thing as protection there. Whatever may be elsewhere there can be none in that. I have before me the remarks of the Senator from Maine in charge of this bill on the effect of a protective tariff on the labor employed on American ships. I read from his remarks made on the 30th of April:

My opinion is that it is what is ordinarily termed the protective tariff that increases wages. You can not increase by a protective tariff the wages of men who work in factories and machine-shops, and keep the wages of farmers down; it is an utter impossibility. You can not increase the wages of men in the factories and in the machine-shops and on the farms, and keep the sailors down. You can not have in this country one class of men with wages down to English wages and German wages, and nine other classes with their wages up to the present scale of American wages. That is an utter impossibility. It is the protective tariff which does this, and the only way for the other side to do is to adopt square free trade, cut down American wages to English, German, and French wages, and then pass a free-ship law, and we can get our sailors as cheap as they can and run in competition with them across the ocean.

Mr. BAYARD. If it would not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. FRYE. It will not interrupt me a particle. I have no speech to make.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator except to say that as he has——

Mr. FRYE. I should not like to yield for a reply right here. I thought the Senator wished to ask me a question.

Mr. BAYARD. I asked a question and the Senator answered it. I merely wished to say that the result of his answer logically, and in words, is that a protective tariff is inconsistent with American ship-owning.

And just so it is we are told here by Mr. Gibbons that, given a ship free and compelling a man to run it under the increased cost which the tariff causes, and my friend from Maine says it is the tariff, and loss will follow the ownership, so that the man will be glad to get rid of the ship and discharge the captain and crew. If this is to continue, there is no mystery about it. It is not worth while to talk about free ships, it is not worth while to talk about the American flag flying over the American commercial marine. If a tariff as described by my friend from Maine exists that renders it absolutely impossible to run ships at the same expense that every other nation can but ourselves, it is not worth while to go into further causes. American ship-owning for the foreign trade is rendered impossible by the American tariff. This is, however, but one illustration of a system which affects every other part of the country's commerce and business.

Believing as I do there must be even for an admitted abuse a gradual correction, I am in hopes sooner or later, and I hope soon rather than late, that there shall be an embarkation by the people of the United States upon an extension of commercial freedom. I believe it to be essential for the safety and welfare of this country, for every branch of labor in it, for every branch of manufacture, ship-builders, cotton-spinners, woolen-mills, what you please, farmers, miners and all. I believe that mechanics and every class of people in this country are interested in an increase, an expansion of our commercial freedom, and I believe there is a necessity for this. Then a reduction in the cost of running vessels and of making vessels will come with an increased commerce; and believing in that, and that there may be in the minds of the commercial classes—I speak of the commercial classes, those engaged in shipping and importation and exportation—it is their interest just as much as that of the farmer of the Territory of Wyoming or Dakota, just as much in the interest of any wheat or cotton grower in this country whose staples form a great part of our exports. I believe our interest is to have greater freedom in commerce, a system of reciprocal exchanges of commodities, an increase of profit to the American people growing out of the carrying trade of the world, from which at present under our system we are absolutely debarred.

Mr. President, I read the other day among the nostrums proposed for the purpose of restoring American shipping a pamphlet, handsomely printed of course, and issued by the Union League Club of the city of New York, a political organization of luxurious citizens, and they propose in their resolutions first:

That the purchase of foreign-built vessels and their registry in the United States are in conflict with the true interests of the country.

Secondly:

That it is the duty of Congress to provide for adequately defending our harbors.

No doubt very true. Third:

That Congress should make all appropriate provision within its power to restore our navigation to the footing necessary for the safety and prosperity of the whole country—

Another very glittering generality to which no one would take exception. But then listen to the "lame and impotent conclusion" that follows; how do they propose to restore our navigation to the footing necessary for the safety and prosperity of the whole country?—

and to this end it should follow the example of foreign governments, which have been successful in building up their trade and commerce, and aid in establishing lines of iron or steel mail steamers to all points where a market may be found for our surplus manufactures.

Mr. President, not to speak disrespectfully, what arrant stuff and nonsense is such a remedy! To talk of finding a market for our surplus manufactures in the face of our present tariff! There is not a man within the sound of my voice but knows perfectly well that if freight was to be free American manufactures can not compete, in the present condition of American tariff taxation, in the markets of the world. The fact is so, and therefore it is nonsense, or worse than nonsense, for a body of gentlemen at ease, to be trifling with the intelligence of the country by proposing that which the whole of this debate and admissions and statements on every side have shown to be an impossibility, and that is to find under our present rates of duty a foreign market for our surplus manufactures; and then, forsooth, they propose to do that by following "the example of foreign governments!" If we follow the example of foreign governments we might find ourselves following many things inconsistent with the system of high duties. No, sir, the fact remains as stated by Mr. Gibbons in his letter read at the desk, it is useless to attempt to build and run ships profitably in the foreign trade so long as the present scale and level of taxation is retained within the United States that now prevails. His reasons have been given, and I can not state them as well as he, and therefore they will stand as the answer of an intelligent American mechanic to all this talk of restoring navigation to a footing necessary for the safety and prosperity of the whole country, and yet maintaining a system of taxation which renders it absolutely impossible.

I will not detain the Senate or myself longer by commenting on this further than to say that having driven us from the field as one of their competitors, and having the matter pretty much their own way so far as the carrying trade of the world is concerned—for, incredible as it may seem, 52 per cent. of the carrying trade and commerce of this world is conducted by a nation of some 33,000,000 of people out of a population of perhaps 1,200,000,000, for I believe that is the estimate of the world's population—but even with all that vessel-owning and vessel-running under the subsidies which have been given by England, the average dividends of the whole of these great leading steamship lines for the last eight years has been 4⅜ per cent. I apprehend that such a dividend as that will not be much inducement for American capital to embark in shipping. We may as well take the facts as we find them. I have always believed that when it was profitable for Americans to own ships in the foreign trade they would in some way turn their attention to it and manage to become ship-owners.

It is not worth while to go back to the reasons why we could at one time build wooden ships and operate them successfully under the system of prohibition as to all foreign ships from American registry, because our tariff has doubled since then and the conditions of the world's commerce have greatly changed since then. The fact is plain to-day that there is no such thing as a profitable owning and running of an American ship in the foreign trade under an American register with our present condition of tariff and shipping laws. I believe it would be wiser to amend those laws in the manner that is suggested by both Houses and by the Senate bill, even beyond the recommendation of the House, and content ourselves at this time with lightening these burdens upon our ships. I believe that would be wiser; but if the proposition of free materials and free ships not for the coastwise trade is to be voted on, I shall vote in favor of it. I do not think that those gentlemen, in New York chiefly, who seem to be so desirous of registering foreign-built vessels under the American flag will find profit in that. At the same time I can see that there is some justice in their demand, and I for one am willing to lean and to let our mechanics lean on the basis of free material to meet their plan of free ships of not less than 4,000 tons, which shall not, however, be allowed to engage in the coastwise trade in this country.

As to that coastwise trade, there are many more reasons for the restriction of the coastwise trade to American vessels, and perhaps stronger reasons to be stated in favor of that restriction than have yet been given. I have not studied all those reasons and am not prepared at this time fully to give them; but I can plainly see that with a seacoast like our own if it were open to the coastwise traffic of foreign vessels it would be in vain to talk about the maintenance of a tariff system in this country. Our own people engaged in our own ships form a police and a protection to their own land that no foreigners ever could supply. There is the allegiance and there is the home of the American coastwise trader to protect this country against embarking in the introduction of dutiable goods from abroad. With Cuba within a few miles of our coast, with the quick passage which can readily be made now across the Atlantic, if foreign vessels manned by foreign seamen under the control of foreign interests could engage in the coastwise trade, I can perfectly well understand that it would be a very difficult matter to secure our duties from imports. But there is no proposition at this time that there should be any such invasion, and against such an invasion I should be prepared to vote. I do not apprehend, however, that the admission of a 4,000-ton ship made abroad, excluded from the coastwise traffic, would have the slightest danger of imperiling the monopoly which exists in its favor, if you can call that a monopoly which belongs to the entire people—I call it rather the invasion of the American system which confines our coastwise trade to our own people and has nothing to do with foreign nations or their interests.

Mr. President, I do not desire to delay a vote on this matter. I believe that it is seldom that a bill of more importance comes before the Senate or involving more important principles. I should have preferred to speak upon it more deliberately than I have, but I felt it right to say as much as I have said, and I am obliged by fatigue and the lateness of the hour to leave the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. VEST (when Mr. COCKRELL's name was called). My colleague [Mr. COCKRELL] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. My colleague would vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. KENNA (when Mr. GARLAND's name was called). On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND]. If he were here, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JACKSON (when the name of Mr. HARRIS was called). My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is necessarily absent, and is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY]. I understand that my colleague would vote "yea" if present.

Mr. JONES, of Florida (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. VAN WYCK (when his name was called). On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM]. He is opposed to the amendment and I am in favor of it.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HALE. On this vote the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. The Senator from South Carolina would vote "yea," if present, and the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "nay."

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY], but another pair has been announced for the Senator from Rhode Island, and I transfer that to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], so that the pair stands between the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is absent from the city and paired on this question with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. My colleague, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted for the amendment. I understand, however, that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN] understood that I was paired with him on this question. I did not so understand it myself as to this bill; but I withdraw my vote, that being his understanding.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS].

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Farley,	McPherson,	Ransom,
Beck,	Groome,	Maxey,	Slater,

Cockrell,	Harrison,	Pike,
Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Sabin,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRYE. I am unanimously instructed by the Committee on Commerce to offer the following amendment, to come in after section 18 in the bill:

SEC. —. That a master of a vessel in the foreign trade may engage a seaman at any port in the United States, in the manner provided by law, to serve on a voyage to any port, or for the round trip from and to the port of departure, or for a definite time, whatever the destination. The master of a vessel making regular and stated trips between the United States and a foreign country may engage a seaman for one or more round trips, or for a definite time, or on the return of said vessel to the United States may reship such seaman for another voyage in the same vessel, in the manner provided by law, without the payment of additional fees to any officer for such reshipment or re-engagement.

SEC. —. That every master of a vessel in the foreign trade may engage any seaman at any port out of the United States, in the manner provided by law, to serve for one or more round trips from and to the port of departure, or for a definite time, whatever the destination; and the master of a vessel clearing from a port of the United States with one or more seamen engaged in a foreign port as herein provided shall not be required to reship in a port of the United States the seamen so engaged, or to give bond, as required by section 4176 of the Revised Statutes, to produce said seamen before a boarding officer on the return of said vessel to the United States.

SEC. —. That the word "port" as used in sections 4178 and 4334 of the Revised Statutes, in reference to painting the name and port of every registered or licensed vessel on the stern of such vessel, shall be construed to mean either the port where the vessel is registered or enrolled, or the place in the same district where the vessel was built or where one or more of the owners reside.

SEC. —. That until the provisions of section 1, chapter 376, of the laws of 1882 shall be made applicable to passengers coming into the United States by land carriages said provisions shall not apply to passengers coming by vessels employed exclusively in the trade between the ports of the United States and the ports of the Dominion of Canada or the ports of Mexico.

I believe there is no objection to any of these provisions. The committee unanimously reported in favor of them.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. In section 5, line 10, "but in case the master of the vessel so sold shall" in the bill as it stands there is a semicolon. It should not be a semicolon; it should be a comma. I ask that that change may be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). The change will be made.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to strike out section 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section proposed to be stricken out will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 19, as follows:

SEC. 19. That section 3976 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, repealed; and that section 4009 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended and re-enacted so as to read as follows, to wit:

"SEC. 4009. For transporting the mails of the United States between any port of the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the Atlantic and ports in the Pacific, touching at any foreign port, a sum not exceeding $1 per mile, on the trip each way, of actual nautical miles traveled between terminal points, for each trip actually made; but such service shall be performed only under contract entered into by the Postmaster-General, after legal advertisement, with the lowest responsible bidder; and the aggregate amount to be expended for such service shall not exceed the gross revenues of the Post-Office Department of the United State on mail matter sent to and received from foreign countries during the fiscal year next preceding the year in which such contracts are made, less the amount paid for transportation on foreign vessels, and the net amount paid foreign administrations for intermediary, territorial, and sea transit of such mails. The ships with which such contracts shall be made shall be ships of American registry only, and contracts shall be for a term of not less than four years; and the general laws regulating the transportation of inland mails shall be applicable to such contracts, except as herein provided. And all vessels engaged in such contracts shall in time of war be subject to purchase or charter by the United States at reasonable rates; and all foreign vessels or sailing vessels carrying the mails of the United States may be allowed a sum not exceeding the sea-postage now allowed by law."

Mr. VEST. Let me suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that we now take up the bill and consider it by sections.

Mr. FRYE. What is the necessity of that? That is not usual in the Senate or anywhere else where a bill is proceeded with generally. I asked in the first place to take it up by sections, and that was objected to. I take it there is no other amendment to offer except——

Mr. VEST. The Senator is mistaken about that. We shall get through it more rapidly if we take it up by sections.

Mr. FRYE. We are in Committee of the Whole; and will the Senator consent that now the House bill shall be taken up in place of this, and read that by sections?

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to that if the Senate will go on and perfect the bill we have now, and then substitute it for the House bill.

Mr. FRYE. That is what I proposed originally to do.

Mr. VEST. The systematic way is to take it up by sections.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent to take up the House bill and that it be read by sections for amendment.

Mr. HALE and others. That is right.

Mr. FRYE. Then I will offer in amendment everything that has been already put on the Senate bill. I have it already, and if there is any desire to amend any of those sections amendments can be moved to those.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that he had better accept the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri and take up the bill by sections. It will not be necessary to read the sections anew, as they have been read once before. It will be getting so many amendments out of the way.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests that, the bill having been once read, it be taken now by sections, and there is no necessity of reading the sections. If that is so, it obviates all the objection I had.

Mr. VEST. I think far the best way is to run through the Senate bill, and then take up the House bill and offer the amendments to the House bill.

Mr. FRYE. Then I will ask that the bill may now be open to amendment by sections, and that the reading of the sections may be dispensed with by unanimous consent, the bill having already been read once. Let the Secretary call the numbers of the sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moved an amendment, to strike out one section, section 19.

Mr. FRYE. When we reach that he can offer it.

Mr. BAYARD. I withdraw the amendment for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. The Secretary will call the sections by number.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any amendments to offer to section 1? No amendment being offered, that section will be passed.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any amendment to be offered to section 2? No amendment being offered, that section is passed.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any amendment to section 3? No amendment being offered, that section is passed.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any amendment to section 4? No amendment being offered, the section is passed.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no amendment to section 5, it will be passed.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No amendment being offered, section 6 is passed.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 7.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No amendment being offered, section 7 is passed.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No amendment being offered to section 8, the next section will be called.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No amendment being offered, the section is passed. The next section will be called.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 10.

Mr. VEST. I want to suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that we have now adopted an amendment to this bill which enables an owner of an American vessel to make a contract with an American seaman for a round trip or for a stated period; and it seems to me this section 10 ought to be amended by putting in after the word "same," in the third line, the words "before leaving the port at which such seaman may be engaged," because otherwise this section would prevent the master of a vessel from paying the seaman any wages until the conclusion of the whole trip, if it was six months or a year. We do not mean that. I make that suggestion.

Mr. FRYE. I see no objection to that.

Mr. VEST. I think that would make the section consonant with the other amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to section 10.

Mr. VEST. It would be better to put in the words after the word "wages," in the second line, so as to read:

That it shall be, and is hereby, made unlawful in any case to pay any seaman wages before leaving the port at which such seaman may be engaged in advance of the time when he has actually earned the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I notice in the morning papers that one of the judges of the circuit court of the United States has been compelled to haul up a shipping commissioner and administer to him a very severe rebuke and deny the allowance of his accounts. It appears from the statement in the papers that the commissioner had had opportunity to abuse the power of his office to the extent of giving to his own family salaries amounting to as much as $4,000 a year, one of them a boy 19 years of age; and I believe there were four or five members of that family who received these large salaries or large amounts of money at least under the fee system awarded to shipping commissioners for their services.

I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill or the chairman of the committee whether they have considered the question of substituting a salary for fees in cases of that kind? In the case I refer to I believe the amount of money which should have been paid into the Treasury of the United States within the last four or five years was something like $50,000 in excess of the salaries that this officer and his proper employés would have been authorized to receive under a proper system. It seems to me that while we are perfecting the subject of navigation and the navigation laws it would be very well indeed if we should substitute a salary to the shipping commissioners in place of fees. Let the Government of the United States pay shipping commissioners at the different ports and not require the shipmaster or the ship-owner, or whoever it may be, to pay any fees at all for the shipping of the crew.

I discover that a prohibition is put here against paying advance wages to a seaman, or "to any other person, or to any person other than an officer authorized by act of Congress to collect fees for such service in remuneration for the shipment of seamen." I am not conversant enough with the practice of shipping men to undertake myself to frame an amendment which I think the committee could recommend or would see the propriety of, and I venture to suggest this now in order that some gentleman in charge of this subject may consider it, so that by the time we get through the bill we can go back to it if necessary and make the proper amendment.

Mr. CONGER. At the time the shipping commissioners' law was passed objections were made to having the appointment of commissioners made by the political power, and it was provided that the appointments should be made and the amount of salary paid to the commissioner and his deputies should be fixed and supervised by the courts, contrary to the usual custom in such cases. The object of it was to prevent these commissioners from having any political relations with the shipping men, but whether it was a wise provision or not I do not know. The judge has entire power to determine the amount of compensation to the commissioner. He has the appointment of the commissioner, and fixes the compensation from time to time and the compensation of the assistants.

In the case referred to the court has in the exercise of that power cited the commissioner before it, and as I know from another source has required the commissioner to show cause why he should not be removed from office for employing his whole family as his deputies and paying them salaries, not quite $4,000, but about $3,900 each, a subject-matter which some members of the committee had called the attention of the judge to some months ago. From what I have seen in the papers I have no doubt that that evil which the special committee of the House and Senate called the attention of the judge to, and took testimony in regard to a year ago last fall, is being examined into and will be corrected.

A change of the law providing for the appointment of these officers in the ordinary way, subject to the revision of Congress, I think should be made, not in this bill but in a bill appropriate to that subject and seeking a better control over that class of officers. It was calculated that the fees of the office should be enough, and only enough, to remunerate the commissioner and his assistants for the proper discharge of their duties, and it was not intended that it should be a source of revenue to the Government. I may say that that subject has been under consideration before the Committee on Commerce, and undoubtedly some proposition will be presented to the Senate to correct the evil complained of.

Mr. VEST. As has been said by the Senator from Alabama, the morning papers show a remarkable condition of affairs in New York. Let me read the dispatch in the morning papers:

NEW YORK, May 5, 1884.

Judge Wallace, of the United States district court, handed down a decision this morning in the matter of salaries paid by Shipping Commissioner C. C. Duncan to his deputies, in which the court, after discussing the nature of the office, says: "The action of the commissioner in appointing five deputies, salaried at $3,000 each, four of whom were his own sons, one of these sons only 19 years old, with no more experience or qualification for the place than his years would imply, compels a very cogent inference that he had conceived a scheme for administering his office which was not only illegitimate as a radical departure from that contemplated by the law, but which was utterly repugnant to all notions of economy and decency." Judge Wallace concludes by ordering Mr. Duncan to show cause why he should not be removed from office.

I do not read this for the purpose of making any personal application to the commissioner in the city of New York. Of course the receipts of that office are the most important of the whole United States; but I do it to show how this system is amenable to just criticism because it permits such things to be done as the judge has made known by his decision. Some time ago there was a libel suit against the New York Times by Shipping Commissioner Duncan, and he was required to bring into court his report. Without detaining the Senate, the report that Mr. Duncan made of the receipts of his office and the expenditures, commencing with 1872 and running to 1882, was:

	Total receipts.	Total expenses.
1872	$20,303 50	$20,960 50
1873	37,765 15	39,191 25
1874	54,826 00	54,699 88
1875	51,361 12	51,794 54
1876	30,576 25	31,149 03
1877	28,650 25	28,870 58
1878	34,559 75	34,282 11
1879	30,921 00	30,921 00
1880	25,948 50	25,948 50
1881	24,279 93	24,279 93

In other words, he managed to absorb the entire receipts of that office every year, and it all springs from a defect in the statutes. I dislike these personalities as much as any one can. The Revised Statutes permit him to run his whole office at his own price, and as the court found in this instance, he hired an office worth $1,500 a year and charged $5,000 a year rent. The report also shows that he had a surplus over and above his own salary, which could only be $5,000 a year, of $12,000 or $16,000, and under the Revised Statutes he was permitted to hire as many clerks as he pleased and pay them the salaries he pleased, and he took this surplus over and above his own salary and divided it into four parts and gave it to his sons. That is the evidence, and upon that this judgment of the United States circuit court was made in the case which I have just read from the newspapers.

There is no party feeling in this matter. The opinion was delivered by a judge opposed to me in politics, I believe. At any rate he is a Federal official, and I speak of this simply as a sample. The statute as it exists now permits any United States shipping commissioner to hire as many clerks as he pleases and to pay what rent he pleases, without any responsibility.

Mr. ALLISON. Is the Senator quite clear that that is the law? As I understand the law the shipping commissioners are appointed by the circuit courts in the several circuits, and the circuit courts supervise the accounts and supervise the number of employés and their wages. So that this shipping commissioner, with reference to his clerks and deputies, always had the assent of the court in this regard; and it seems to me that the accountability ought to placed in the Treasury or in some other place than in the courts of the United States.

Mr. VEST. I will read to my friend from Iowa the statute. It is very singular that such a statute was ever enacted or should be permitted to stand. Chapter 1, title 53, in regard to "shipping commissioners," provides as follows:

SEC. 4501. The several circuit courts within the jurisdiction of which there is a port of entry which is also a port of ocean navigation shall appoint a commissioner for each such port which in their judgment may require the same, such commissioners to be termed shipping commissioners; and may, from time to time, remove from office any commissioner whom the court may have reason to believe does not properly perform his duties, and shall then provide for the proper performance of his duties until another person is duly appointed in his place. Such courts shall regulate the mode of conducting business in the shipping offices to be established by the shipping commissioners as hereinafter provided; and shall have full and complete control over the same, subject to the provisions herein contained.

There is the whole provision as to jurisdiction, and unless complaint is made, or unless the circuit court moves itself, as a matter of course the shipping commissioners do as they please. Section 4505 reads:

SEC. 4505. Any shipping commissioner may engage clerks to assist him in the transaction of the business of the shipping office, at his own proper cost, and may, in case of necessity, depute such clerks to act for him in his official capacity; but the shipping commissioner shall be held responsible for the acts of every such clerk or deputy, and will be personally liable for any penalties such clerk or deputy may incur by the violation of any of the provisions of this title; and all acts done by a clerk as such deputy shall be as valid and binding as if done by the shipping commissioner.

Again:

SEC. 4507. Every shipping commissioner shall lease, rent, or procure, at his own cost, suitable premises for the transaction of business, and for the preservation of the books and other documents connected therewith; and these premises shall be styled the shipping commissioner's office.

Mr. CONGER. Now will the Senator read the last section but one in the act. He will see the limitation.

Mr. VEST. The Senator means the limitation of salary.

Mr. CONGER. I mean the last section but one of the original act.

Mr. VEST. In the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 4595. Every shipping commissioner, and every clerk and employé in any shipping office, who demands or receives any remuneration whatever, either directly or indirectly, for hiring or supplying any seamen for any merchant vessels, excepting the lawful fees payable under this title, shall, for every such offense, be liable to a penalty of not more than $200.

Mr. CONGER. That is not it. Section 66 of the original act, if the Senator will allow me, provides:

SEC. 66. That in no case shall the salary, fees, and emoluments of any officer appointed under this act be more than $5,000 per annum; and any additional fees shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will allow me. The opinion of Judge Wallace is given at length in some of the New York papers, particularly in the Times, which I have before me, in which he goes over this whole question of allowances. It seems that from year to year there have been questions raised about the performances of the Duncans, but as Judge Wallace says the auditing and allowing of the accounts that have been done before by his predecessors have not been upon a full statement of all the facts. The Duncans were allowed pretty much to have an ex parte hearing, and Judge Wallace expressly exonerates his predecessors from any fault or negligence, because the whole facts had not been presented to them. The accounts are undoubtedly subject, as the opinion shows, to the auditing, control, and allowance or disallowance of the judges; but never until now has this most enormous piece of greed and fraud been brought to light, and it is an instance of how the American people will bear a thing to go along for years that ought to be investigated and plucked up by the roots. I do not know of anything of its magnitude that is worse than this performance of the Duncans; and the merchant marine, the shipping interest, is to be congratulated that at last it has been brought out in all its enormity. The whole of the facts are disclosed in the opinion of Judge Wallace which I have just been reading, and it is enough to excite the indignation of any man, and it is not a party question, as the Senator from Missouri says.

Mr. VEST. Not at all; and what the Senator from Maine has just stated simply corroborates my assertion. The system permits this. It is true that the United States circuit judge has the power under this statute to remove any commissioner, to examine his accounts as he may those of any other officer appointed in his court; but until there is some complaint, until the matter has come before the judge, it is never done. Here has come the exposure, it is true; but when has it come? It has come after eight years, it has come after this man has absorbed $20,000 a year in payments to himself and his family, and $1,500 was the rent paid for his office, but he allowed himself $5,000 under this clause of the statute.

Mr. HALE. It is about eleven years.

Mr. VEST. Yes.

Mr. HALE. The Times makes this remarkable statement:

The total receipts of the office from the time of Captain Duncan's appointment in August, 1872, up to January 1, 1883, were $361,822.95, and the sum of $496.97 is all that he has ever paid into the national Treasury.

Mr. VEST. He has absorbed that vast amount. To permit that sort of thing is simply intolerable; and when the Senate of the United States upon the action of a judge upon the record finds that a system permits that sort of thing, it ought not to allow it to remain. I have drawn amendments which I will submit to the Senate. I hope they can be made better; they are the best I could do in the time allowed me. The first of them does away with this system under the circuit courts to some extent. The Secretary can read them:

The CHIEF CLERK. "That section 4501 of the Revised Statutes"——

Mr. FRYE. The Senators are anxious to leave, and of course I do not wish to weary the patience of the Senate. I will ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered to-morrow after the morning business and completed.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] has given notice that he would occupy the attention of the Senate at that time.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that, but the Senator only asked half an hour and he will undoubtedly postpone that until we finish this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that this bill be taken up and considered immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me suggest to the Senator from Maine that he should also ask unanimous consent that at some hour general debate should cease on the bill, and that the pending amendment and others to be offered shall then be voted on.

Mr. FRYE. I supposed that general debate had now ceased. I will ask that this bill be taken up for consideration to-morrow morning after the morning business and that debate be limited to five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall have to object to that. I have not expressed any opinions on the bill, because the bill has not been in a shape that I could give my views of it properly. I shall be very brief in what I have to say, but I can not say it in five minutes.

Mr. FRYE. I then ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up to-morrow morning after the morning business.

Mr. VEST. Let my amendments be read.

Mr. FRYE. The amendments can be printed, and then they will be in better condition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the Senator from Missouri will be printed. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that it be agreed that the bill be taken up for consideration immediately after the routine business of the morning hour to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORGAN. I hold in my hand an amendment to the bill which I think I shall offer to-morrow. I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama submits an amendment, which will be printed.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 6, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rev. THOMAS G. ADDISON, D. D., of Washington, D. C.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

There was no objection.

The reading of the remainder of the Journal was completed, and it was approved as read.

HARBOR OF FORT SMITH AND PINE BLUFF.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives, transmitting a report of the Chief of Engineers in reference to changes occurring in the harbor of Fort Smith and Pine Bluff, Ark., and threatened cut-offs and erasure of their banks; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

STATE, WAR, AND NAVY BUILDING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending the appointment of twelve additional watchmen to protect the State, War, and Navy Department building against losses by fire, in accordance with the report of the board appointed to investigate the circumstances of the recent fire in that building; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

IMPROVEMENT OF GRAND RIVER, MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Chief of Engineers, in response to a resolution of the House calling for plans and estimates for the improvement of Grand River below Grand Rapids, in the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House and from the Committee on Invalid Pensions petition and papers filed in support of the bill granting a pension to Katharine Bullard.

On motion of Mr. TILLMAN, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw the papers in the case of H. T. Farnsworth, of Memphis, Tenn., now on file in the Clerk's office, there being no adverse report thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BEACH. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The motion was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

THE TARIFF.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House in Committee of the Whole resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, resumed and concluded the remarks commenced on Friday last. In full they are as follows:

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, at the opening of the present session it was significantly intimated by the Speaker, on assuming the chair, that the condition of our country was such as to demand little legislation in relation to our commercial and industrial interests.

The following well-timed and eminently appropriate language was used by him:

I am sure, gentlemen, that all matters of legislation presented during this Congress will receive from you such careful consideration as the magnitude and character of the interests involved require, and that your action upon them will be wise, conservative, and patriotic. Sudden and radical changes in the laws and regulations affecting the commercial and industrial interests of the people ought never to be made unless imperatively demanded by some great public emergency, and in my opinion, under existing circumstances, such changes would not be favorably received by any considerable number of those who have given serious attention to the subject. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Many reforms are undoubtedly necessary, and it will be your duty after a careful examination of the whole subject in all its bearings to decide how far they shall extend, and when and in what manner they shall be made. If there are any who fear that your action upon this or any other subject will be actually injurious to any interest, or even afford reasonable cause for alarm, I am quite sure that they will be agreeably disappointed. [Renewed applause upon the Democratic side.]

After saying that sudden and radical changes in the laws and regulations affecting the commercial and industrial interests of the people ought never to be made unless imperatively demanded by some great public emergency, he proceeds:

And in my opinion under existing circumstances such changes would not be favorably received by any considerable number of those who have given serious attention to the subject.

This announcement by the Speaker was applauded with great zest by the Democrats, and was, I believe, accepted by the country as an admission if not an assertion that existing circumstances were such as to determine against any interference with the extraordinarily satisfactory state of affairs.

It was even more; it was an intimation that they who demanded a change were such as had not given "serious attention to the subject," and therefore not competent to rightly judge.

How, sir, has this pledge and applauded assurance been kept by those who made and applauded the utterance? The first shock to the country was the announcement of a free-trade majority in the Committee of Ways and Means. The second was the report from that committee, on the 11th of March, of a horizontal tariff bill reducing import duties 20 per cent. below a point already too low. The third was the vote of the House on the 15th of April to consider the bill. Is it any wonder that tradelanguishes, that commerce is at a stand-still, that improvements wait the result of this frenzied purpose to do something striking by the majority? The marvel is not that there are so many failures in the country, but that there are so few!

NO DEMAND FOR REDUCTION.

Sir, this whole scheme of reduction by the present Congress is not only not demanded by the people, it is clearly against their will manifested in every instance where that will has been formally expressed. The majority of this House seem to imagine that they hold their power here because the people want reduction of import duties. Now, what ground is there for that belief? Take, for instance, my own State, where the falling off of Republican representation is quite up to the average, and will gentlemen assume that the people sent Democrats instead of Republicans from those districts because they desired tariff reduction? Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLIOTT] assert such a reason for their success in the campaign of 1882? Neither they nor any of their Democratic colleagues will claim any such thing. I do not deny but that there were general, indefinite promises of tariff or "revenue reform," but if there was a single elector supporting the Democratic nominee who supposed he knew what was meant by revenue reform, that person never attributed it to a purpose to reduce duties on imports.

Sir, this is another among the many instances in which the Democratic majority have mistaken the whispering of the Cobden Club for the majestic voice of the American people. To their credit be it said the Democratic members from Pennsylvania are not thus deceived. Brave, however, as has been their course on this floor in this contest, true as they have been to their own and their constituents' convictions, I think they will now readily see how futile are all heroic endeavors when "unequally yoked" with a party whose traditions and whose history for more than forty years has been a ceaseless war upon the American system.

And here I desire to say that it is not at all surprising that many gentlemen on the other side have been deceived into the belief that the people demand a reduction of import duties.

At each campaign the platforms of that party are made up of glittering generalities, general allegations, platitudes, and promises of reform. So that when the campaign ends and the Congressman takes his seat he is as uncertain what his instructions are as if the voice of his constituency had never been uttered.

How is the Representative to know his people's will? Is it to be assumed that a promise to "reform" the tariff means to reduce it? I protest against my brothers on the Democratic side being badgered into a war upon protection to American industry upon any such pretext. My recollection is that the last time you said anything definite in your platform about tariff the people repudiated it most emphatically; that was in 1880, when you declared for revenue only, or free trade.

Since that time you have been for "reform only," and all you have said about tariff should "go without saying" at all, for it has consisted of general promises to so arrange the tariff as to do great good without doing any harm whatever. This promise is as perfect as indefinite quality can possibly make it. Is it any wonder that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] thinks he is instructed to go to the left, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] thinks he is instructed to go to the right?

Sir, I say again, there is no demand for a reduction of duties. Look at the result in the State of Ohio. The act of 1883 was pushed through Congress in the last hours of the session, in a struggle to pass a bill while the Republicans were still in power, so as to prevent the sweeping reduction threatened by the "revenue reformers," soon to assume control. The wool-growers of the country, as also the woolen manufacturers, were shamefully deserted.

What was the result? Did the people complain that the reduction was too little? Have they been calling for a horizontal 20 per cent. more? No, sir. They spoke in thunder tones of warning to the Republican party. It was all in vain that the party protested that the Democrats were more hostile to the wool-growers than they. The people answered: "You have been pledged to protection. You came into power on a platform committed to the 'American system,' and in your haste you yielded to the importunities of the common enemy, and we will teach you that disobedience to the people's will is death." Sir, I say that this treatment, though heroic, was just. Not just to the Democrats, because they gathered glory not their own, but just to the Republican party. To that party let it be a warning for all time to come.

Since the reduction is not demanded by the people, why is this bill before the House? First. It is demanded by the manufacturers of Europe. Second. It is another attempt to make practical a threadbare theory that through all the commercial ages has not only proved impracticable but impossible. The first proposition needs no proof; all admit that reduction of duties would be glad tidings to the Old World. The fallacy of the second is as manifest as the injustice of the first. There is not a point of time in the history of the world's commerce that has witnessed a practical operation of the free-trade doctrine.

The nations of the earth have ordained free trade just so far, and no farther, as it has been to their interest so to do. England has been denominated a free-trade nation. She never has been so to a greater extent than was deemed to her interest. Her free-list never extended beyond the line that marks the boundary between profit and loss. The protected-list was never below fifty-three in number, and, though it has been claimed that the tax on these is not levied for protection's sake, an examination shows that the assertion is untrue. Take, for instance, the article of tobacco, nearly all of which is imported from the United States. It is true that home production of the article itself is not protected, as England can not profitably cultivate tobacco, but see how craftily she incorporates the principle of protection in her duty on tobacco.

On unmanufactured tobacco the duty is 75 cents per pound, or 84 cents if of less than 10 per cent. moisture, while on manufactured tobacco the duty is 96 cents for the first and $1.10 for the second. Is this tax for revenue only? Our exports of leaf tobacco to Great Britain in 1880 were 33,996,486 pounds, the average value being 10.9 cents per pound, upon which the duty at the lowest rate, 75 cents, amounted to $25,497,364, or about 700 per cent. If the entire amount had been imported into that country as manufactured tobacco it would have paid a duty of over $40,000,000, or a tribute of over ten millions for the encouragement of English tobacco manufactures. It will thus be seen that England is free trade when and where it pays, and she is protection when it is for her interest so to be.

When it was impossible for her farmers to supply food for her people she placed wheat and corn on the free-list. Wherever it seems apparent that any of her manufactured product is so low that no other country can compete with her in the market that article goes upon the free-list, but not otherwise. Free trade is as far from realization now as it was two centuries ago.

Standing alone, divorced from practice, the theory is good enough; it is captivating and in many ways logical, but it starts from impossibilities and ranges through realms of impossibilities and paradoxes until air seems to its votaries as palpable as earth. It will find a firm foundation whereon to stand when the law of self-preservation and the sentiment of patriotism have been eliminated from human nature. Then this nation will legislate not for itself alone but for all nations, and all nations will legislate not for themselves alone but for the United States.

But we are told that free trade must obtain because it is a "great principle"—that it is a synonym for "freedom," "equality," and "human brotherhood." And the freedom-loving Cobden Club, fresh from a serene survey of the contentment of the "Green Isle" and the happy homes of "merry England," so graphically pictured by my colleague [Mr. KELLEY], have hung out their sign among the New York importers and nabobs, and are organizing free-trade clubs to the delight of our Irish fellow-citizens on the soil of "poor oppressed America!"

Out upon the impostors! What a travesty upon freedom, equality, and human brotherhood! Shall these blessed words lose their sweetness, being thus coupled? It shall not be! Freedom thus yoked is a lie, and every Irishman in this free land should say with my friend from Illinois [Mr. FINERTY], we will have none of it!

TAXATION.

How shall the revenues necessary to carry on our Government be raised? To be logical, the free-trader should assume the responsibility of holding that all Government tax should be internal and collected direct from the people. Few, however, have the courage to concede so much. Mr. Beecher, however, who is a fresh apostle and somewhat too vigorous to be politic, speaks what he means. In his latest utterance he cries out against all customs duties. He says:

Custom-houses in their nature are academies of injustice and dishonesty, abhorred of God, as they ought to be of man.

Though all free-traders do not travel to the logical conclusion of their theory, their purpose is just as wicked and the outcome is, in practice, precisely the same. Duties paid for revenue only must of necessity be a tax upon the consumer, though it may be somewhat indirect, while absolute free trade necessitates a direct tax upon some other article than that imported, so that in any event the draft is from the people without any returning compensation. It is therefore plain that the only real difference between the two is that the former levies a tax upon articles coming into and the latter upon property already in the country.

Now, sir, let us see how widely different from this free trade or tax for revenue only is the protective system of duties upon imports. Gentlemen speak of it as if, like their own plan, it were a tax added to the price of the article, which the consumer must pay upon its use or consumption.

Sir, the history of more than 10,000 articles, the product of iron, coal, and lime, forced by protection from our own mountains and formed into infinite perfection, beauty, and utility, give the denial to this assertion.

Every article from the cambric needle to the iron bar, from the steel rail to the locomotive that travels across the continent thereon, from the hair-spring in a lady's watch to the hundred horse-power Corliss engine—these and all their fellows, as they spring into form and symmetry and perfection, thunder denial to the assertion.

Take any article you please and trace its history and you have demonstrated the wickedness of the unpatriotic slander. Cut nails are an American invention. When the nail was first protected by duty it was supplied by an imported wrought nail that cost the consumer in this country 25 cents per pound. By the tariff of 1824 the duty was made 5 cents per pound, at which it remained until 1833. According to the assumption of the free-trader the "tax" of 5 cents would of course have compelled the consumers to pay 5 cents addition to the importer's 25 cents per pound or 30 to the consumer. But what are the facts? By the year 1828 the price of nails had declined to from 8 to 9 cents! In 1830 a better nail than England had ever furnished us at 25 cents could be purchased at 5 to 7 cents. And since then the price has ranged as follows: from 1835 to 1840, 5 to 7 cents; from 1840 to 1844, 5 to 6 cents.

From that time forward the American nail has been considered the best in the world, and has regulated the price of that article down to this hour throughout the commercial world. During the war the price advanced somewhat, but by 1873 it had declined to 3 cents, and since then it has ranged from 2 to 3 cents per pound. It will be seen that in 1830, the lowest price of that year, the price had reached precisely the duty imposed only six years before, and the ruling price of the year 1876, a little more than fifty years after its first protection, the best nail on the globe sold to the "oppressed" consumer of the American product for just one-half the first duty "tax" levied for its protection. And yet men assuming to have made the question of tariff a study go on asserting and protesting that duty on imports "is just so much tax wrung from the people." Is it a matter of wonder that the people repudiate such statesmen?

I admit that I have taken an extreme case, but it is so mainly for the reason that the cut nail was a new invention and capable of being made much cheaper than the wrought nail. This does not, however, detract from the fact that protection has saved the American people millions of dollars on this article alone and furnished her people with an infinitely better article, and all through the labor, skill, and invention of her own sons. But leaving out of the calculation the matter of American invention, and the history of the nail is the history of almost every product of iron and steel.

Before axes were manufactured in this country they cost our farmers from $2 to $4 apiece. The tariff of 1828 gave the American manufacturer a protection of 35 per cent., or 70 cents, on the lowest and $1.40 on the highest priced ax. Did the farmer have to pay for any considerable time a higher price than he had theretofore paid? Let us see? Within eight years, by the aid of labor-saving machinery, all invented in this country, American axes, the product of American machinery, American brawn, and American brain, were selling in the American market at $15 to $16 per dozen, and in 1843, under a still higher tariff, at $11 to $12 per dozen. Before the repeal of the tariff of '42 we were manufacturing by far the best ax in the market, and from that hour to the present it has been a successful competitor in all the markets of the world.

The history of American cutlery is a repetition of the history of the American ax. The tariff of 1842 gave cutlery its first substantial protection. Before that year we had not made even a decent draw-shave; yet more than half of our constitutional history had then passed. Forty-two years have since elapsed, and to-day five-sixths of our consumption is supplied by the American laborer, our exports are more than our imports, and we compete with England in Sheffield and Birmingham, the very center of her cutlery product. Has the duty of 1842 laid upon cutlery been to the American people a "consuming tax?" Nothing but the frenzy succeeding a Cobden Club dinner would ever give utterance to so base a slander.

What has been the effect of protection on the Bessemer-steel rail, first made in this country in 1867. Up to the opening of the first mill here for its manufacture England controlled the market, and we were compelled to pay her $150 gold per ton. The production here soon forced down prices, so that by 1870 the builder of railroads in this country was paying only a little more than one-third, or $59. The very extensive construction of railroads in 1880 boomed the price to $85; but now the best steel rail ever produced is sold for less than $40 per ton. These rails are manufactured by our own people, the consumers of our own farm product, yet the Morrison bill proposes to rob them of 20 per cent. of their wages and make a present of the amount to "merry England!"

I have not the time to go over the history of other American industries. Suffice it to say, Mr. Chairman, you may run through the entire list of American manufactured product and you will find in each item absolute and incontrovertible proof that the duty levied upon articles manufactured from material existing here is not a tax upon the consumer. I do not intend to be understood as taking the position that a duty on imports may not under some circumstances for a short time operate as an apparent burden upon the consumer, but I hold that what I have said of these is the universal rule, under the conditions stated, after the duty has been laid long enough to work out its full and legitimate effect. This rule we are not only able to establish from experience, but it may be shown to rest upon perfectly logical and well-approved grounds.

First, protection produces. The world at large has new manufactories where none had existed but for protection. The article produced from these, if sold, must be taken by those who heretofore purchased from the previous producers. The increased production of necessity forces the prices down below the point where it had been had not the new product appeared. But the free-trade theorist admits this to be true "only where the product has full range and is not advanced or held to its old price by duty." A moment's examination will suffice to show that the general result is not changed by duty regulations.

Assuming now that when our country commenced the manufacture of her own goods that England continued to manufacture as before, what was the effect upon her products? Being partly prohibited from coming to the American market by import duties, they were forced back into her own avenues of trade, there to bear her home market. Could England thereafter sell her product for as high a price as before, shorn in part of the American trade? The question answers itself. Had we all slept as remote from human commerce as Rip Van Winkle we could answer the question in but one way. But our observation adds history to logic, and we have experience fortified by demonstration.

Now, let us look to our own side of the import-duty barrier. In the start I think it proper to admit that if our manufacturing had been restricted or hampered, either by lack of ability, genius, or natural resource, we must have started at great disadvantage in the world's race for pre-eminence. Such, however, was not the case. We had all these in abundance. No man will say we lacked either ability or inventive genius, nor yet any of the manifold gifts of nature. Boundless forests, exhaustless mines, mighty rivers sweeping from the iron mountains to the seas, majestic mountains, with foundations of iron, buttressed with silver, and crowned with gold. Hills, valleys, prairies, plains, stretching through all climates, and productive in all that contributes to the necessity, comfort, and luxury of man; these all beckoned the pioneer forth to independent and self-reliant achievement.

The hand that stretched out the limitless prairie for the farm, lifted the high mountain for the forge. To divorce either from the other was self-evident treason to both. Happily for the greatness and the renown of our country, the men who framed our Constitution, ordained the power, and the very first Congress of this nation sent that power forth on its errand of conquest and glory. The preamble of chapter 2 of the first session of the First Congress, on July 4, 1789, declared that, "Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandises imported; therefore be it enacted," &c. And yet within a week, sir, and several times within the limit of this debate, has the right, under the Constitution, to adjust duty for protection's sake been questioned.

It strikes me, sir, that ninety-five years after the passage of the first protective tariff act is a little late to quibble about constitutional authority.

DOES PROTECTION STILL PROTECT?

The question has been many times asked with great ado, "If it be true that protection forces prices down, how does it continue to protect against imported product?"

To the question there is, as it seems to me, an answer satisfactory and conclusive. It must be borne in mind in considering this branch of the subject that while the price of the manufactured product has declined under protection here, it has forced down prices in a like ratio throughout the commercial world; hence it follows that the necessity of protection continues, and it can never cease as long as labor, which is one of the main elements of value, is cheaper abroad than here.

Gentlemen forget that while it is claimed that protection lowers prices it is not claimed that it lowers them here to pauper labor point, while it may do so elsewhere. Our position is the opposite of this. We join with one accord in the prayer of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY]:

God forbid that American labor shall ever be embodied in any production that shall be cheap enough to compete in general with Halesowen, Lye, Lye-Waite, Cradley, and other manufacturing towns around Birmingham.

It may in a few instances transpire that articles can profitably be manufactured here cheaper than in England, but these instances are only where, by superior machinery or by great natural advantages, we are able to overcome the difference between labor there and labor here. It follows, then, if we are to compete with cheap-labor countries we must compel these countries by a duty levy to contribute to the payment of a large portion of the difference between the price of their labor and our own; and if you ask me how long shall the duty be assessed, I answer, through all generations, unless other countries shall see to it that the laborer there is made worthy of his hire.

PROTECTION PRODUCES WEALTH.

A still more potential argument in favor of protection is that it brings wealth and prosperity to the people. That protective tariff builds manufactories I suppose no man either here or elsewhere will deny. It follows, then, that whatever manufactories accomplish in building up prosperity is attributable so far to protection. I have, I think, demonstrated that protective tariff is not a tax upon the consumer, for the reason that in the long run the article protected becomes cheaper. Now, if in addition it can be established that it is the great builder of wealth in our country who can resist the conclusion that he is an enemy to that country's growth and glory, who would strike it down?

I believe our experience as to the effect of manufacturing establishments upon the market for farm produce, the price of land, and the general prosperity they bring are worth much more, as a guide to just conclusions, than many figures. I am disposed less than ever to rely upon statistics, since they have been made to prove so many sides of the same question recently in this House. Since listening to the very able remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] I am fully persuaded that the adage that "figures will not lie" is itself a lie. It will be remembered that by figures gathered from official sources, as he claims, the gentleman satisfied himself that the farm product of 1880 yielded the farmer less profit in the aggregate than that of 1860.

Now, his figures for the year 1880, which he told us came from the Census Report, were more than 100 per cent. below those found in the Agricultural Report covering the same period; still, he gave us figures, and remembering, no doubt, the maxim "that figures won't lie," and shutting his eyes to all his experience and observation and leaving out of the calculation the whole meat product and other equally important items for the year 1880, his conclusions are quite satisfactory, and of course he is a victim to the belief that he has established what every man in this country who was alive in 1860 and is alive now knows is not correct history. It is not strange that the gentleman expressed much surprise at his discovery, so completely do his figures reverse what must be his deliberate judgment. They will certainly prove a bonanza in the business of propagating free-trade theories if he can succeed in keeping the facts from his people. [Laughter.]

A LITTLE HISTORY.

Sir, it needs but an appeal to our own experience to show how protection has increased individual and national wealth. The average price received by labor from 1846, following the free-trade tariff to 1860, was not more than one-half that received by it for the fourteen years following the war, or say from 1866 to 1880, during years of protection, while the purchasing power of the dollar of 1880 was quite equal for all manufactured goods to that of 1860. I take this year because it was not until 1880 that the high prices consequent upon the inflation period following the war had ended. It is true farm products, save perhaps wheat and corn, cost the consumer, who had to purchase, much more during the latter period than the former, but as what was received for the product of the farm is in a just estimate part of the aggregate paid to labor, of course the high price it received helped to swell the aggregate rewards of labor.

It seems quite impossible for the advocate of free trade to get through an address without betraying his utter hatred of the manufacturer. He is often called a robber, always a monopolist, and always an enemy to the farmer. In this, I confess, I find nothing to commend. To my mind, it is both impolitic and unpatriotic. The prosperity of the farm is as impossible without the forge as the forge without the farmer. It is as essential that they combine to cause the symmetrical growth of the nation as that oxygen combines with nitrogen to furnish the air we breathe.

In 1855, as a farmer's boy, I sometimes took to a limited market, twenty-four miles away, as good butter as has been produced since the world began, for which I received as payment in trade the price of from 10 to 15 cents per pound. The prices of the goods at the store where the traffic was carried on were at least 33 per cent. higher than in 1880 or than to-day. Farm utensils, such as scythes, rakes, hoes, axes, &c., were at least 40 per cent. higher than now. The butter product on that same farm, made by the same hands, yielded in 1880 a price ranging from 25 to 35 cents per pound, or more than 200 per cent. above that under tariff for revenue only. I remember that two as good cows as were ever pastured on that farm were purchased in the year 1849 for $9 and $10, the two costing $19.

In the year 1880 a single cow no better than either of these would bring more than three times the price paid in 1849 for the two! Hay, oats, potatoes, every kind of vegetable were in 1880 at least one-third higher than in 1860. This is the evidence in the matter under discussion I bring from a little of my own experience. I think I could safely appeal to any gentleman present for corroboration of what I assert whose experience has brought him within practical range of the hard facts that formed the farmer's history during the free-trade period from 1846 to 1860. But I will not ask gentlemen to abide by my experience or my judgment. The following table shows prices at the beginning of the protection period, 1816, and also 1880:

Articles.	1816.	1880.
Wheat, per bushel	$0 44	$1 00
Corn, per bushel	20	60
Oats, per bushel	15	50
Eggs, per dozen	05	15
Barley, per bushel	25	80
Butter, per pound	12	30
Cheese, per pound	06	12
Cows, per head	$16 00 to 20 00	$20 00 to 75 00
Cattle, per yoke	25 00 to 45 00	100 00 to 250 00
Hay, per ton	3 00 to 5 00	10 00 to 18 00
Carriage horses, per span	150 00 to 200 00	300 00 to 1,000 00
Sheep, per head	50 to 75	1 50 to 2 50

The following table shows the yearly wages paid in 1860 and 1880 by different manufacturers:

	1860.	1880.
			Per ct.
Woolen manufactures	$234	$300	28
Cotton manufactures	200	246	23
Iron manufactures	355	390	10
Machine manufactures	390	450.	15
Paper-making manufactures	252	360	40
Boot and shoe manufactures	250	370	48

These census figures show an average increase of 28 per cent. in wages in the above manufacturing industries since 1860. The average increase in the wages of all kinds of mechanics is full as great. The following tables show how the prices of manufactured goods have been affected by the protective policy, which has increased wages.

Articles.	Prices.		Reduction.
	1860.	1884.
			Pr. ct.
Common sheetings, per yard	$0 08¾	$0 07	20
Drills, per yard	0 08¾	0 06¾	22
Prints, per yard	0 09½	0 06	34
Pig-iron, per ton	23 00	20 60	14
Iron, refined, per pound	0 03	0 02½	25
Fancy cassimeres, per yard	0 65	0 50	23
Common woolens, per yard	1 50	1 00	33
Medium blankets, per pair	5 00	3 75	28
Men's pegged boots, per pair	2 50	2 17	15
Crockery, per crate	95 30	57 89	38
Plate glass, per foot	1 50	0 80	45

Average reduction of prices of the above protected manufactures, 28 per cent., against an increase of 28 per cent. of wages.

The following table shows the increase of manufacturing industry between the years 1860 and 1880. When it is remembered that four years of this time was devoted to war, with its attendant destruction, I confess I find infinitely more to kindle wonder and admiration than in any of the achievements of England during any like period:

	1860.	1880.
Establishments	140,433	253,852
Capital	$1,009,855,351	$2,790,272,606
Product	$1,885,861,676	$5,369,579,191
Number of employés	1,311,246	2,738,895
Average yearly wages	$288	$346
Total wages paid	$378,878,966	$947,953,795

It will be seen by this table that during the twenty years, from 1860 to 1880, the manufacturing interest increased more than during the entire colonial and all the previous constitutional history of the United States. I commend these facts to the prayerful consideration of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD]. He will search in vain for their parallel in Great Britain.

THE FREE-LIST.

This bill, sir, proposes to place coal and lumber upon the free-list. There is no industry in the country that more constantly needs the application of the principle of protection than coal and lumber. The charge of monopoly can not with any justice be made against them. They are each offered to the consumer at the lowest possible price consistent with anything like a just compensation to the laborer who mines and manufactures these commodities. The protection as now laid is not so much upon price as against the invasion of our market by Nova Scotia coal and Canada lumber.

Barter away that market, sir, for which you get no consideration whatever, and you commit a crime against the laborer in both mine and mill. You overwhelm in bankruptcy all the moderate owners of both, and you leave the wealthier ones to struggle on in a competition with the cheap labor of Canada and Nova Scotia, receiving 40 per cent. less to-day than our own.

After Canada lumber and Nova Scotia coal have captured our markets, after many of our collieries have gone into decay and our forests have been destroyed by fire, after the men employed in these industries have become producers rather than consumers of the farm products, the farmer will discover that he has lost buyers for his goods and found bears upon his market. With his candle thus burning at both ends he will look in vain for the dividends that used to appear on his autumnal balance-sheet, when labor, lumber, and coal were not on the free-list.

But we are answered that the farmer can afford to lose his home market, for he will secure in its place a larger foreign market. From the hour this debate opened gentlemen on the other side have assumed that tariff is a burden upon our exports. They never go into detail to show how this conclusion is reached; they simply assume that it must be so. It is difficult to answer assertion. I will content myself by simply asking how we can hope to induce Canada or Nova Scotia or England to take more wheat or corn than they need? Are we to expect these countries or any others to take our product out of charity? But what has been our experience in the past in the matter of exports?

Sir, our exports were never equal to our imports during all the years of free trade. The balance of trade was uniformly against us during every year from 1846 to 1860, often reaching nearly a hundred million dollars annually. Indeed, the balance of trade never turned in our favor until 1875. Since then it has averaged more than one hundred millions a year, making a net balance of over $1,300,000,000 in our favor in nine years. Unless free trade can find other ground to stand upon than this, it certainly will fall. I turn now for a few moments to consider the subject of COMPENSATION FOR IMPORT DUTIES.

If it were true that import duties are in their practical operation added to the cost of consumption, it is not altogether certain that the nation, having due regard to the well-being of society and the protection of labor against the avarice of capital, should not still maintain the protective tariff. But when it is absolutely demonstrable that the general result is a lowering of the price of the article consumed reasons come to its defense in double columns.

What is the compensation returned to this people by the levying of import duties? First, the Government is supported and direct taxation avoided. Second, the levy, instead of being a burden, is a blessing. Were a people ever so blessed as ours? Sir, each dollar of duty laid on incoming commerce performs the double service of relieving the people from a real tax, while in the same hour it nerves the arm of industry to go forth into new fields of conquest, and glory, and achievement.

I do not say, sir, that in all cases the tariff is laid with consummate skill and absolute wisdom (which according to my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] is the Ohio plan), but I speak of the main purpose and the general result; and considering these I wish to know where in the world's achievements is the parallel to the growth and prosperity thus secured to this people? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] the other day with almost matchless eloquence pictured the growth of English manufactures since the repeal of the corn laws in 1844. Why, sir, it is strange that all men harassed with this free-trade frenzy never can see anything in their own country worthy of words that burn and thoughts that entrance.

What are the facts? Why sir, the growth of our country has surpassed that of England in every material industry in the ratio of five to one during the past eighteen years. Is it possible that all these gentlemen have their eyes so set on the British lion that they can never see the American eagle? Where has the gentleman been during the last twenty years—years of the mightiest strides in the growth of this or any other land? Sir, he seems absolutely oblivious of the matchless beauty of that flag. Unless on some lone sea he seeks for and finds it not! Let him look for that banner in the land of the free and the home of the brave, and here, full high advanced he will find it, "without a star erased or a single stripe polluted."

But that gentleman attributes the loss of the carrying trade to protection. As well might he attribute it to the changes of the moon.

Sir, we have lost the foreign carrying trade, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has well said, by the application of the principle of free trade in the guise of reciprocity treaty with England; and I will add, also, because we have been engaged in a more exalted as well as a more profitable business. There has been a deluge of tears shed by the Cobden Club and by members of this House because England has all the foreign carrying trade. Is it not time that this gush had ended? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] voices my feelings exactly in this matter when he says:

When I used to read in history of Napoleon pointing out to the great British statesman the little island and saying "What a small space England occupies on the earth," I sympathized with the Englishman's grand reply: "But with her commerce she circles the world." But since I have seen our rapid development on land, our magnificent stretches of railroads cutting through the mountains and cleaving the plains, I then, sir, feel a grander pride that we build these railroads which must be kept up by the labor of man, while England follows the ocean path that God and the elements repair. If our capital brings better interest, if it feeds poverty at home, if it furnishes work for the muscle, I shall not regret that it is expended on American soil.

Sir, to every syllable of this I yield most hearty assent. Is it not strange that after having said so much for the glory of his own country that within ten short minutes that gentleman, true to free-trade instincts, should have voted to give England the control of American shipbuilding? Oh, will there never be an end of contradiction in a Democrat who would do good?

Mr. HAMMOND. I thought you had inserted my speech as an illustration of apples of gold in pictures of silver, but I find it was to abuse me.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; I do not consider it abuse to tell the House how a gentleman voted unless he himself admits that he voted wrong. If the gentleman now admits that he voted wrong I will be glad to take back all I have said.

Mr. HAMMOND. I would repeat the vote.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Then I will let my statement stand. [Laughter.]

But what is this foreign carrying trade that so "horridly shakes the disposition" of the Democracy in this House? It is a beggarly business, sir, when marshaled for comparison beside that which employs the intellect, the invention, and the muscle of my countrymen. Sir, I will vote for any reasonable project to build up American commerce to be controlled by American bottoms, but I am not so enchanted with the murmur of the seas that I can not hear the glad anthem of 50,000,000 of American citizens in their triumphant march across a continent.

Sir, not all the commerce, not all the navies that e'er rode the seas have left a trace of civilization or a single monument to the memory of man! On the mighty deep there are no cities and on her heaving bosom there are no altar fires for home—sweet home.

Even the magic cable, that lonely, brittle thread which couples the continents, must tell its tales from crag to crag and peak to peak, deep down in the oozy dungeons of a rayless deep, far from the ken of man, until they leap into the light of civilization on a far-off shore! Let gentlemen listen to the siren songs of the "ever sounding sea" if they will. They shall not stay the course of empire! The master spirits of our age will cleave the mountains and plant the forge; they will "fell the forests, plow and till the fields, and heap the granaries that feed the world."

MONOPOLY.

Gentlemen not content with praising England seem ever constrained to abuse America. All things, whether good or ill, that have been fostered into life since the tariff has had its perfect work are passed under the rod of Democratic wrath and free-trade vengeance. Failing year after year to catch the ear of the sons of toil by the deceptive cry of "buy where you can buy cheapest and sell where you can sell dearest," whether by so doing we kill or make alive, they tax their powers and rally all the resources of the demagogue in a universal shout that the manufacturers are monopolists. Could anything be more insincere? What has been the effect of a protective tariff upon monopoly in manufactures? Sir, it has multiplied every manufactory in this land by ten and many by a thousand. When the system of protection began we were absolutely at the mercy of English monopolists.

Do these orators think they can make the sons of toil believe that to induce two manufactories to grow where only one existed, is the propagation of monopoly? Do they believe that the most humble can not understand how absolutely impossible it is to monopolize the manufacture of any article by creating new manufactures? As well may you, sir, by the wave of a hand, expect successfully to stay the course of empire as attempt to monopolize the manufacturing of American products, whether from forge or farm, after you have secured to them the American market. Let me remind you, gentlemen, that you have invoked the one infallible law—that is, free trade in horizontal garb—that never fails to engender monopoly, not American monopoly, but foreign English monopoly—cold, calculating, brutal, and merciless! that same monopoly which drove the colonies into the most unequal and desperate war in all the annals of mankind; that same monopoly which, after it had put out our fires by the aid of the compromise "horizontal" of 1833, brought to our doors the bankruptcy of 1837! that same monopoly which broke the tariff barrier of 1842 in 1846 and gave us poverty in 1847! that same monopoly which, in exchange for free trade in 1846 and 1857, gave us eighty millions of debt in 1860, and left us in want and misfortune, bereft of credit, despoiled of independence, and shorn of our strength in the darkest night of modern history!

MANUFACTORIES.

Is it manly, sir, to attempt to array the laborer against the man who furnishes him employment and the farmer against both? Sir, I was reared on a farm. I know all about the privations and the struggles incident to frontier life on the farm, and that too in a period of our history when the farmer's lot was infinitely a more serious matter than now. My sympathies and my tenderest regard has always been and must always remain with and for the farmer; and, sir, I rejoice that God has spared my life to denounce, in this presence with all the vigor and emphasis at my command, this warfare upon the American manufacturers as treason against the American farmer!

Day by day have gentlemen inveighed against the artisan who furnishes through the infinite diversification of industry the market for nine-tenths of the farmer's product, pronouncing in the same breath encomiums upon England and all other countries that in the aggregate furnish a precarious market for the other tenth. Is this patriotism? Is this the true way to beget love of country, to kindle laudable ambition, and to foster hope in the bosom of toil? The great Webster never invoked to his use sweeter or braver words than when he said, "I thank God that if I am gifted with a little of that spirit which it is said is able to raise mortals to the skies I have yet none of that other spirit which would drag angels down." If gentlemen will forever look with cynic eye upon their country I pray that they keep silence while the great Republic goes from conquering to conquer. Believing the American citizen to be the best product of the best period of man's pilgrimage, I would foster the plant with all the care and all the vigilance that human wisdom can summon to its support. I would have that name honored and respected and protected, with all the love and all the valor of a chivalric people, from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I have chiefly two objects in view in addressing the committee on this subject: one of these is to show the effect of our present tariff system upon the interest of the farmer, and the other is to present the record of the Democratic party upon the purposes for which tariff taxes should be collected.

THE OBJECT OF THE BILL.

I will state one proposition in which all here will agree. It is this: no one will deny that we can with safety to all interests involved reduce the large surplus revenue now flowing into the Treasury and that this ought to be done by reduction of taxation. Does any one deny that proposition? So far, then, we agree. But we divide when we reach the question of deciding upon what articles the reduction shall operate. Upon this question there are really but two sides—the one declares that reduction shall be made of the taxes on whisky and tobacco, so that the people shall have cheaper whisky and tobacco; the other side insists that the reduction shall come from the necessaries of life, so that the people shall have cheaper food to eat and raiment to wear, cheaper shelter to live under, and cheaper tools to work with.

The bill before us is aimed to accomplish the latter object. It does not go as far as I desire. In the first place, I would be glad to vote for a bill providing for a thorough revision of the tariff in detail. If I can not have that opportunity now and must take a horizontal reduction I would prefer that the rate of reduction should be 40 instead of 20 per cent. But, sir, the committee who have had this subject under consideration for a long time have thought it the best policy to commence the work of tariff reform in the manner and to the extent here presented, and I obey a law of Democracy when I yield my individual opinion to the will of the majority of my party associates. As eager as I am for further reduction, I will not go home to the people who are oppressed by the present unjust and extortionate tariff system and say that I voted against all reduction and left their earnings in the clutches of their hard-hearted task-masters without any relief because I could not have my way about it. I will not say to them, You shall continue to be the prey of the plunderers, the vassals of the tariff barons, because I could not dictate the character of the bill. Until reduction can be obtained of the tax on the necessaries of life those of us who favor this bill insist the present tax shall remain on whisky and tobacco.

WHAT DOES TARIFF MEAN?

Since this bill has been under discussion I have received a letter from a young farmer inquiring: "What does tariff taxation mean? How, when, and for what purpose are they collected? Also, what does protection mean in this connection? Who do these questions most seriously affect, and how do they affect them? What has been the position of the two political parties on this question?" I now propose to answer these questions in their order.

I beg that the House may bear with me, for my answers may be somewhat tedious, as I desire to give the details in plain and unadorned language.

What is tariff? It is a tax. When we talk about the tariff we are talking about taxes. Tariff taxes are those which are laid on foreign articles imported into this country. They are paid in the first instance by the importing merchant and collected from the consumer, when the articles are purchased by him from the retail merchant or dealer. Who pays these taxes? Every person pays a portion of them who buys anything for his use, and therefore every one in this broad land has a pecuniary interest in these questions. If tariff taxes are high, all manufactured articles purchased by him are high in proportion to the amount of the tax, and when the tariff is reduced the price of the goods are lowered and his cost of living is reduced. Of course a low tariff leaves more money in the pocket of the consumer than a high tariff.

We are in reality now engaged in determining how much shall be taken out of everyone's pocket-book by legislation. We are determining how much of the earnings of every laboring man shall be retained by him and how much he shall be forced to surrender for others and for other purposes than his own use. By this bill we are saying the rate of tariff taxes is too high and are seeking to reduce it 20 per cent., and thereby seeking to leave that much more money in the pockets of the people.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN STATE TAXES AND TARIFF.

The great difference between the taxes paid by persons under the operations of the laws of the various States and Territories known as State, county, and municipal taxes, and those paid under the laws of Congress known as tariff taxes, consist mainly in the manner of collection and the purposes for which they are collected.

State taxes as all know are levied and collected by certain officers of counties or municipalities. When such taxes are paid a receipt is given to the tax-payer specifying the exact amount of his taxes and the object for which it is to be used. These objects are confined exclusively to defraying the expenses of the State and local governments; but tariff taxes, known as customs dues, are levied and collected in an entirely different manner and for different purposes.

TWO KINDS OF TAXES UNDER TARIFF.

There are two kinds of taxes paid under the operation of the tariff laws. One kind is that which goes into the Treasury of the United States and are called revenue taxes; they are used for the maintenance of the Government, or purely for governmental purposes. The other kind goes into the pockets of American manufacturers and are called protective-tariff taxes, and are used for the profit of manufacturers and those in interest with them. When the latter is the object it is a process by which wealth or money is without remuneration transferred from the pocket of one man into the pocket of another. This transfer is made from the poorest as well as the wealthiest in the land. No one is exempted from it.

This protective-tariff system is established, as it is said, for the protection of the home manufacturer against competition with the manufacturers of other countries, and compels the consumers in this country to buy their goods at a much higher price than they would pay for them if no protective-tariff laws existed. Those who advocate this bill say that these taxes ought to be reduced in order that the people may buy their goods cheaper, and insist that the present high rate of tariff is not needed for Government purposes. This is demonstrated by the fact that there is over one hundred millions of surplus now lying in the Treasury. On the other hand, those who oppose this reduction insist that the people shall pay higher prices for the necessaries of life in order that bounties may be provided for the home manufacturers.

WHAT IS PROTECTION?

This is protection pure and simple. Some regard this as a system of legalized robbery of the many under the forms of law for the benefit of the few. Each will form his judgment of the proper name for this process according to his views of the moral law and the objects for which our Government was founded. As I have already said, the taxes which under the tariff go into the Treasury are collected by the custom-house officer on goods as they come into the United States and are paid in the first instance by the importer. Those which go into the pockets of the manufacturers are collected in the first instance when the articles are sold by them to the dealer. All of them are finally collected by the retail dealer when the goods are sold to the farmer, mechanic, or other consumer.

HOW TO ASCERTAIN AMOUNT OF TARIFF PAID BY CONSUMER.

A person may know exactly how much he pays for State county and municipal taxes by examining his tax receipts; but the only way for him to ascertain how much tariff taxes is paid for revenue as well as for protection—for that which goes into the Treasury as well as that which goes to the manufacturer—is for him at the end of the year to add up all the sums he has paid out during the year on all the manufactured articles he has purchased for himself and family. He must take an inventory of every article he has bought for his personal wear, for his shelter, for every article in his house, on his farm, or in his workshop; every article of farm machinery, every article of woolen or cotton dress goods, every garment for himself or his family, from the oldest even to the youngest—though it be but a new-born babe in the cradle—or some one who during the year has been shrouded and coffined for the grave; all the sugar, canned goods, and nearly every article of food except those which are produced with the help of God on the farm; for while there is protection for almost every other thing there is practically none for what the farm produces. Nobody protects or helps to protect the ordinary farmer, but he is forced by the tariff law to aid in the protection of the manufacturing classes.

The sugar and rice planters and some few other producers are protected, but the cotton and tobacco planters, the wheat, corn, and other grain-growers, the beef and pork producers, &c., are without protection. It is true that in framing the tariff law, for the purpose of humbugging the farmer, they did go through the farce of putting some duty on the importation of these articles, but all know that no amount of duty can raise the price of these articles or protect them from foreign competition, because these products are not imported into this country to any appreciable extent, but are exported, and their price is fixed in the European market, where they compete with the cheapest labor and cheapest producers in the world.

Now, after the consumer has added up all the sums of his purchases for the year, then he will be able to ascertain how much he has paid for tariff taxes by taking the tariff law made by the last Congress and ascertain the rate of the tax which he will find is there laid on every one of his purchases. For instance, he has paid on his rice a tax of 95 per cent.; glass, window and other glass, an average tax of 55 per cent.; on all articles manufactured of iron, an average of 37 per cent.; on paints, an average of 32 per cent.; cotton dress goods, an average of 37 per cent.; woolen dress goods, an average of 63 per cent.; flannels, an average of 74 per cent.; hosiery, an average of 52 per cent.; carpets, an average of 53 per cent.; sugar, an average of 50 per cent. But the list is too long for me to give them here.

It will be difficult for any one except an expert to ascertain fully the rate of taxation under the tariff laws. They are purposely made complex and complicated to conceal from the people the manner and extent to which they are fleeced in the interest of the protected classes. If the consumer has not the time nor the skill to make these computations, let him remember that the average of all the various taxes paid under the tariff law is about 42 per cent. thereof. On the sum total of all he has bought he has paid a tax of about 42 per cent., being over two-fifths of the whole sum. For instance, our present average rate of tariff taxation is nearly 42 per cent. If a man has bought for himself and family five hundred dollars' worth of such articles during the past year he would have paid $210 in the way of tariff taxation, that being 42 per cent. of the total of purchases. If, however, the average rate of taxation had been reduced to 21 per cent., he would only have paid $105 in tariff taxes and would have $105 more money in his pocket to-day than he now has.

It will be seen, therefore, that this question deeply affects every man's pocket-book.

HOW MUCH THE CONSUMER CONTRIBUTES TO THE MANUFACTURER.

Then if he wishes he may ascertain how much he has contributed out of this sum to the support of the Government, and what portion of his earnings has been contributed by him to the manufacturer by remembering that only one dollar of every five which he has been forced to pay under the operations of the tariff law goes into the Treasury; the other four go to the manufacturers or protected monopolists; and if he will compare the amount he has paid for State, county, and municipal purposes with what he has paid under the tariff law, he will be amazed at the comparative insignificance of the amount of the former and of the enormous amount of the latter, and if he will add together all the taxes he has paid for the local and national governments, and compare that sum with what he has paid to protect the monopolists, he will see that the amount which they have cost him is vastly greater than what he has paid for all other governmental purposes whatever.

WHO MADE THE TARIFF?

Then if he is a thoughtful man and loves his family and his freedom better than he does the monopolies, he will ask himself what party has so framed the law which has made him the hewer of wood and the drawer of water for others—forged his chains which has enslaved him to the aristocratic few who own the manufacturing establishments. He will also ask himself the further question, what political party proposes to break his chains, abolish this slavery, and restore him and his children to freedom by reforming and reducing this tariff system. To learn that important fact he will only need to read the history of the two great political parties now before the country, and watch the course of the Representatives in Congress on this bill. I think that he will soon reach the conclusion that his own as well as his country's best interest demand that he should hereafter give his support to that political party which will reduce the tariff to a revenue basis. But before I go into the history of the parties upon this question I will endeavor to explain the cost of protection.

COST OF PROTECTION.

In a speech delivered by myself on the Tariff Commission, April 20, 1882, I made the following estimate of the cost of protection:

Let us for a while consider the nature and effect of our revenue laws. During the past nineteen years the Federal Government has collected from the people of this country the following amounts from customs duties and internal-revenue taxes, which are in addition to all the other taxes annually collected:

From customs receipts on imports	$3,012,750,929
Total customs and internal-revenue receipts	5,954,834,788

In addition to this vast sum for the support of the Government the people have paid about five times as much into the private purse of the protected industries on manufactures by reason of a protective tariff, being $15,063,754,645, making the grand total of the amount paid by the people for the support of the Federal Government and the protected manufacturers during the past nineteen years the astonishing sum of $21,018,589,433, a sum about ten times as large as the public debt of the United States, nearly four times as large as the public debt of Great Britain, and within four billions as much as the public debt of all the nations of the world.

If this vast sum was now in the hands of the people and distributed equally among the 50,000,000 in this country, each man, woman, and child would have $420. Let us reflect for a moment as to where all this money has gone. Only about one-fourth has found its way into the national Treasury, while the remainder has found a lodgment in the pockets of the protected classes. This is the direct result or cost of nineteen years of protection. These figures are obtained by adding together the customs and internal-revenue receipts for the total taxes, and by multiplying the customs receipts by five for the profits of the protected classes, that being the proportion of revenue to the profits produced by the protective tariff, it being a well-established fact that the domestic manufacturer usually adds the rate of tariff duties to the price of his products.

Since that date two years more of collections have increased this vast sum which has been taken from the pockets of the people under the operations of our Federal tax system to the enormous sum of nearly $23,000,000,000, of which sum over $16,000,000,000 went into the pockets of the protected classes.

WHO IS BENEFITED BY PROTECTION?

Now the inquiry arises at once, who is benefited by this protective system? An examination of the statistics furnished by the census reports of 1880 will show that a very small proportion of the population of this country received any benefit from protection; indeed, the number of those engaged in manufacturing and protected mechanical pursuits are surprisingly small. To avoid the charge of partisan exaggeration I will give the figures and comment thereon of a Republican journal in very high standing with the members of that party. I read from the Chicago Tribune of February 27, 1883:

The census reports that of the fifty-odd millions of our population there are engaged in "gainful occupations" 17,392,099 persons. Of these but 3,837,112 are credited to manufacturing, mechanical, and mining pursuits. It is upon this class that the blessings of protection are focused, but it will be a surprise to most persons who have not looked into the matter for themselves to see the exact figures, that show that only a small minority of this small section of our industrial classes receive even the nominal advantages of the all-comprehending taxes levied at the demand of employers.

The following list selects out of the entire enumeration made by the census those whose industry is so "to the manner born," or is so obviously injured by taxes which take but do not give, that they are to beregarded as the victims and not the beneficiaries of the tariff:

	Number engaged.
Agricultural implements	39,580
Bakers	41,309
Boots and shoes	194,079
Blacksmiths	172,726
Brass founders and workers	11,568
Masons, stone and brick	135,315
Brick and tile makers	36,052
Broom and brush makers	8,479
Butchers	76,241
Carpenters and joiners	373,143
Carriages and wagons	54,589
Tobacco workers	77,045
Confectioners	13,692
Coopers	49,123
Leather	29,842
Fishermen	41,352
Lumbermen and woodchoppers	43,382
Millers	53,440
Painters, all kinds	128,556
Photographers	9,990
Piano-makers	7,850
Plasterers	22,083
Plumbers	19,383

This list of those who help pay the taxes to the protected bosses without even ostensibly getting any benefit from it could be very much enlarged if the census went into any such detail that we could separate, for instance, the iron and steel industries into those which are original and subsidiary. If the Pennsylvania makers of pig-iron are helped by the tariff, all the derivative manufactures of iron that must use taxed raw material are certainly hurt, just as the makers of agricultural implements are injured by the tax on steel. A large part of the 234,228 miners whom we have not included are as certainly victims of protection as any other class of the community. All the bituminous-coal diggers in the West; all those employed in rich iron mines which, as the great iron-miner, Mr. HEWITT, declared, need no help from the tariff; the copper miners, whom we have shown to be paid less than the average wages; the anthracite coal-miners of Pennsylvania, who are among the most wretched workers in this country; the gold and silver miners—all these should be subtracted. Of the 310,533 operatives in the cotton, woolen, and silk mills, a large proportion labor in branches that are native and could not be crushed out of existence. The Southern cotton mills are exporting their goods to South America and Asia.

We are far within the limits of fact in putting down the number of those who are included within the delusive circle of "protection" at less than 1,000,000 out of the total of 3,837,112 reported as engaged in manufacturing, mechanical, and mining occupations.

Industrially, then, the situation of this country is:

Population to be supported, 50,155,783.

Number to do the work, 17,392,099.

Of these, 1,000,000 tax-eaters produce a deficit that must be made good by taxation.

Proportion of victims to beneficiaries of protection, 50 to 1.

HOW IS THE TRIBUTE MONEY DISTRIBUTED?—THE SHARES OF CAPITAL AND LABOR

But how is this tribute money distributed which is coined by the brain and brawn of the millions who are without protection. It goes, as we have seen, to the 1,000,000 of the protected class—the owners of the manufacturing establishments, as well as the laborers employed therein.

Now what share does each of the protected classes receive? Computations based upon the census returns of 1880 show that the average return to the capital invested in manufacturing in that year was between 36 and 37 per cent., and yet with this large return the manufacturers only paid their employés, including clerks, superintendents, foremen, and all laborers, at the average rate of $1.16 per day.

The profits made by the owners of the factories actually exceeded the whole sum paid for all the labor employed in making the goods. Protection puts the lion's share of the spoils into the pockets of the few lords of the factories and the loom, while barely a crumb reaches the workingman. Thus it will be seen the claim that the tariff protects American labor is a false pretense, hypocritically used for the purpose of beguiling the workingmen into the support of this plundering scheme of injustice and inequality.

PROFITS OF AGRICULTURE.

Now let us compare the profits of agriculture with the profits of manufactures. For this purpose I will take the computations made by the eminent statesman from New York [Mr. S. S. COX]. He said in a recent speech:

The estimated value of all farm products for the year 1879 is given in the census report at $2,213,402,564. Deduct from this cost of fertilizers, $28,586,397, and we have a gross return of $2,184,816,167 on the $12,104,081,430 capital invested in agriculture, which is equal to 18 per cent. on the latter sum. But I have not deducted for seed or wages. These items are not reported. As to wages, I assume that 50 cents a day, with board and lodging, are at least equal on a farm to $1.16 a day in a manufacturing town where rents, fuel, and provisions are at climax rates. But I will, for the purpose of the comparison being drawn, admit that the wages of farm labor were in the year 1879 at the rate of only 50 cents a day, with board and lodgings, or 75 cents a day without board or lodgings. These average rates I consider better relatively than those paid to labor employed in manufacturing industries. At the rate of 75 cents a day or its equivalent, the amount paid to agricultural labor by our farmers for the year 1879 was $747,872,100. Deducting this sum from the $2,184,816,167 gross profits which accrued on farming capital that year, we reduce the latter to $1,436,944,067, which gives a gross return to that capital of about 11 or 12 per cent., as compared with the return of 36 or 37 per cent. which accrued on the capital employed in manufacturing.

If any error has occurred in Mr. COX's figures it will be found in overestimating farming profits. Enjoying such enormous profits on their investments, it is not surprising that the subsidized owners of the factories should oppose all efforts at reduction of their bounties; but it is surprising that those who are sent here to represent the people should aid in enforcing this unjust exaction upon their constituents to enrich this favored class.

There is no danger that legitimate manufacturing will suffer by a reduction of taxation. As long as we have such a large public debt and pension-list it will be necessary to collect the bulk of our revenue by tariff taxation, and a wise adjustment of the tariff duties will afford all the protection against foreign competition that will be necessary to develop and maintain American manufacturing interests.

The English manufacturers grow rich enough on 8 or 10 per cent. profit on the sales of their capital invested, and the American farmer is compelled to content himself on 11 per cent. or less.

Mr. Joseph Medill, of the Chicago Tribune, said in an address delivered before the American Agricultural Association, when alluding to their figures:

If our manufacturers would accept similar profits our tariff might be reduced more than half without requiring them to cut down the wages of their hands a single cent. It is quite clear that of every $4 "protection" adds to price of goods three goes into the pockets of the employing capitalists and only one to their workmen who fabricate the goods. And this accounts for the phenomena that the hotels of Washington and the Halls of Congress are filled to overflowing with a hired lobby, not only clamoring against any reduction of the present war tariff, but actually hounding and bulldozing the members of Congress to raise it still higher on the people.

PROTECTION PRODUCES SLAVERY.

In all ages the cunning few have sought to secure power and pelf at the expense of the many. The prerogatives and powers of kings and nobility and of the aristocratic classes were born of this desire. The struggle between the few seeking special privileges over the masses has continued from the earliest ages. It has existed in every land. Slavery is not confined to the condition which existed between the ancient Israelite and the Egyptians, the bondage of the feudal ages, to serfdom in Russia, or the negro in the South of later years, but as the learned professor of a New England college, Professor W. G. Sumner, says:

A slave is a man who earns and another takes his earning; therefore a man who pays double to an American manufacturer what he would pay another for goods is a slave.

As early as the reign of Elizabeth monopolies of a similar character were denounced as subjecting the people to bondage. In a Parliament of that reign brave old Sir Francis Bacon declared:

I can not utter with my tongue or conceive with my heart the great grievances that the town and country for which I serve suffereth by some of these monopolies. It bringeth the general profit into a private hand, and the end of all is bondage and beggary to the subjects.

As Christianity, civilization, and knowledge diffused their beneficent influences among men the ruder forms of slavery have given way, but the wickedness and cunning of a class to-day have devised a new form of slavery, and have put it in operation in this land of boasted freedom, The late bloody war broke the shackles of the negro slaves in the South, but designing men devised a system of taxation which enslaves the whites and blacks of the whole land, so that now we have white as well as black slavery. The slavery of old was that of force; that of to-day is by the legerdemain of legislative enactments.

THE EVILS OF PROTECTION AND DANGER OF OVERPRODUCTION.

But let us consider some further evils growing out of our tariff system. Our present and greatest future danger is overproduction. In other words, we are making more manufactured articles and producing more agricultural products than we can consume in our own country or market abroad. Indeed, we are already suffering from this evil. The present stagnation in business is due to it, the low price of our grain and other agricultural products is caused by it. Many manufacturing establishments have reduced the wages of their laborers and reduced the number of their employés, while others have closed their factories and turned their wage-people adrift without means of support. Many thousands of willing hands are idle to-day because more goods are in stock than can be sold.

Can any one fail to trace the cause for this sad condition of things to our system of protection, which on the one hand fostered and stimulated manufacture until it has reached the point where the supply is greater than the demand at home, while at the same time it has begotten a feeling of unfriendliness toward our commerce abroad to such an extent that foreign countries are discriminating against us and closing their markets to our goods? We have so long maintained this barrier against their products that they have been provoked to a spirit of retaliation against us.

AGRICULTURE OUR DEPENDENCE FOR NATIONAL WEALTH.

We are now sending but very few manufactured articles abroad. If it were not for our farm products, which constitute 77 per cent. of our products, the balance of trade would be against us and we would soon become pauperized, notwithstanding we have every natural advantage for manufacturing over any nation on earth.

Our total exports for the year ending June 30, 1883, amounted to $804,222,632. An analysis of these exports will show that agricultural products constituted $610,269,449 or 77 per cent. of all this vast sum. The table I will now read shows how small in comparison are the exports of protected manufactures with unprotected agriculture.

Products.	Value.	Per cent.

WHY ENGLAND OUTSTRIPS US IN TRADE.

We have all the raw materials in inexhaustible abundance within our own borders, the best and most intelligent workmen in the world in our midst, yet the little storm-beaten island of England, 3,000 miles away, has outstripped us in all the markets of the world in the sale of manufactured articles. She undersells us everywhere. She sends her ships to our ports. She buys cotton of our planters, transports it back to her shores, manufactures the raw material into articles of commerce, then comes right to our door and undersells us in Mexico, Central America, and South America; yea, even passes contemptuously beyond us to the other great ocean, and wrests from us the trade of the Pacific. Why is it so? Is it because the Englishman is more enterprising or energetic than the American? All the world knows that is not true. It is because she has established friendly commercial relations with the world, she has cast down all her barriers of protection, and opened her market to the products of every country.

REMEDY FOR OVERPRODUCTION—MARKET FOR OUR PRODUCTS.

Seeing the stagnation in our own trade and the danger of overproduction upon us, I turned my thoughts as a legislator some time ago to the question of devising a policy for extending our markets abroad. My attention was directed, of course, to the rich countries that lie south of us, Mexico, Central America, and South America. It seemed to me that with such an advantage of position and juxtaposition we could control that grand market. We have now one railroad in operation and are building other lines, which will penetrate to the very heart of the ancient dominion of the Montezumas. The Boston merchant may ship his goods by rail without breaking bulk to the city of Mexico, exchange them if he will for the rich products of that land which are so much needed in this country; whereas the English merchant must brave the perils of the sea for 3,000 miles, then reship his goods by rail at Vera Cruz. Our communication with Central and South America is not as close and easy as that with Mexico, but it is still far better than the communication with Europe.

The similarity of our political institutions naturally produces a greater desire on the part of those countries for trade with us than with the monarchies of the Old World. The products of the southern countries, in the main being different from our own, are just such as are needed by us, while our agricultural and mechanical products are equally as much needed by those countries. This makes it of mutual advantage for trade with us. Having the facility for supplying them with all they need, I have no doubt we ought to and can control that market to the exclusion of all other countries. An examination of the official statistics will show that the annual foreign commerce of these countries amounts in the aggregate of exports and imports to $653,701,000. They will further show that England imported into those countries $88,520,000; France imported $62,771,000, and that the share of the United States amounted to only $36,044,000; that even Germany's exports to those countries outstripped ours.

Now, why has England taken from us this trade which is within our reach? The answer is easy. It is because commerce with England is free, while that with the United States is shackled and hampered by our accursed tariff system.

AMERICAN CUSTOMS UNION.

In order that we might reform this blight on our commerce and secure that market for the surplus of our own workshops and farms I introduced in January last a joint resolution of which the following is a copy:

Whereas the establishment of free commercial intercourse among the nations now existing upon the continent of America will promote the friendly political relations, internal commerce and industry, and secure a more extensive market for the surplus products of each of said nations: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to invite the co-operation of the governments of the American nations in securing the establishment of a commercial league by and between the said nations, to be known as the Customs Union of America, the arrangement of a common basis of import duties from other countries than those which may compose said league, and that the commercial intercourse among the people of all the American States may be freed from the payment of any customs or other dues whatever; and that a common system of weights and measures may be also established for the purpose of facilitating such intercourse.

It will be seen that this joint resolution looks to the establishment of a customs union with a common basis of duties as against all other countries and the establishment of free trade among the nations on this continent. Such a proposition is no doubt acceptable to protected manufacturers as well as to the advocates of free trade in this country, for while it establishes the same freedom of trade with these countries that now exists among our own States, great advantage would flow to our manufacturers in having an exclusive market protected against competition from all other countries. Our own manufacturers surely can have no fear of competition with manufacturers in the southern countries, for they have no manufacturing establishments of any consequence located there. If that market could thus be secured then the danger of overproduction would pass away, and every mechanic and farm laborer who is idle to-day would find constant and remunerative employment. Thus would the marvelous resources of this continent be developed and the busy hum of prosperity be heard on every hilltop and in every valley of our land. This joint resolution, if adopted, would accomplish for the American nation what the customs union or Zollverein of Germany has accomplished for the prosperity and trade of the people of Germany.

RETALIATION AND DISCRIMINATION AGAINST AMERICAN COMMERCE.

If our present high protective duties are maintained greater evils than now exist will also be produced by increasing the unfriendliness of foreign countries toward our trade and commerce. If we continue to exclude by our tariff the products of other lands they will retaliate against us to a greater degree than ever before. Some of them have already commenced the work of retaliation. Germany and France have excluded our hog product. They have done this on the false pretense that it is diseased, but really because our tariff discriminates against their manufactured products. If England should pursue toward us the same course as Germany and France, what a deplorable calamity would befall the farming classes of this country.

England takes far more of our pork than either of the countries mentioned. If she should close her ports to it the price of our pork would fall so low that its production would cease to yield a profit to the producer. Suppose England should lay an average tariff duty of 42 per cent. or even one-fourth as much on our wheat and other grains as we do on her articles she sends us, can any one fail to see the disastrous effects of such action to our farmers. The price of our farm products to-day is regulated by the market in Liverpool. Wheat is lower now than it has been for twenty-four years. If England should feed us out of our protective-tariff spoon and lay a tariff duty upon our wheat the many millions of bushels which we now send her annually would lie on our hands and rot in our granaries and its production would cease to be profitable. She is not forced to take our wheat. Russia, India, Australia, and other countries would soon be able, if they are not already, to supply her demand for wheat.

Sir, this policy of protection is a standing menace to the welfare of the American farmer, a blight on his prosperity, a curse to him and his children. Whatever benefit there is in it flows into the pockets of the few constituting the manufacturing class; whatever evil in it falls upon the farmer. No man upon this floor who represents a farming constituency can vote to maintain this system and vote against a reduction of the tariff without betraying the interests of his constituency into the power of monopoly.

RECORD OF DEMOCRATIC PARTY ON TARIFF.

I will now present the record of the Democratic party on this great question as made by the declaration of its founders and the enunciation of its principles in its national and State platforms.

In the beginning of our Government when our fathers had just emerged from the despotism of England's rule which prevented the establishment of manufactures in the Colonies a justification existed, if any could ever exist, for laying duties with a view to protection. We had then no manufacturing interest of consequence. The antipathies to England were very great, and, together with the great necessity of building up our home manufactories, which were in reality in their infancy, the fathers had strong temptation to advocate protection.

MADISON'S VIEWS.

But, sir, in the first Congress that assembled under the Constitution, in 1789, Mr. Madison, who has been quoted by some gentleman as favoring the doctrine of protection defined his position, which is decidedly antagonistic to every principle of the heresy of modern protection. It is as follows:

In the first place, I own myself the friend to a very free system of commerce, and hold it as a truth that commercial shackles are generally unjust, oppressive, and impolitic. It is also a truth that if industry and labor are left to take their own course they will generally be directed to those objects which are the most productive, and this in a more certain and direct manner than the wisdom of the most enlightened legislature could point out. Nor do I think the national interest is more promoted by such restrictions than that the interest of individuals would be promoted by legislative interference directing the particular application of its industry.

For example, we should find no advantage in saying that every man should be obliged to furnish himself, by his own labor, with those accommodations which depend on the mechanic arts, instead of employing his neighbor who could do it for him on better terms. It would be of no advantage to the shoemaker to make his own clothes to save the expense of the tailor's bill, nor of the tailor to make his own shoes to save the expense of procuring them from the shoemaker. It would be better policy to suffer each of them to employ his talents in his own way. The case is the same between the exercise of the arts and agriculture—between the city and the country, and between city and town—each capable of making particular articles in abundance to supply the other; thus all are benefited by exchange, and the less this exchange is cramped by Government the greater are the proportions of benefit to each. The same argument holds good between nation and nation, and between parts of the same nation.

Who can doubt if Madison was sitting with us to-day he would not denounce the present system of protection and vote to reduce our protective duties?

JEFFERSON'S VIEWS.

The farthest verge in the direction of protection to which Mr. Jefferson ever went, and this was in the infancy of our manufacturing industry, was when he said:

Agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation are the most thriving when left most free to individual enterprise. Protection from casual embarrassments, however, may sometimes be reasonably interposed.

Jefferson wrote to Mr. Giles in 1825:

Under the power to regulate commerce they—assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufactures, and call it regulation to take the earnings of one of these branches of industry and that, too, the most depressed, and put them into the pockets of the other, the most flourishing of all.

JACKSON'S OPPOSITION TO PROTECTION.

Now let us see how Andrew Jackson stood on this question. In his eighth message, at a time like the present when a large surplus existed in the Treasury, that apostle of Democracy declared:

The influence of an accumulating surplus upon the legislation of the General Government and the States, its effects upon the credit system of the country, producing dangerous extensions and ruinous contractions, fluctuations in the price of property, rash speculations, idleness, extravagence, and a deterioration of morals, have taught us the important lesson that any transient mischief which may attend the reduction of our revenue to the wants of the Government is to be borne in preference to an overflowing Treasury.

Again he said:

The safest and simplest mode of obviating all the difficulties which have been mentioned is to collect only revenue enough to meet the wants of the Government, and let the people keep the balance of their property in their hands to be used for their own profit.

In his farewell address (1837) the Sage of the Hermitage, as his parting advice, said:

The taxes which it—

The United States—

lays upon commerce—being concealed from the real payer in the price of the article, they do not so readily attract the attention of the people as smaller sums demanded from them directly by the tax-gatherer. But the tax imposed on goods enhances by so much the price of the commodity to the consumer, and as many of these duties are imposed on articles of necessity which are daily used by the great body of the people, the money raised by these imports is drawn from their pockets.

POLK OPPOSED TO PROTECTION.

Mr. Polk is sometimes charged with being a protectionist. Read his declarations and see how shamefully he has been slandered.

[Polk's first annual message, December 2, 1845.]

The attention of Congress is invited to the importance of making suitable modifications and reductions of the rates of duty imposed by our present tariff laws. The object of imposing duties on imports should be to raise revenue to pay the necessary expenses of Government. Congress may undoubtedly, in the exercise of a sound discretion, discriminate in arranging the rates of duty on different articles, but the discriminations should be within the revenue standard, and be made with the view to raise money for the support of Government.

PRESIDENT PIERCE OPPOSED TO PROTECTION.

I will now ask the attention of the House while I read an extract from President Pierce's annual message, December 4, 1854:

I therefore renew my recommendation for a reduction of the duties on imports. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury presents a series of tables showing the operation of the revenue system for several successive years; and as the general principle of reduction of duties with a view to revenue and not protection may now be regarded as the settled policy of the country, I trust that little difficulty will be encountered in settling the details of a measure to that effect.

My time is too limited for further quotations from Democratic leaders. I will now invite your attention to the creed of the party, to its articles of faith as found in its national and State platforms.

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL PLATFORMS ON THE TARIFF.

The first declaration of principles which can be called a platform for the party was that of a Congressional caucus, which was known as Republican at that day as distinguishing it from Federalist, adopted at Philadelphia, on which Jefferson was first elected to the Presidency. It declared for—

6. Free commerce with all nations, political connection with none, and little or no diplomatic establishments.

The next Democratic platform was that of 1838, adopted by our first national convention for nominating candidates for the Presidency and vice-presidency. It was the platform on which Van Buren was elected. It declared—

Hostility to any and all monopolies by legislation, because they are violations of the equal rights of the people.

The true foundation of republican government is the equal rights of every citizen in his person and property and its management.

The next Democratic platform was that of 1840, adopted by the Presidential convention at Baltimore, which contains these resolutions:

4. Resolved, That justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to cherish the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our common country.

5. Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government.

The Democratic convention of 1844 reaffirmed the fourth and fifth resolutions of the convention of 1840.

The Democratic national convention of 1848—

Resolved, That the fruits of the great political triumph of 1844 have fulfilled the hopes of the Democracy of the Union, in the noble impulse given to the cause of free trade by the repeal of the tariff of 1842, and the creation of the more equal, honest, and protective tariff of 1846, and that in our opinion it would be a fatal error to weaken the bands of a political organization by which these great reforms have been achieved and risk them in the hands of their known adversaries, with whatever delusive appeals they may solicit our surrender of that vigilance which is the only safeguard of liberty.

The Democratic convention of 1852—

Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government and for the gradual but certain extinction of the public debt.

Resolved, And to sustain and advance among them constitutional liberty by continuing to resist all monopolies and exclusive legislation for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many.

In 1856 the Democratic national convention—

Resolved, That justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to cherish the interests of one portion of our common country.

It also repeated verbatim the first resolution quoted above of the convention of 1852, and then it—

Resolved finally, The time has come for the people of the United States to declare themselves in favor of free seas and progressive free trade throughout the world.

In 1860 both the Douglas and Breckinridge platforms reaffirmed the resolutions of 1856, quoted above.

In 1872 the Democratic convention (so called) at Baltimore—which was, in fact, a Greeley, and not a Democratic convention at all—did not adopt any Democratic resolutions, but indorsed the platform of the Liberal Republican convention held at Cincinnati, which contained the following curious declaration, making the tariff "a local issue:" * * * "We remit the discussion of the subject (protection and free trade) to the people in their Congressional districts and the decision of Congress thereon, wholly free from executive interference or dictation."

This is the only hiatus in the chain of assertions by the Democratic party of the doctrine of a tariff for revenue only. It resulted in the shameful defeat of a candidate supported by the party in defiance alike of principle and of policy.

In 1876 the Democratic convention spoke with no uncertain voice:

We denounce the present tariff, levied upon nearly four thousand articles, as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense. It yields a dwindling not a yearly rising revenue. It has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few. It prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor. It has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas. It has cut down the sales of American manufactures at home and abroad and depleted the returns of American agriculture—an industry followed by half our people. It costs the people five times more than it produces to the Treasury, obstructs the processes of production, and wastes the fruits of labor. It promotes fraud, fosters smuggling, enriches dishonest officials, and bankrupts honest merchants. We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue

In the Democratic platform of 1880 the old doctrine was tersely reproclaimed:

Home rule, honest money, consisting of gold, silver, and paper convertible on demand; the strict maintenance of the public faith, State and national, and a tariff for revenue only.

DEMOCRATIC STATE PLATFORMS.

Now read the platforms of the Democratic conventions in the States, and I call the special attention of certain Democrats in some of those States who have not only departed from the faith of the fathers on this great question but also from the authoritative declarations of the national Democratic conventions and of the conventions of their own States. We will begin with Maine.

Maine.—1869: "We reaffirm our adherence to the doctrine of free trade." 1870: "Free trade is the right of the people." 1875: Tariff for revenue.

New Hampshire.—1876: "We favor a tariff for revenue only." 1878: —Simple revenue.

Vermont.—1876: "A tariff for the purpose of revenue only."

Massachusetts—1870: "Except so far as the legitimate wants of the Government may require, free trade is the true policy of the country." 1871: "We demand a tariff for revenue only." 1877: Saint Louis platform. 1884: Reaffirms Cincinnati platform 1880. * * * "Believing that the present enormous surplus in the national revenues is demoralizing and dangerous; that it should be cut down without further delay, not by increasing public expenditures, but by lessening the burden of taxation; that the burden should be removed from the necessaries of life and not from whisky and tobacco, and that the policy of taxing imports, not for the purpose of raising revenue but of obstructing trade, is unsound and must ultimately be abandoned."

Connecticut.—1870: "A tariff for purposes of revenue only." 1871: Denounces the Republican party "because it has failed to reform the abuses of the tariff, permitting still the principle of protection and favoritism to override the idea of revenue." 1874: Declared it was "opposed to unjust and unequal systems of taxation, which tend to favor one class at the expense of other classes of the people," * * * and to all monopolies, which operate to the benefit of privileged persons and classes. 1876: "The tariff law should be adjusted for the purpose of revenue only." 1884: Call for Democratic convention, issued by Connecticut State central committee, April 2, 1884, "who are opposed to the processes of ring combinations and the continuance of a war tariff in time of peace, by which the people are plundered, are cordially invited to act with the Democratic organization in the selection of delegates and the election to follow."

Rhode Island.—1876: "Tariff for revenue." 1878: Saint Louis platform of 1876.

New York.—1871: "Government should lay no tax on imports except for revenue purposes." 1874: "Federal taxation for revenue only." 1876: "We are in favor of a tariff for revenue only." 1877: "A tariff for revenue only." 1880: "A tariff for revenue only."

New Jersey.—1871: "Taxation upon luxuries and the abolishment of taxes upon the necessaries of life." 1875: "Tariff for revenue." 1876: "Tariff for revenue." 1877: Saint Louis platform of 1876.

Delaware.—1876: "Tariff to raise revenue and not to favor special classes."

Maryland.—1873: "Revenue alone." 1875: "Only a sufficient revenue for general uses." 1877: Saint Louis platform of 1876.

South Carolina.—1876: Saint Louis platform of 1876.

West Virginia.—1880: Indorsed Cincinnati platform of 1880.

Ohio.—1869: "A tariff based upon revenue principles alone, upon the closest possible approximation to free trade." 1870: "No candidate for Congress nor for any other office is worthy of support who is not in favor of a low revenue tariff which closely approximates to free trade." 1871: "We are in favor of a strictly revenue tariff." 1875: "A tariff for the sole purpose of raising revenue." 1876: "We are in favor of a tariff for revenue only." 1877: "A tariff for revenue only."

Indiana.—1870: "We are in favor of a tariff for revenue only."

Illinois.—1871: "Taxes should be levied solely for the support of Government." 1878: "Revenue only." 1880: "No tariff for protection."

Michigan.—1874: "We demand a tariff for revenue only." 1882: "Aggressive revenue reform in the direction of free trade."

Iowa.—1877: "A tariff for revenue only." 1878: "A tariff for revenue only." 1883: "A tariff for revenue only." 1884: Saint Louis platform of 1876, and Cincinnati platform of 1880.

Minnesota.—1874: "A tariff for revenue only." 1876: "A tariff for revenue only." 1883: "Revenue only."

Wisconsin.—1871: "A tariff for revenue only." 1876: "A tariff for revenue only."

Kansas.—1878: "A tariff for revenue only."

Nebraska.—1874: "A tariff for revenue only." 1878: "Perfect commercial freedom, wherein we may sell where we can sell the highest and buy where we can buy the lowest."

Nevada.—1878: "A tariff for revenue only."

Oregon.—1872: "We are in favor of a tariff to raise money only for the necessary expenses of the Federal Government." 1882: "A strict revenue standard."

California.—1876: "A tariff for revenue only."

Colorado.—1878: "Opposition to all monopolies and class legislation."

Missouri.—1874: "A tariff for revenue only." 1878: "A tariff for revenue only."

Kentucky.—1876: "A tariff for revenue only."

Louisiana.—1876: Saint Louis platform of 1876.

Arkansas.—1878: "Revenue alone."

Alabama.—1880: Denounces protective tariff. Favors a "simple revenue tariff."

Tennessee.—1870: "No candidate is worthy of support who is not in favor of a low-revenue tariff which closely approximates free trade." 1874: "Solely with a view to collection of the necessary revenue."

Texas.—1882: "A tariff for revenue only."

Thus it will be seen that thirty-two of the thirty-eight States have declared for a revenue tariff and against protection.

For many of the quotations from Democratic leaders and State platforms I am indebted to the advanced sheets of the forthcoming work on Caucuses, Conventions, Platforms, and History of Tariff Legislation, by General Duncan S. Walker, a son of the late Robert J. Walker, whose labors upon this subject while Secretary of the Treasury and in the United States Senate distinguished him as one of the ablest of American political economists and statesmen.

The position of the vast majority of the Democratic party on this floor is in harmony with the principles announced in the foregoing platforms and declarations.

PRESENT POSITION OF DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

We do not believe the Constitution has conferred on Congress the power to lay taxes for any other than for public purposes, that the object of all taxes should be revenue, and that when you raise a tax above the revenue point it transcends the constitutional limit; but we do not believe that absolute free trade is practicable while we have a large public debt and such a long pension-roll, nor do we believe that direct taxation is wise or proper, therefore we are in favor of most of the revenue being collected by duties on foreign importations, and also if the tariff duties can be so adjusted as to aid and encourage our domestic industries without increasing the burdens of the people beyond what would otherwise be necessary, then to that extent we believe such incidental protection is admissible, and we believe such a policy wisely exercised will afford all the protection that any legitimate industry will require.

POSITION OF REPUBLICAN PARTY.

The position of the Republican party is, as it was defined in my speech delivered in the last Congress, which I will beg leave to repeat:

The policy of protection has indeed been favored by the Republican party since its organization, but, as I have intimated, its leaders have never been so bold and open in its advocacy as within the past few years. They formerly concealed their real purpose behind the mask of friendship for American labor, to raise revenue and other hypocritical pretenses, but now, obeying the behest of the late conventions of protectionists at Chicago and New York, the more advanced leaders announce that they are for protection for the sake of protection, and that the protection of labor and the raising of revenues are but incidents to the main and primary object. For this reason we have heard the declaration made during this debate that if no tariff was required for revenue at all, still a tariff for protection pure and simple would be advocated.

THE KIND OF DISCRIMINATION WHICH MEANS PROTECTION.

Some Democrats on this floor from the States of Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, and California have declared it to be their purpose to vote against this bill, and while they deny they are protectionists, yet they advocate the same doctrine under another term, which they call discrimination in favor of the manufacturing classes.

Protection is simply a process by which one man is forced to surrender a portion of his earnings for the enrichment of another.

This doctrine of discrimination, as insisted upon by these gentlemen, when boiled down to its essence, is virtually the same thing. They would lay taxes so as to discriminate in favor of those who engage in and are dependent upon manufacturing. Now, when you discriminate by laying taxes in favor of somebody, you must discriminate against somebody. Whom do they want to discriminate against? Why, of course all those who pay such discriminating taxes. And who are they? They are all those who are not so employed. These are the farmers and farm laborers and those in interest with them, who constitute a majority of the people as well as every one interested in manufacturing. The law of discrimination is at their expense, for it causes them to pay higher prices for their manufactured articles than they would pay if they were left free to buy them from those who will sell them the cheapest.

The census of 1880, as I have said before, shows that there were 50,000,000 in this land, and that of this vast number only about 1,000,000 were engaged in pursuits that were protected by the tariff. Now, sir, can it be said that a law so unjust to the vast majority is in the interest of the people at large? If it is not, is it constitutional? Is it Democratic? Is it just? Is it honest? I for one answer, no. If such be Democracy, then I have been deluded all my life, for I have always been a Democrat and have always entertained the belief that the principles of that party taught that legislation should operate for the equal advantage of all and that no enactment should be made exclusively in the interest of any special class.

But some of these gentlemen assert that this doctrine of discrimination was the doctrine of Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, and Polk. Shades of the great departed! What desecration of their memory and patriotic labors among men! Sir, therein gentlemen are wrong. The cardinal principles taught by those great men in governmental affairs was that the greatest good to the greatest number should be the aim of all legislation, and when they laid the foundations of this Government they made that principle its corner-stone. And now while these gentlemen advocate the system which spoliates the vast majority of the people for the benefit of the few, they still claim the right to lead the Democratic party.

BAD LEADERSHIP THE ISSUE.

Where will their leadership on that line land us? Will it not be into the camp of the enemy, where class legislation is the quintessence of the creed and monopoly the object of worship? God deliver us from such leadership!

To-day, sir, the issue will be presented which will test their sincerity for reductions of the burdens now lying so heavily upon the people. How will they lead us in this contest? Will they stand with us and resist the assault against reduction which the Republican leaders advertise us will be made? Notwithstanding all they have said in criticism of this bill I hope they will not ally themselves with the enemy. I trust their love of Democracy will cause them to scorn the position of followers of Republican leadership. What will be the issue to-day? It will be the question whether we shall stop the accumulations of the hard earnings of the people which are to become the prey of subsidy-seekers and jobbers, or whether we will go back to the people and say we failed to reduce your taxes because certain Democrats followed the leadership of Republicans and killed with one fell blow the only bill upon which we could vote that was presented to us for the purpose of reduction.

Let me warn these gentlemen that they are departing from the faith of the Democratic fathers, the solemn declarations of their party in national and State conventions, on this question.

In 1870 that brave, patriotic Democrat of Connecticut—Governor English—was elected governor of that State on a State platform which declared for "a tariff for purposes of revenue only." That same gallant leader of the Democracy of Connecticut but a few days ago announced in unequivocal terms that he was in favor of this bill, which has been so bitterly denounced by a Democratic member from that State.

In 1874 Ingersoll, Democrat, was elected governor of that State on a similar platform. And in 1876 Hubbard was elected governor by the Democracy of Connecticut on a platform of the same character. The call for a Democratic convention in that State, which was issued by the proper authorities about one month ago, shows that the heart of the Democracy of Connecticut is with those of us who are struggling for the passage of this bill.

AGITATION THE DUTY OF DEMOCRATS.

Those Democrats who oppose this bill say they are opposed to the agitation of this question at this time. They think it unwise while approaching the Presidential election. When do they expect to agitate it? Do they imagine that the position of our party can be concealed by ignoring this issue, and that we can silently slip into the Presidency without discussing the most vital issue of the day—an issue uppermost in the public mind? Sir, we were defeated in 1880 by just such a policy as they advocate. Our enemies very cunningly pursued the policy of silence on the prairies of the West and in the localities where they knew the majority of the people were plundered by protection. In those localities they avoided it and endeavored to arouse prejudices over false war issues, and when these failed resorted to their last and surest reliance, the corruption of the ballot-box with money furnished to a great extent by the monopolists protected by the tariff which we desire to reform. But, sir, in localities where the protected classes were in the majority they forced the fight on the tariff issue and made the people believe it was about the only issue involved in the election. Sir, silence and non-action on this question would be unwise, would be suicidal.

But suppose we could conceal our position by holding our tongues, would it be manly for us to do so? We all believe that protection for the sake of protection is unconstitutional; that it is an iniquity; that it is robbery.

Now, if we are sincere in these professions, will we deserve the confidence of the people, will we deserve victory, when we cowardly stand by and see the people wronged and plundered without any effort on our part to change it, and possessing as we do the power in this House to reform this great evil, when we go back to those who sent us here and should confess that we did not have the courage to right these wrongs, will they meet us with the gladsome tidings, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant?" Sir, the pathway of duty lies plainly before us, and if the party has the courage and integrity to walk in it, as sure as the sun will rise again it will lead us to victory.

THE GREATEST ISSUE.

Gentlemen! ignore this issue as you may, this great question will not down. It will continue to press to the front until it absorbs public attention. All others will pale into insignificance before it. The Democratic party has ever been the champion of the rights of the people, and as its champion it has now a great mission to perform. It is to emancipate them from the slavery of protection. We can never gain power by pandering to the protected monopolies. They will have no confidence in any professions we may make. They know the Republican party is their best friend. I tell you plainly that one reason why I am a Democrat is because I am an enemy to all forms of monopoly. If I did not believe that my party when in power would reform the great abuses occasioned by this infamous tariff system which so grievously afflicts the people I should be deeply aggrieved.

The great work of reform can only be accomplished by agitation. It was only after years of agitation that Cobden and Bright and the English reformers freed England from the bondage of protection and made her the queen of the world's commerce. Agitation will also free us from this bondage, and then will we wrest this scepter from England. With the declaration of political independence our young Republic conquered England on the bloody field of battle and established the greatest political power on earth. Now with a declaration of commercial freedom we shall as surely conquer England in the field of commerce and supplant the flag of Britain with the flag of the Republic in every sea. But the first great victory must be fought here at home. Scatter the seeds of truth; they will take root. Let us marshal our forces on this line.

The enemy will be a powerful one, well organized and well supplied with the sinews of war. They will do all that cunning can devise. All that money supplied by monopolist, contractors and office-holders can accomplish. But our quarrel is just, and thus are we thrice armed. With constant agitation we will make known the truth. Let us be true to ourselves, be true to the people, and they will give us victory.

THE TWO PACKED JURIES WHICH ROBBED OUR PEOPLE OF THEIR RIGHTS.

Twice in the history of this country have the fruits of victory been snatched from the people by the trickery and jugglery of packed juries. One was the so-called electoral tribunal and the other was the Tariff Commission.

The first was when by a quarter of a million of majority the people had elected a reform President who threatened a war upon monopoly and thievery and who would no doubt have relieved the people of the oppression of monopoly and the pillage of thieving officials. A packed jury was organized to try his title to the Presidency, although it was as clear and indisputable as any which had ever been held since Washington's day. Misguided Democrats fell into the snare spread by the cunning leaders of the Republican party and the right of suffrage was thus most shamelessly and foully stricken down.

Afterward, sir, when under Democratic leadership public sentiment had demanded the reform of our unconstitutional and unequal tariff system another packed jury was formed to protect monopoly and thwart the will of the people. And again some misguided Democrats fell into the snare spread by the cunning enemies of the people, and the work of reform was suppressed. When the scheme for relegating this question to a commission was presented in 1882 I then denounced it as an evasion of this great living issue. Reference to my speech of April 20, 1882, will show that I then said:

This dodge to take the issue of tariff reform out of the next election will fail of its purpose. The people will discover the hollowness of this makeshift, and they will put your party on trial in the next election for its unfaithfulness and dereliction of duty in this regard.

The people at that election did put that party on trial, and, as I had predicted, convicted it of dereliction of duty and supplanted it with the present Democratic majority in this House. This result was mainly due to the agitation of the tariff issue in the last Congress. Shall we now obey the will of the people and faithfully discharge the duty for which we were intrusted with power? Let each answer for himself when the roll is called, and he makes a record which will last as long as the archives of the Government are preserved.

APPENDIX.

[Jefferson to Washington, September 9, 1792. Washington's Writings, Volume X, page 518.]

When I embarked in the Government it was with a determination to intermeddle not at all with the legislature, and as little as possible with my co-departments. The first and only instance of variance from the former part of my resolution I was duped into by the Secretary of the Treasury and made a tool for forwarding his schemes, not then sufficiently understood by me; and of all the errors of my political life this has occasioned me the deepest regret. * * * If what was actually doing begat uneasiness in those who wished for virtuous government, what was further proposed was not less threatening to the friends of the Constitution. For in a report on the subject of manufactures (still to be acted on) it was expressly assumed that the General Government has a right to exercise all powers which may be for the general welfare; that is to say, all the legitimate powers of Government, since no government has a legitimate right to do what is not for the welfare of the governed.

There was indeed a sham limitation of the universality of this power to cases where money is to be employed? Thus the object of these plans taken together is to draw all the powers of Government into the hands of the general Legislature, to establish means for corrupting a sufficient corps in that Legislature, to divide the honest voter, and preponderate by their own the scale which suited, and to have that corps under the command of the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of subverting step by step the principles of the Constitution, which he has so often declared to be a thing of nothing, which must be changed.

[Jefferson to Giles, December 26, 1825.]

DEAR SIR: I wrote you a letter yesterday, of which you will be free to make what use you please. This will contain matters not intended for the public eye, I see, as you do, and with the deepest affliction, the rapid strides with which the Federal branch of our Government is advancing toward the usurpation of all the rights reserved to the States, and the consolidation in itself of all powers, foreign and domestic; and that, too, by constructions which, if legitimate, leave no limits to their power.

Take together the decisions of the Federal court, the doctrines of the President, and the misconstructions of the constitutional compact acted on by the legislature of the Federal branch, and it is but too evident, that the three ruling branches of that department are in combination to strip their colleagues, the State authorities, of the powers reserved by them, and to exercise themselves all functions, foreign and domestic. Under the power to regulate commerce, they assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufactures, and call it regulation to take the earnings of one of these branches of industry, and that too the most depressed, and put them into the pockets of the other, the most flourishing of all.—Memoirs, Correspondence, &c., volume 4, page 431.

The Democratic House of Representatives, in 1877, resolved:

That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to so revise the tariff as to make it purely and solely a tariff for revenue, and not for protecting one class of citizens by plundering another.

Voted for by 60 Democrats and 7 Republicans. Voted against by 12 Democrats and 64 Republicans. December 1, 1877.

May 6, 1882.—Mr. MILLS moved in the House of Representatives to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report within thirty days a bill framed in compliance with the following instructions:

1. That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government economically administered.
2. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate that will yield the largest amount of revenue.
3. That below such rate discrimination may be made descending in the scale of duties, or for imperative reasons the article may be placed on the list of those free from all duty.
4. That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on luxuries.
5. That all specific duties should be abolished and ad valorem duties substituted in their place, care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and undervaluation and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.
6. That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

Voted for by 74 Democrats and voted against by 21 Democrats and 137 Republicans.

The foregoing are the principles for revising the tariff suggested by Robert J. Walker when Secretary of the Treasury in 1845.

Mr. GIBSON. It is conceded upon all sides that the revenues of this country amount to about $100,000,000 more than the Government has any need for. As one of the Representatives from my State I am ready to cast my vote for a revision and a reduction of the tariff rates so as to make the amount of taxes collected by the Government commensurate with the demands of the Government.

I am sorry that the bill now pending as prepared is not exactly in such form as would do justice to my State, nor exactly in the form which I can support. But like all other legislation before all legislative bodies, it comes here to be acted upon and to be amended according to the wisdom and the patriotism of the body which acts upon it. To decline now to consider it and to amend it is an obstruction in the way of needed legislation. To take it up and undertake to amend it is to act in good faith for the perfection of legislation.

I am not willing for one to enter into a coalition with the Republican party of this House to obstruct wise and patriotic legislation by the Democratic majority. I am willing to trust to the patriotism, to the wisdom, and to the honesty, to the good sense, and the good faith of the friends of this measure, and I have every reason to believe that the Democratic party of this House will endeavor to do exact justice to my State and to all sections. Should they fail, it will then be time for me to condemn their action. My State asks the same protection for her interests that is given the interests of other States—that and no more. Upon that platform I am willing to go before the country and abide by their honest and their fair consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in life so sensitive to adverse criticism and which takes alarm so quickly as capital invested in large industrial enterprises. In this connection we are reminded of Lord Chatham's celebrated expression, "Confidence is a plant of slow growth." Upon it is superimposed a structure involving the welfare of millions of all classes, and to them withdrawal of that confidence means panic, disaster, ruin. Therefore aught that unjustly tends to that end is in legislation not a blunder only, but a crime.

While in common with all other interests it is liable to be called upon by taxation to aid in support of the Government, we owe it to ourselves that nothing like a vindictive policy shall be adopted. In the nice adjustment of business affairs there is nothing more conducive to success than stability. If there be stability it is the sure foundation of confidence in the administration of public affairs, and as a natural result capital and labor move forward in their respective spheres in content and accord and with mutual profit.

To judge from the intemperate language and exaggerated rhetoric which have so frequently marked this debate it would seem as if those engaged in industrial pursuits were robbers and outlaws. We know as a matter of fact they are nothing of the sort, and that it is wicked as well as unjust vituperation. They are a part, and no mean part, of the business of the country, and under the law have been invited to engage in these employments, and therefore, if for no other reason, are entitled to the protection of law. They are a part of our resources as a nation, and to develop those resources is according to the wisest statesmen the test of true statesmanship.

I rejoice in the growth and prosperity of every section of the country, knowing full well that what helps or hurts one must necessarily have an effect for good or for evil on the other. Swift, in Gulliver's Travels, says:

> And he gave it for his opinion that whoever would make two ears of corn or two blades of grass to grow where only one grew before would deserve better of mankind and do more essential service to his country than the whole race of politicians put together.

But if we would believe the wild denunciations of the men who so unjustly characterize those who are engaged in productive industrial pursuits, those who have built up our own manufactures and freed us from dependence upon foreign producers, have committed an unpardonable sin. I can see a good reason why our great competitor, England, should think so, but not why such should be the feeling of our own citizens.

Great Britain has never ceased to deplore the loss of her American Colonies and their remunerative trade. She struck us, as she thought, a deadly blow in the war of 1812, and during our late civil war she did her best to sunder the two sections and to cripple us. Since then she has changed her policy, and instead of force she resorts to persuasion and advice. Her agents everywhere recommend free trade to us. She ekes out the lion's skin with that of the fox. It does not escape us, however, the conditions of the two countries as well as the elements of the two governments are diametrically opposed. A sea-girt island, she has sought to absorb the commerce and markets of the world, and she has not been scrupulous how she did it. Wherever she could she has seized the controlling points of the great water ways of trade. She holds with the grip of death Gibraltar to dominate the Mediterranean, and she controls the Red Sea by occupying Bab-el-Mandeb. So it is and always has been with her. With all her pretense of morality, she has compelled the hundreds of millions of Chinese to poison themselves with her opium.

No, Mr. Chairman, it will not do, for we remember the warning of the Trojan priest to fear the Greeks even when they brought gifts, and that Pericles said:

> For he who repents the seldomest of gratifying the wishes of his foes will pass through life with most security.

[Applause.]

We are to-day dealing with issues vast as the hopes and fears of fifty-five millions of people whose moral, social, and physical condition are the alluring example of every government on the face of the earth. Shall we blast or bless them with our legislation? Shall we unsettle their business interests by constant tinkering with the tariff? Shall no law last longer than the meeting of the next Congress? Shall our coming here be the cause of terror, and our adjournment the cause of rejoicing? Shall nothing ever be settled, for a time, at least; but shall doubt and distress always haunt the waking and sleeping hours of the people? For one, I am emphatically opposed to any such suicidal policy. It would be madness for any party to pursue it. [Applause.]

Now, let us see what has happened in the recent past. By the act of May 15, 1882, to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff, it was provided in the third section:

> SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff, or a revision of the existing tariff, upon a scale of justice to all interests; and for the purpose of fully examining the matters which may come before it, said commission, in the prosecution of its inquiries, is empowered to visit such different portions and sections of the country as it may deem advisable.

This was honest statesmanship. It was wise legislation. Men of both parties and from all sections supported it. The report of the commission, embracing the testimony of all who chose to appear and the conclusions on all that had been seen and heard, was submitted to Congress in December, 1882. That report was fully and ably discussed until March 3, 1883. A large surplus revenue, looked upon as a crying evil, was then to be got rid of, which, while it was unjust to the people to insist upon taxation longer than it was required by the needs of the Government, was also a constant temptation to extravagant appropriations and every conceivable scheme to deplete the Treasury. Beside, there were faults and incongruities to be corrected in the tariff laws which experience had shown to exist. And so general was this feeling that even the Industrial League publicly announced its approval of such reforms.

Legislation after all, and especially on economic and business matters, is a compromise between conflicting individual views of members and communities and interests. And, as the best thing that could then be done, Congress passed the act approved March 3, 1883, to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes. It was designed to make reductions in the revenue; but exactly how much was one of those problems which baffled prophecy. Experience and time alone could tell. Yet before the interests affected by the reduction could adjust themselves to the changed conditions a new agitation was set afoot in this House and, as far as possible, over the country, producing unrest in every industry and business. The panic was as dangerous and as hurtful as if there really was to be radical changes, although it has come to be understood no result can be reached at this session of Congress with an adverse Senate and a Republican Executive.

If I wished, I might quote Judge Story's celebrated summary, published in Elliott's Debates, of the position assumed and the arguments made in nullification times; and I might recite the earnest efforts made in the First Congress by Virginia Representatives to have her mineral-coal pits protected as well as her hemp and beef, asking even in the latter case prohibition of the foreign article. It would be curious reading, as it is like so much of the hot debate we have heard on this floor. But I do not like to cause prejudice or bias of a sectional character, or even to seem to do it, and therefore I refrain.

It is submitted to every member's judgment whether to apply at once to this bill the heroic remedy, or to let it linger out a sickly existence, bringing in its wake commercial disaster, business confusion, and general bankruptcy.

The bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, and now under consideration, is a sharp 20 per cent. horizontal cut of existing schedules of all duties on imported articles embraced therein. It is not based on any sound principle. We have had apologies for it but no defense. It is "guessed" it may reduce the surplus revenue likely to be collected in the future, but nobody pretends to speak with certainty.

There is no attempt at adjustment. It slices reckless of the injury it may do to certain interests and industries or to the revenue. It is like the famous bed of the old robber, Procrustes: if the man was too small, he was stretched out to its inexorable length; and if too long, he was cut down to fit it exactly. [Applause.] It is an arithmetical tariff; it is a thing of measurement, and not a wise, well-digested scheme of adjustment of duties laid, not only with regard to revenue but to the interests of people and Government, which are equally involved. For if there be inequality it is because of unjust adjustment, and a horizontal reduction affords no remedy. On the contrary, it makes worse what was bad before. It is a palpable confession of inability to handle the intricate and difficult problems in issue, or else a rash eagerness to do what was alike uncalled for, unready, unwise, and unfortunate. It appears to be agitation only for the sake of agitation; always a mistake.

It was the clear dictate of common sense to have waited until we could be advised of the working of the tariff and tax law we had passed only one year ago, and thus while informing ourselves for careful and accurate legislation, have saved from all the passion and turbulence of a Presidential election a question in which the public welfare is so deeply concerned, and which, if it were possible, should never be made a purely partisan issue.

But this 20 per cent. reduction is not so dangerous for what it does as for what it promises. In this respect we are not left to conjecture. It is proclaimed to be a firm first step toward free trade. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DORSHEIMER] uses the following language:

> It has never been our doctrine that taxes should be levied for the purpose of taking money from one citizen and giving it to another. The much-talked-of Ohio declaration is for "a tariff for revenue limited to the necessities of the Government, economically administered." If there is a Democrat here who believes that this bill will increase the revenue and who is still disposed to regard the declarations of his party, I say to him, "We are entitled to your vote, because the existing tariff is by your admission far above the revenue standard." Let us take off one-fifth now. If that does not reduce the revenue we can take off more. Some time we will cut to the quick and draw the blood. f 20 per cent. will not reduce the revenue, perhaps 50 per cent. will.

Be well advised what you do ere it is too late. Consider what free trade, so called, means to us. It means the change of our whole scheme of collecting revenue. Our people have become accustomed to import duties; it has proved to be the easiest, safest, and best method of taxation; it causes no friction, or comparatively little. All this must be abolished, our internal-revenue war taxes continued, and resort made for whatever additional revenue may be required to direct taxation. Is this House prepared for that? Is that the wish of our people? The old Confederation relied on direct taxation, and it was a failure. Our forefathers sought refuge under the Constitution in a different system, and the result was "a more perfect union," in order to "provide for the common defense and general welfare."

What does direct taxation mean? An answer is found in an extract from a speech delivered in this House April 12, 1882, by Hon. Columbus Upson, a Democratic Representative from the State of Texas:

As an illustration of some of the practical workings of free trade and direct taxation the people of each State would have to pay annually their share of the national tax, according to the number of population in their respective States.

Alabama's share would be about	$6,500,000
Arkansas' share would be over	4,000,000
California's share would be about	4,300,000
Georgia's share would be over	8,000,000
Illinois' share would be about	16,000,000
Indiana's share would be over	10,000,000
Kentucky's share would be over	8,500,000
Mississippi's share would be about	6,000,000
Missouri's share would be about	11,300,000
New York's share would be about	26,500,000
South Carolina's share would be over	5,000,000
Tennessee's share would be about	8,000,000
Texas' share would be between	$8,000,000 and 10,000,000
Virginia's share would be about	8,000,000

Let the Representatives of the respective States of this Union carry the legacy of free trade and direct taxation home to their people as the fruits of their labors, and political obituaries would be the order of the day all over the land.

[Laughter and applause.]

Thus spoke that able Representative. I know only of one man in history who had the power who proposed to remove all duties on imports and depend upon direct taxation, and he was Nero, the Emperor of Rome, whose name is associated with everything that is bad and infamous.

Milman, in his History of the Romans, says:

The abolition of the whole system of indirect taxation throughout the Empire would indeed have been the conception of a madman.

The title of the pending proposition is "a bill to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes." It is a captivating caption, and undoubtedly was so designed. But does it reduce war taxes? It would if it abolished internal-revenue taxation, but it does not. The law of 1883 did reduce it largely, and it was better deserving of the title than this bill.

Just after the meeting of this Congress I addressed a reply to a very kind letter from friends in Tennessee, which was published, and from which I beg to quote. I said:

With Albert Gallatin I have regarded the excise or internal-revenue taxes as offensive to the genius of our people, and tolerated by the framers of the Constitution only as a measure of necessity in the emergency of war, and that just so soon as the occasion for them had passed away they should cease to exist. He and Thomas Jefferson, as the very first act of Jefferson's administration, secured a repeal of internal taxes and relieved the people from their inequality, inquisitorial annoyances and hordes of officials clothed with dangerous powers. Only in these latter days have I heard men calmly claim these war taxes are still necessary—a generation after the war which gave rise to them had closed. And it is a very suggestive and suspicious feature of the affair that those upon whom the tax is laid clamor loudly against its being taken off, regarding it no doubt as a protection against competition to the large monopolies.

To substantiate the ground taken by me in that letter, I will refer to two authorities. I will read first from Blackstone's Commentaries (book 1, pages 317–318) to show excise is a war tax:

But at the same time the rigor and arbitrary proceedings of excise laws seem hardly compatible with the temper of a free nation. For the frauds that might be committed in this branch of the revenue, unless a strict watch is kept, make it necessary, wherever it is established, to give the officers the power of entering and searching the houses of such as deal in excisable commodities at any hour of the day, and, in many cases, of the night likewise. And the proceedings in case of transgression are summary and sudden.

However, its "original establishment was in 1643, and its progress was gradual, both sides protesting it should continue no longer than to the end of the war, and then be utterly abolished. * * * But from its first origin to the present time its very name has been odious to the people of England." It has been kept up, however, to supply the enormous sums necessary to carry on the continental wars of Europe.

So believed Jefferson; and let us next see what he did. I read from Schouler's History of the United States, vol. 2, page 21:

In economy and retrenchment the President had already made a beginning by reducing the diplomatic establishment and consolidating some revenue offices subject to executive control. The movement now contemplated was to abolish that whole system of internal taxation, which he had heartily detested as tyrannous, burdensome, and liable to abuse of patronage; which had always been unpopular in the Middle and Southern country, and which cost more than the first three years' net produce to put down resistance to its collection. But excise receipts had risen gradually to the neighborhood of $1,000,000, and many feared that the Treasury would suffer if this resource was suddenly cut off. Jefferson had, however, gone over the ground carefully with Secretary Gallatin; against the present yield of the internal taxes they set off what the Government might safely economize elsewhere. Customs duties alone would, as they correctly surmised, supply a revenue sufficient to support the Federal establishment, and, besides paying interest on the public debt, extinguish its principal, should peace continue, in fifteen or eighteen years. Federalists were incredulous, and those with friends in place tried to induce a repeal, only partial at most, but the ax was laid to the root, and with the downfall of this system went about half the offices at the disposal of the Administration.

If this internal-revenue system were abolished to-day we would have no surplus revenue to scare us, while the administration of public affairs would be rendered purer and better.

While alluding to the surplus money accruing from excess of revenue over expenditures, I desire to give for the information of the House the probable amount of receipts and expenditures for the current years, as obtained by me from reliable sources in the Treasury Department. I consider it important the House should be carefully advised on this subject:

Receipts and expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year 1884 (actual for first three-quarters and estimated for last quarter).

Actual receipts first three-quarters:
Customs		$150,662,000
Internal revenue		87,155,000
Miscellaneous		24,088,000
Estimated receipts for last quarter:
From all sources		86,000,000
Total receipts, actual and estimated		347,905,000
Total expenditures for first three-quarters	$179,692,000
Estimated expenditures last quarter	62,000,000
Total expenditures, actual and estimated		241,692,000
Surplus		106,213,000
Estimated amount due sinking fund		45,816,741
Estimated surplus		60,386,259

We are here invited to choose between a firm first step toward free trade, with attendant internal and direct taxation, or else to await reform of our tariff until such time as we have the political power to build upon the principles expressed in what is known as the Ohio declaration, with incidental protection to American labor and American industry. I have no difficulty in choosing between the two lines of public policy, and I choose for my own people and my own country, and against all their competitors, whether open or concealed enemies. [Applause.]

I do this in the full assurance that free trade will bring nothing but disaster and ruin, while the principles expressed in the declaration to which I have alluded, and which have been so generally approved, will bring prosperity, happiness, and a higher order of civilization. I have never asserted there existed constitutional warrant favoring protection for the sake of protection, but I do say it is too late to urge the unconstitutionality of incidental protection. The unbroken practice of the Government for more than ninety years by those who have preceded us, including those who framed our Constitution, and our success under this system down to the present time, conclusively dispose of such tardy objection. The value of incidental protection is attested by the experience of almost a century. This mode of laying discriminating duties on our imports has supported our Government, paid the debts of three wars, given employment to men, women, and children, numbering in 1880 many millions; increased the investment of capital to the enormous sum of three thousand millions of dollars, and consumed more than three thousand millions of dollars' worth of the products of agriculture, mining, lumbering, fishing, and other industries of the country; and, more than all, it has rendered us as a nation independent of the world. [Applause.] It has paid about one-half of the debt contracted during our civil war. These results are surprising in their grandeur of achievement, and equal, if they do not surpass, any financial policy ever before witnessed. [Applause.]

It is universally admitted our revenue should be reduced. The manner of reduction is the only question in dispute. The sources of this revenue are as different as possible. The internal revenue is fixed and certain in amount, but it is, as I have shown, offensive and dangerous. In its abolition I would begin relief. The other revenue comes from duties on imports. It is the most acceptable of all taxes, because it is in some measure voluntary, and while supporting the Government gives at the same time encouragement to our industries and is free from the evil of hordes of Federal tax-gatherers clothed with arbitrary and summary power in each Congressional district. We have seen the baleful influence of this official patronage brought to bear upon the freedom and purity of our elections.

If the naked issue, which of these two systems should be abolished, were submitted to the people, no well-informed man can doubt the result would sweep from the statute-book every vestige of the hated internal taxes. But unfortunately an opinion has taken possession of temperance advocates that the tax on whisky (although less than one cent a glass) lessens its production, and of course its consumption; and that opinion has been studiously cultivated by the free-trade interest to aid its purpose of abolishing the duties on imports. But the overproduction of whisky has compelled its holders to ask the Government to relieve them from present payment of taxation, and that is a complete answer to that theory. This alliance between taxed whisky and tobacco also exposes the insincerity of the assertion that free trade will relieve agriculture of its so-called burdens. This insincerity as to agriculture is made still plainer when we remember the very men on this floor who speak in behalf of agriculture have within a short time refused to give any relief to wool-raising, one of the largest agricultural interests which the so-called protectionists attempted to protect.

It is alleged that overproduction, under an incidental protective system, has caused the present stagnation in business. If so, could it be corrected by adding to that overproduction by increased importation of like products from other countries coming here because of reduced duties? It could not, for then the Government would be still richer, while our people, driven out of their own markets, would be impoverished.

Free trade never did and never will exist between countries having different governmental institutions and of course existing under different conditions, because these different conditions vary the cost of production. It will not be denied that the rate of interest indicates the cost of living, that the cost of living indicates the price of labor, and that the price of labor indicates the cost of production. This rule may sometimes be disturbed by abnormal conditions, such as crop failures, war, or overtrading. The country which has the lower rate of business interest will drive the country having the higher rate of business interest out of the world's markets, and eventually out of its own domestic markets; it will absorb all its means of paying its debts, including all its specie, than which nothing can be worse.

There is no mode of recovery from such disaster save, first, by the reduction of the rate of business interest to a par with low-interest countries, or, secondly, by the imposition of such duties on imports as will raise the cost of the foreign article to the cost of the domestic article in the home market. The first of these remedies must result in depreciation of all values, and therefore in insolvency, in disemployment, discontent, and general disturbance. The best cure, therefore, is imposition of duties equal to the protection of American labor, to be repeated just as often as theorists disregard the lessons of experience in this respect. The degree of credit bears relation to the disaster inflicted, and when the former is large it promotes and increases the latter to the same or a greater extent. All the conditions to which I have alluded are more to our disadvantage in this country than in most of those we trade with, and it is therefore clear a greater degree of distress is sure to follow here than elsewhere under these circumstances.

We have to-day about 55,000,000 of people, 25,000,000 living by agriculture, and 30,000,000 on the earnings of personal property invested in general business or by their daily labor with head and hand, or by all combined. The agriculturists receive high prices for all their farm products, their farms are free from debt, and no commercial embarrassment denies them the necessaries of life. Not as fortunate are the other 30,000,000, and consequently considerate if not more tender treatment is essential to their success so far as our trade and commerce with other nations are concerned.

Seven thousand millions of personal property are invested in 120,000 miles of railroad, three thousand millions in manufactures, as much more in merchandising, banking, and other employments, all facilitating exchange between producers and consumers, and all extremely sensitive to every change of statute and consequent disturbance in trade and commerce. Of this 30,000,000 of people 3,000,000 are engaged in manufactures, while as many, or nearly 7,000,000 altogether, are dependent on them for support. I mention these facts to prove to you how cautious we should be in legislating as is proposed by this bill.

If we are to listen to the counsel and advice given us to abandon the heretofore settled policy of the Government in favor of incidental protection and thus enable the foreigner to glut our markets with the products of ill-paid toil, panic and bankruptcy are certain soon to follow. Now, would it not be wiser to postpone the consideration of so important a question until after we have passed through the excitement of a Presidential struggle, and with better information of what the last change of the tariff has accomplished and what there is still to do, await the sober second thought and profounder reflection for the adoption of a real measure of reform which will remain undisturbed for years and which will be safe, steady, and universally acceptable? Then the business interests of the country will have time to adapt themselves to whatever changes may occur. It should be stripped of all purpose of the one party or the other to look only to party advantage in securing public patronage as the result of an impending election.

Although this subject ought not to involve any question of party allegiance or be viewed as a means of party success, it may be well to consider how far its agitation may advance or retard the march to victory of the great Democratic party. However certain some of my political associates may feel of carrying every Southern State, those alone are inadequate to success. And which of the Northern States is likely to accept the new dispensation? I am fully conscious I should speak plainly and utter my fears even in the presence of our political opponents.

Take the four great States of Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. The census shows that more than 1,100,000 persons are engaged in manufactures in these four great Commonwealths. The election returns show that the Democratic votes in those States are but little in excess of that number. Do gentlemen believe deprivation of employment or reduction of wages is a potent factor in winning the support of these people, and especially when the Republican organization, aroused by Republican orators, backed by a powerful press, sustained by ample means, will thunder in their ears by day and by night the too plausible charge that the Democratic party has been the main cause of their distress?

I beg you to ponder these things and not lightly dismiss them from your minds. Let them prompt your action to-day and all will be well. One thing is certain: you will not act without a warning, and it is kindly meant, but is none the less emphatic, as it springs from serious and severe study and deep conviction of its truth.

If, however, Mr. Chairman, the inexorable logic of events should demonstrate my apprehensions to be groundless, there is no one who will be more willing to acknowledge my error and rejoice that my associates have been right. But to me it seems inevitable that the action of the Ways and Means Committee will fall little short of public condemnation. It is to be deplored, therefore, that such an ill-advised step should have been taken, for the triumph of the principles of the Democratic party has been dear to me, and I have sought it steadily and ardently in the severe labors in this House for now nearly a quarter of a century. If disaster shall come, I at least shall have the consolation of knowing it was led to defeat by other advice than mine.

No reactions are more sudden or more complete than where pledges have been given to the people and those pledges have been unfulfilled after a successful party enters upon power. All history is full of instructive examples. Therefore it is our bounden duty with honorable alacrity to do exactly what we promised. And what did we pledge ourselves to in the elections of 1883 in Ohio, Virginia, North Carolina, West Virginia, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania? It is not necessary I should repeat all the platforms of the Democratic conventions of these several States. I will content myself with quoting a few of them. North Carolina resolved, July, 1883, in these words:

We demand such a revision of the tariff as will produce a revenue sufficient for the economical support of the Government, with such incidental protection as will give to domestic manufactures a fair competition with those of foreign production.

Pennsylvania declared:

4. We favor a tariff for revenue limited to the necessities of the Government, economically administered, and so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive industries at home, and afford just compensation to labor, but not to create or foster monopolies; and to this end we favor the abolition of the internal-revenue system of taxes and such adjustment of the existing tariff duties as will be consistent with these principles.

The Virginia State convention resolved, July, 1883:

III. We favor unconditional and immediate abolition of the internal-revenue system—a nursery of spies and informers, and menace of the freedom of elections, an intolerable burden on the tax-payers and source of the greatest corruption, and in its practical operation a special burden on this State and our interests.

IV. We favor a tariff for revenue limited to the necessities of a government, economically administered, and so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive industries at home, and afford just compensation to labor, and not to create or foster monopolies.

And so they all declared, repeating one after the other the famous platform of the Ohio Democracy. It was on that ground we made our successful campaigns in nearly every one of those States; and is it not apparent to the least observant the pending bill with its arbitrary horizontal cut of 20 per cent. is in direct violation of those pledges? I shall at whatever cost keep my faith, and in so doing I know I shall seek the highest good of my country by advancing the welfare of its industrious people. Theoretical zealots may contend for impossible doctrines, and madly attempt to control human nature and force it to bend its free energies to the caprice of their will, but I know by experience how futile in government is mere theory and how valuable is common sense. I believe in that which has stood the strain of long practice and has blessed us with beneficence. Nor can I be expected to yield it for something impossible, impracticable, and which comes recommended to us by those whose interests it is to seek our ruin, that upon it they may build up their own trade, their own manufactures, and their own prosperity. [Great applause.]

I shall append to these remarks the speech I delivered on the Tariff Commission bill. It is as follows:

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose in this debate to be as brief and practical in the expression of my views as possible, preferring, for obvious reasons, the postponement of all general discussion of details of necessary legislation until the revision of the present tariff shall be directly under consideration. It is a subject at all times, and in every country, full of difficulty and embarrassment, and yet it is as old as government itself, and has exhausted, as we know, the highest mental efforts of the most celebrated statesmen. Some few points have been settled and accepted generally, but they are not many. Hallam, the justly esteemed constitutional historian, in his "Europe During the Middle Ages," lays down this axiom, which our experience as a people justifies and which will not be disputed:

"It is difficult to name a limit beyond which taxes will not be borne without impatience when they appear to be called for by necessity and faithfully applied; nor is it impracticable for a skillful minister to deceive the people in both these respects. But the sting of taxation is wastefulness. What high-spirited man could see without indignation the earnings of his labor, yielded ungrudgingly to the public defense, become the spoil of parasites and peculators? It is this that mortifies the liberal hand of public spirit; and those statesmen who deem the security of government to depend not on laws and armies, but on the moral sympathies and prejudices of the people, will vigilantly guard against even the suspicion of prodigality."

It is equally true that excessive taxation, even when it is successful in securing excessive revenue, is ultimately destructive of the sources of labor from which it is drawn; while at the same time it engenders extravagance, corruption, and decay. For when the Government sets the example of extravagance, it is soon followed in every walk of life, and one does not need to be a prophet to foretell the general ruin which must inevitably result. Frugality and economy never destroyed any government, while they have built up the most powerful empires the world has ever witnessed.

So much for general statement. Revenue laws have been a subject of discussion, agitation, and anxiety from the earliest days of our political history. Indeed, Sabine, in his "Loyalists of the American Revolution," states positively his convictions after careful study of documentary history and state papers that they "teach nothing more clearly than this, namely, that almost every matter brought into discussion was practical, and in some form or other related to labor, to some branch of common industry." He states further on there were no less than twenty-nine laws which restricted and bound down colonial industry.

The manner of raising the necessary revenue for the support of the Government has been, as I have said, at all times in the United States the cause of irritation to the people. And we need not be surprised at this, when we consider the vast extent of our domain, and the almost endless diversity of productions of the soil, and of manufacturers, and every other branch of human industry.

The existing overflowing Treasury brings a demand for reduction of the tariff and internal-revenue taxes. In my opinion, in such a condition of our finances reduction of taxation should at once begin. Unnecessary taxation is injurious to the interests of the people in many directions. Government has no justification for the collection of burdensome taxes in excess of the sum requisite for the support of its proper administration. What have we seen in this Congress? The excess of our resources has induced the presentation of every conceivable scheme to deplete the Treasury, and our expenditures, unless checked in time, will reach enormous proportions and bring back again, as prior to 1874, a saturnalia of extravagance and disgrace.

In the matter of taxation we are acting under a written Constitution. "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." I need not enlarge upon our traditional history in this regard, and it will be accepted as true that only at periods of great necessity and urgency have excise or internal taxes been resorted to. Our present internal-revenue system grew up out of the necessities of the war, and when those necessities cease that taxation should disappear. When the framers of the Constitution granted the power to impose excise duties it was a point of serious dispute and was agreed to finally only as a resort in case the Government should be involved in war, and not to be exercised as a permanent mode of raising revenue.

I will not enlarge upon this; I believe it to be incontrovertible, however men may change sides because of other considerations affecting other questions; and I do not forget that Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence and the founder of the Democratic party, brought about the repeal of internal or excise taxes as one of the very first acts of his administration as President of the United States.

I favor, therefore, as speedily as possible, a total abolition of our internal-revenue system, and I am ready to join hands with any and all in this House in favor of an equalization of our duties on imports. No one who understands the existing tariff laws will deny the justice and necessity of revision. The present duties were for the most part levied during war and for the purpose of raising a large war revenue. It will suffice in this connection to quote the Industrial League as unanswerable in this regard, as it is an admission on the part of those who favor the highest protective duties:

"They consider such revision desirable for the interests both of the industries affected and those of consumers, partly on account of some original imperfections in the present tariff, and partly on account of the modifications which are demanded by the changes which have occurred in conditions of production and commerce."

There should be, however, no vicious assault on these laws. Changes should have a firm foundation in reason, and especially should we avoid mere experimental and purely speculative efforts on this vital subject. Our excess of revenue now approaches in amount the annual receipts from internal or excise taxes. If proper economy be exercised in expenditures they can be brought within the limits of our ordinary resources of taxation, enabling us without jar or friction to repeal internal-tax laws, which are inquisitorial and offensive in the highest degree. These taxes reach vexatiously every citizen in his business, in his household, and in the affairs of every-day life until they have become almost unendurable. There is no longer an excuse, in my opinion, for their continuance.

The objection to direct taxes is equally as strong to internal taxes; and either or both are justified only by stern necessity. They are irritating and dangerous, and internal-revenue taxes entail upon us the keeping up, as at present, somewhere near five thousand officers engaged in their collection, distributed in every county of every State, tainting, as we know, the source of all power in this Republic, the election by the people. Who favors direct tax? No one; and if the internal taxes were not now imposed by law, is there a man who would risk his political future by asking that the system should be put into operation? I sincerely believe that there is not a man.

I did hope when this Congress assembled that before the adjournment of this session a very large reduction of internal taxation would have resulted from our labors. The Committee on Ways and Means seemed to favor a reduction of $70,000,000, but the fiat of a Republican Congressional caucus overruled that good intent. Thus the majority of the Representatives of this House of one political party, and of a party representing a doubtful majority of the people even at the time of its election, regulates the current of remedial legislation, and in this instance on a subject which should be non-partisan. Thus the opportunity of relieving our tax-annoyed and tax-burdened constituents may be lost.

The reduction as now recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means reaches in great part those most able to pay, leaving the great body of consumers without relief. How long the latter will permit this state of things to continue will probably be determined at our next Congressional elections. With the repeal of internal or excise taxes will come a resort exclusively to duties on imports as the main supply of our resources, and I maintain if our expenditures be kept within just and reasonable bounds we can from this source derive adequate revenue for the administration of the Government in all its constitutional and legitimate functions.

The estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, of the amount to be raised from duties on imports is $217,000,000, and from all other sources, leaving out internal taxes, $30,000,000; so that the total abolition of excise taxes would still leave to the Government in the neighborhood of $250,000,000.

It must be recollected, however, that while our current annual payment of interest on the public debt has been reduced to $61,000,000 (and it will continue to decrease), yet there will be a greater increase in liabilities on account of pensions. Taking the years ending June 30, 1877 and 1878, as a criterion, this amount of receipts would still, with prudence and frugality, leave a sufficient revenue. Let me recapitulate: The net ordinary expenditures for year ending June 30, 1877, $144,209,963.28; the net ordinary expenditures for year ending June 30, 1878, $134,463,452.15. In the latter year no appropriations were made for rivers and harbors. The amount of appropriations for these objects for the former year was about $5,000,000, so that a fair average of the net ordinary expenses based on these two years would be $142,000,000. Let us to this amount add on account of interest $61,000,000, and for sinking fund about $45,000,000 per annum, a sum which I deem sufficient in amount each year toward the liquidation of the aggregate amount of the debt, and we have a gross sum of expenditure of $248,000,000.

There will equitably stand to the credit of the sinking fund for the year ending June 30, 1883, taking the bonds already called for payment up to July 1, 1882, $40,423,700. The sinking fund for the current fiscal year and arrearages for prior years were fully provided for by calls which matured March 13 last and prior to that date. The bonds in call maturing from that date to June 30 next are not applied to the sinking fund, because it is full. While the bonds included in calls maturing from March 13 to June 30, being calls 108 to 112 and part of the one hundred and seventh, amounting to $40,423,700, are not applied to the sinking fund, yet as arrearages have been in the years past continued to be counted on book accounts, there is no reason why the payment of our bonds in excess of the legal requirements of the sinking fund should not equitably be credited, thus protecting us against a deficiency in the event that the internal taxes are largely reduced or altogether abolished.

The amount which is required by law to be placed to the credit of the sinking fund for the year ending June 30, 1883, is $45,122,110.80. By reason of the payments already made there is, therefore, due only an equitable balance of $4,698,410.80 to be credited to sinking fund for year 1883, with period of time from July 1, 1882, to June 30, 1883—an entire year.

In my opinion $75,000,000 of payment on account of current pensions and arrears is as much each year as can be safely made with due protection against frauds. Until the arrears are all paid—say $45,000,000 per year in addition to appropriations of years 1877-'78—we might be required to continue the tax on whisky, say at 50 cents per gallon, or we could encroach upon and reduce our now excessive unemployed balance in the Treasury. Admitting there might be a moderate deficiency, we have, to meet such deficiency, now in the Treasury $136,000,000 above and beyond every claim on the Government dollar for dollar.

It is thus made plain that with economical expenditures and reduced appropriations for the year we are fully provided.

As I have already said, a heavy reduction or the abolition of internal taxes would compel immediate revision of our tariff laws. How that can be done with most expedition is the question which most directly concerns us.

I do not favor a tariff enacted upon the ground of protection simply for the sake of protection, because I doubt the existence of any constitutional warrant for any such construction or the grant of any such power. It would manifestly be in the nature of class legislation, and to such legislation, favoring one class at the expense of any other, I have always been opposed.

In my judgment the question of free trade will not arise practically in this country during our lives, if ever, so long as we continue to raise revenue by duties on imports, and therefore the discussion of that principle is an absolute waste of time. After our public debt is paid in full our expenditures can hardly be much below $200,000,000, and if this is levied in a business-like and intelligent manner it will afford adequate protection to every industrial interest in the United States. The assertion that the Constitution permits the levying of duties in favor of protection "for the sake of protection" is equally uncalled for and unnecessary. Both are alike delusory and not involved in any practical administrative policy. If brought to the test I believe neither would stand for a day. Protection for the sake of protection is prohibition pure and simple of importation, and if there be no importation there will be no duties collected, and consequently no revenue, leaving the necessary expenses of the Government to be collected by direct taxes—for internal taxes would interfere with the protective principle, and when the people were generally asked to bear the burden of heavy taxation to sustain class legislation and the interests of a portion of our people at the expense of the great bulk of our population there would be an emphatic and conclusive negative. So, too, with free trade, there is hardly a man in public life who advocates it pure and simple. Nobody wants direct taxation, although it would bring taxation so near and so constantly before the people that Congress would hesitate long before it voted the sums of money it now does, if not for improper, at least for questionable purposes.

Let me cull a few sentences from recent debates to show the feeling on this subject.

Ex-Governor Hendricks says:

"A horizontal tariff is impossible."

Senator JAMES B. BECK says:

"Nobody asks or expects this Congress to establish free trade, or tear down custom-houses. * * * In adjusting taxation on imports with a view only to obtain revenue or 'for revenue only,' we never thought of discriminating against American industries, or of depriving them of the incidental benefits or protection a proper revenue tariff would afford."

Senator BAYARD says:

"The power to tax by laying duties upon imports may be so exercised as to do what it has done ever since the foundation of the Government, and that is to give an advantage equivalent to the amount of the tax to the American producer or manufacturer over his foreign competitors in the same line of production or manufacture, and this becomes his protection."

Senator WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, says:

"Nobody is for free trade just now."

Senator COKE, of Texas, says:

"As an inevitable consequence domestic manufacturers and producers of the articles upon which such revenue import duties are laid are to that extent protected against foreign competition."

Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky, in substance reiterates these sentiments. So they all say, with rare exception. The real question which is presented and which is in controversy is the revision of taxes, so we may hold the control of the markets of the world for the benefit of our excess of productions over the home consumption.

I favor what Mr. Jefferson declared to be "discriminating duties," what General Jackson described as "a judicious tariff," and what Silas Wright designated as "incidental protection." To accomplish these ends wisely and well requires the greatest circumspection and the exercise of the most careful judgment.

I favor a commission "to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining, and industrial interests of the United States, so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff."

It will, in my judgment, bring about a revision, absolutely essential, at an earlier day than in any other way now feasible. If I did not sincerely entertain this conviction, no member on this floor would be more opposed to the pending proposition than myself. I believe that the arrangement of our system of tariff duties should not rest upon any partisan basis regulated by existing parties, but that, on the contrary, it should in a measure be divorced from politics, and cease to be a bone of political contention in and out of Congress. It should occupy the higher level and command the best efforts of statesmanship of every party. Metternich, one of the ablest as well as one of the most successful prime ministers of modern times, said: "Statesmanship is a practical knowledge of a state's resources."

A judicious and properly laid tariff should not molest those resources. It should be framed so as to give stability to our business at home and our trade abroad. Unnecessary and causeless changes are injurious as well to the revenues and to the industries and commerce of the people. Remedial measures to cure defects and equalize burdens and benefits are of the greatest advantage when promptly and properly enacted. It would be a blessing of incalculable value if we could so arrange our legislation as to readjust in the main duties on imports only once in every ten years, and then have them based upon the statistics and widest information of our census tables. In this way business men in every branch of production and commerce would know how safely and judiciously to conduct their transactions, great and small.

We now really have only a choice between no action and this proposed commission. It was originally introduced into Congress by a Democrat. A bill for such a commission was passed during the last Congress at the suggestion of a Democratic Senator. It has again passed the Senate this year with the aid of Democratic votes. It was very generally approved upon the "stump," in my section at least, during the recent Presidential contest. More recently the Ohio Democracy affirmed in the following language the propriety of its adoption:

"A tariff for revenue, levied and adjusted in its details with a view to equity in the public burdens and the encouragement of protective industries, without creating monopolies; and we favor the appointment of a commission to suggest a method of revision which shall accomplish this result."

Let me quote from one whose views are accepted by those who claim reform in the direction of free trade, as they are set forth in the North American Review of December, 1881, in an elaborate article by Mr. David A. Wells. After discussing fully the subject of "Reform in Federal Taxation," he says:

"What, then, is to be done? There is but one answer. There must, or ought to be, a compromise, on the basis of patriotism and common sense, of all antagonizing interests in furtherance of a reform which has become imperative; and such a compromise is practicable by all parties agreeing to urge upon Congress to do at its next session those things only in respect to which a majority of all parties may agree should be done. At first thought such a proposition may seem absurd and impracticable, but a little reflection will soon convince to the contrary. In the first place, no one is likely to object to the appointment of a commission to investigate and report on the whole subject of Federal tax reform, although Congress, judging from all precedents, is not likely to be much influenced by any report or recommendations which such commission may make, unless public attention has in the mean time become largely interested in its work and recommendations."

The public attention to which Mr. Wells alludes has already been very fully called to this subject, and to an extent which he himself did not expect when he penned that article.

The Senate has shown at this session an indisposition to respond to any effort which might have been made in this House, for it has anticipated the House in the creation of a tariff commission by an overwhelming vote. It has been frequently charged in this debate that the object of this bill was delay. There is no justification, in my opinion, for such an assertion. Its inevitable tendency and effect must be in the nature of things to hasten a thorough and speedy final adjustment of all questions in dispute as to tariff amendment and reform. When the ground of action is uncertain and the elements of the problem are not fully known, or are vaguely and imperfectly understood, legislation is generally injurious. Indeed, it may be said in such cases that when it escapes doing serious injustice to the industries of the people or to the revenues of the Government, it has the result, always to be avoided by wise and prudent legislators, of irritation and excitement, disturbance of values, and oftentimes individual ruin.

Self-interest controls the world, however much men may turn fine periods and grow eloquent in swelling sentences about abstractions; and while men will suffer patiently and yield willingly to stern necessity they will not submit quietly to what is causelessly and idly to their loss and annoyance.

When every element which can enter tariff revision is known; when every interest, large and small, is scanned and measured; when proper objects of taxation are reached and adjusted in their proper relations; when those items are eliminated which only embarrass and produce confusion, then indeed tariff legislation is made easy and sure and of happiest consequences.

The charge that we are improperly parting with our constitutional functions in the passage of this bill is invalid, and should have no influence upon our deliberations and action.

The duties delegated to the commission do not extend beyond the power of recommendation. Yet I hope and believe their review when presented will be of so broad, comprehensive, and catholic a character as to command for it as a basis of action in reform of taxation the approval of thinking men of all parties.

The fourth section of the bill provides that the commission shall make its final report of the results of its investigation and the testimony taken in the course of the same not later than the first Monday of December, 1882, and it shall cause the testimony taken to be printed from time to time and distributed to members of Congress by the Public Printer, and shall also cause to be printed for the use of Congress 2,000 copies of its final report, together with the testimony.

Can language be more explicit to prevent delay? It means tariff revision, intelligent and just, at the earliest practicable moment. I trust that after the passage of this act—of which at present there seems to be but little doubt—authority will be given to the Committee on Ways and Means by this House to enable it to assemble about the 10th day of November next, then to proceed immediately to formulate a bill based upon the testimony taken, and which they will, with all other members, receive from time to time. Then at the opening of the session in December that committee will be ready to report forthwith its measure of relief to the House for action before the Committee on Appropriations will require the time for general appropriation bills.

I have given notice of a purpose to offer an amendment providing that this commission shall be composed of two members of the Senate and three members of the House, with four civilian experts, the latter to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. My purpose in favoring a mixed commission is that there may be upon the floor of each House some responsible sponsors for the report to be made who will feel it incumbent upon them to see that it does not go for naught, but is supported and pushed to practical results.

Now, I might add that while I have no direct assurance of the fact, yet I am led to believe that the President will, in the composition of this commission, whether exclusively of civilians or only partially, select men who have given a lifetime to the study of the history and philosophy of tariff taxation.

And now, Mr. Chairman, when the attempt is made to draw party lines on the subject of the tariff, I am strengthened in the conviction that in what I have said to-day I am sustained by the solemn and deliberate declarations of the Democratic party in national convention for more than forty years. It will be a fitting conclusion, therefore, to recall some of the words of wisdom of the statesmen of former times.

Seeing what the great men of the past have done, we may take heart and tread the path of triumph by emulating their worthy actions. I submit the expressions of the conventions alluded to, as far as they relate to revenues and expenditures. The first plank of the platform of the Democratic national convention which met in Baltimore May 5, 1840, is as follows:

"Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government."

The Democratic national convention which met at Baltimore May 27, 1844, was to the same purpose.

The platform of the Democratic convention at Baltimore May 22, 1848, contained the following declaration of Democratic faith:

"Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government and for the gradual but certain extinction of the debt created by the prosecution of a just and necessary war, after peaceful relations shall have been restored."

The platform of the Democratic convention at Baltimore, June 1, 1852, contains the following words as to the revenues and expenditures:

"Resolved, That it is the duty of every branch of the Government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs; and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government and for the gradual but certain extinction of the public debt."

The same resolution was adopted at Cincinnati, Ohio, June 2, 1856; at Charleston, S. C., April 23, 1860, and at Baltimore, June 18, 1860.

The Democratic convention of 1864, at Saint Louis, on August 29, passed no tariff resolution.

The Democratic platform of 1868, in New York city, has the following resolution:

"And a tariff for revenue upon foreign imports and such equal taxation under the internal-revenue laws as will afford incidental protection to domestic manufactures, and as will, without impairing the revenue, impose the least burden upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country."

The national Democratic convention of Baltimore, July 9, 1872, resolved as follows:

"We demand a system of Federal taxation which shall not unnecessarily interfere with the industry of the people, and which shall provide the means necessary to pay the expenses of the Government, economically administered; the pensions, the interest on the public debt, and a moderate reduction annually of the principal thereof; and recognizing that there are in our midst honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of protection and free trade, we remit the discussion of the subject to the people of their Congressional districts and to the decision of the Congress thereon wholly free from Executive interference or dictation."

The Saint Louis convention of 1876 declared as follows:

"Reform is necessary in the sum and mode of Federal taxation, to the end that capital may be set free from distrust and labor lightly burdened.

"We denounce the present tariff levied upon nearly 4,000 articles as a monster piece of injustice, inequality, and false pretense. It yields a dwindling, not a yearly rising revenue; it has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few; it prohibits imports that might purchase the products of American labor; it has degraded American commerce from the first to an inferior rank on the high seas; it has cut down the sales of American manufactures at home and abroad and depleted the returns of American agriculture and industry, followed by half our people; it costs the people five times more than it produces to the Treasury, obstructs the processes of production, and wastes the fruits of labor; it promotes fraud, fosters smuggling, enriches dishonest officials, and bankrupts honest merchants. We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue."

The platform of 1880 at Cincinnati declared "for revenue only."

These utterances of the Democratic party, assembled from all parts of the United States in national convention, teach their own lesson to the present generation and need no further comment at my hands. It will not do for any public man to narrow his mind on such a momentous question as that which affects not only the integrity of the Government, but brightens or darkens the home of every citizen just as we shall legislate. Speculative philosophers have contrived the most fascinating forms of government, but wherever they have been subjected to the touchstone of practical operation they have gone most shamefully to pieces. It will not do for men to say: I have laid down this theoretical landmark and you must not go beyond it.

"There is a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will."

If Canute had not moved his chair upon the sea-shore the incoming tide would have overwhelmed him and his weak advisers under the mighty waves of the sea.

We are no longer a few scattered, isolated colonies of three millions of people, hugging the coast from Massachusetts to Georgia. In 1880 we were a united nation of fifty millions of inhabitants, with industries of the greatest diversity, and grown to such size and power as successfully to contest the markets of the world, and with a military prestige that has surprised and kept in awe the most warlike nations.

In the year 1903 we are told that, according to the ordinary rate of increase, we will have one hundred millions of people. Is there any human mind that can foresee all the possibilities of a free republic of such vast proportions, leading the coming century in wise legislation? Is there one so foolhardy who will stand up and say he knows all about it, and that the wondrous ways of God shall bend to his peremptory dictation? If there be, he can vote against this bill. [Great applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has twelve minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield two minutes to my colleague [Mr. CURTIN] and ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO].

Mr. CURTIN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Chairman, it has been so often said, especially on this side of the House, by members of the Democratic party who are in the majority on this question, that those of us who belong to that party and are opposed to this measure are unwilling to go upon the record that I can not refrain from speaking the sentiments which actuate me in giving my vote against the so-called Morrison bill. And I want to say in all frankness to these gentlemen that as for myself personally, and my relations to the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, I would be glad, so far as publicity is concerned, if you could write on the face of the sun the fact that I am opposed to and shall vote against this measure.

With due deliberation, deprecating unwise agitation, I voted against its consideration. Well, sir, it has been considered. Memorized declamations and studied essays have been delivered for and against.

We were told that its discussion would bring to these Halls the voice of many millions crying for its adoption. What has followed? The jingle of wine-glasses has been heard on Brooklyn Heights, the plaudits of the Republican Beechers and Shearmans, the rattle of the festival dishes on Murray Hill, New York, and the soft and delicate applause of the perfumed élite of Chicago, but never the gentlest whisper from the conventicles of honest labor or the ranks of struggling toil. Are gentlemen blind? All reforms come from and originate in the ranks of the great common people. Christianity itself was not propagated by the wise and learned of the conceited sanhedrim, but was preached by fishermen and fructified by the blood of carpenters. The honest theorist may be a Baptist in the wilderness, but he preaches in cabins instead of congresses. But gentlemen say we must have a distinctive issue. Sir, great issues grow up in the natural order of events, and come not at the peremptory bidding of long-haired magazinists and short-brained editors.

Now, in the few moments allowed me, I come to the consideration of this bill with no plundered proceeds of the public Library, with no padding from statistics, and with no fatiguing list of fallacious figures to appall the members of this House. Let the overburdened and groaning record muddle the curious investigator, but let it be ours to speak simple sense to sensible people.

I want within the few minutes allowed me to address a common-sense argument to the great American Commons as to why I, a member of the Democratic party, vote against this measure.

There are three schools of thought on this question. There is the protectionist, who advocates of protection for its own sake, and would acknowledge no limitation as to amount from any constitutional view. No Democrat who has learned his creed aright can be found upholding such constitutional construction. After him, on the opposite extreme, comes the free-trader, crying either revolution or reform, as may best suit his convenience and subserve his end. He may be constitutional, but he is impracticable, un-American, visionary, and dangerous. He advances to the music of our chief commercial competitor and wins his triumphs to the stirring notes of "Rule Britannia." He is cosmopolitan; talks of the brotherhood of man, the fraternity of races, the coalescing of all creeds, and addresses himself to a millennium of universal peace and catholic freedom. His soul pants, and not in vain, for the martyr's crown, while he contemns the victor's sword. He is for this bill as a feeble step toward his great goal.

I admire him when honest and hate him when masked, but pity him always. It has been said that truth is sometimes found at the bottom of a well. Certainly here it is found on the solid rock of self-evident truth, between the shifting sands that constitute the promontories of error. On this momentous question, founded upon the life-long teachings of the immortal Jefferson and the heroic Jackson and a great galaxy of illustrious Democratic statesmen, it found a voice in the much-criticised Ohio platform, and was re-echoed in New Jersey, Virginia, Pennsylvania, and North Carolina.

In brief, it took the middle and constitutional Democratic grounds. It demanded a revenue tariff as prescribed by the Constitution, but recognized and witnessed for the protective feature within the revenue line. It demanded a discrimination and honest revision in the interest of labor alone, and cried out between every line, "From the horrors of horizontal humbuggery good Lord deliver us!" It asked for the abolition of the internal-revenue war taxes of which on another occasion I have spoken in this House. It deprecated free trade, scourged unconstitutional protection, and demanded careful revision to put down monopolies. It is opposed to this bill, which, having free trade for a beacon, swings its remorseless scythe to horizontally reduce, without regard to size, shape, or condition; which pierces the heart of the struggling industry and barely touches the towering locks of giant monopoly; which inaugurates a ruinous agitation while impotent to accomplish the slightest result. Sir, in the course of events we will outgrow unnecessary imposts, and in the mean time our tariffs must be founded on the differences in wages, the bettering of the condition of labor, and the upholding of home markets for our agricultural products. I do not believe this country is solely great by reason of tariffs, but I much fear she would not be so strong but for restrictive imposts.

I love the noble and historic party to which I belong because I love my country, and I am convinced my country would be happier and more free, more dignified, and more honestly conducted under its rule. This great and constitutional party has ever-living issues in the nicely adjusted balances of our Federal system; in upholding the rights and dignity of the individual citizen, maintaining his freedom, and securing his happiness; in curbing monopoly and restricting government; in forever defending home rule and the proper sovereignty of the States; in reforming the Government and purifying its branches; in a word, keeping alive by precept and practice grand, yet simple, constitutional democracy! It must not be allowed to chase an ignis fatuus in the delusive hope of victory upon the platform of a chimera of the brain. Its platform must not be built upon the tracts of Cobden and the selfish arguments made to order in Birmingham and Manchester. The free-trade enthusiast is ever turning to England as the Mecca of his hopes. For six hundred years they say England groveled and groaned under the protective system, and only became "roast-beef, merry England" under free trade.

Sir, there is a crushing and demonstrative answer to this—an answer which appeals to the eye and needs no sophistry of argument to render it more effective. If England under free trade is happy, merry, prosperous England, then, sir, account to me if you can for the long train of emigrant ships that under her free-trade flag disembark annually their thousands of poverty-stricken emigrants on our shores. Account to me, if you can, for the pathways of human bones of her famine-stricken subjects that cover the bed of the Atlantic, whose souls took flight from their hunger-blighted tenements ere they could reach our tariff-protected shores.

Sir, I say this without prejudice, and I trust I am too sensible and patriotic, were I even now convinced that this was a reciprocity of benefit to her and us, to advocate the absurd policy of the boy who went without his dinner to spite his schoolmaster. But as yet I do not see such reciprocity.

I listened with great pleasure to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD], admired his eloquence, and was struck with his zeal. But, sir, I can not coincide in his judgment. He did not make a practical address. He was speaking of a theme upon which the very stones could be eloquent; but he was talking in advance of his time. His speech may have been the language of a prophet, but it certainly was not the sound judgment of a statesman. He was speaking of the time when the entire world, advanced to a higher civilization, will have given in its adherence to the brotherhood of man. But, unfortunately, we have not arrived at that glorious period of cosmopolitanism. We are still struggling in the days of nationalism. The policy of the nations of the earth is against cosmopolitanism and in favor of upholding their own industries and their own people to the exclusion of all others with whom they are either unwilling or unable to compete.

I do not wonder that the gentleman gave vent to a burst of eloquence when he spoke of that glorious epoch to which he looks forward when he said that the whispering waves that break upon the sands of the seashore speak freedom—when he told us that the winds that whistle around the eaves of the farmer's dwelling in the West speak freedom. Sir, nature proclaims peace and harmony, but unfortunately sin has planted discord and strife.

The advance of humanity to complete accord with the teachings of the evangels and the lessons of nature has been slow but sure. Over the wastes and moors of degradation and poverty, up the flinty paths of suffering and martyrdom, besprinkled with blood, humanity has toiled through weary centuries of wrong and crime. It has not yet reached the universal brotherhood of which the gentleman from Ohio speaks. Mutual charity and reciprocal kindness must precede such catholic fraternity. While one nation goes armed, universal peace is impossible. National selfishness compels national protection. The unholy caste of monarchy puts up barriers against complete social and mercantile intercourse with the free people of a republic.

Sir, we are practical men; and we are compelled to deal in practical times with a practical question. I tell the gentleman from Ohio, in the light of every-day facts, that the people of the United States are not prepared to adopt his theories, and that free trade can not yet be accomplished in this land by the voice of the American people. I, sir, am candid enough to confess in connection with what has been said by the illustrious statesman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that I am jealous of English influence, whether it is in the market or in the field or in the forum, in the social circle or the political Congress. And, sir, I am reminded that in another nation dominated by British power, which forced its trade upon those downtrodden people, compelling them to accept a debased currency and forbidding them to export anything and compelling them to buy everything English—a great man arose in the majesty of his genius (I allude to Dean Swift) and in advising his countrymen to ostracize in the markets of the world British influence, gave vent to this memorable sentence: "My fellow-countrymen, I would burn everything English except English coal." And I know, sir, that there are millions of American citizens in this land who are as jealous of that influence as I am, and who would voice the sentiments which I do here to-day, could they be heard on the floor of this House.

We have been told, sir, that this bill is a step toward free trade, and a panacea for the evils which this land is suffering. I do not believe, and I have not been convinced, that this land is suffering alone from the evils of overprotection. When I look around and see the suffering millions of this land ground down by railroad monopolies, telegraph monopolies, imported pauper labor, extravagant and centralized government, and by iniquitous land laws, I am unwilling to concede that overprotection is the only evil and the only bane from which the American people are suffering.

Seeing the zealous conduct of members here in advocating this measure to the exclusion of every other method of redress for the evils against which the people are crying, one would almost be led to believe this to be the sum of all iniquities and the only disease of the body-politic.

Why do not members of this House address themselves to other practical reforms? When millions of free lands of the United States are being taken up by the acreocracy of Europe; when that public domain which is the foundation of our prosperity and the only hope for the perpetuity of this Republic is being taken up by foreign syndicates; when it is the duty of this House to pass a law that shall stop the London, the Scotch, and the other European companies from taking up the lands that belong to free Americans; when it is our duty to take back and make part of the public domain that immense acreage which belongs to the American people, but which has been robbed from them by railroad corporations; when there are such things to be done for the laboring people; when bureaus are to be established; when labor is to be educated by correct figures and statistics; when conspiracy laws are to be repealed; when centralization is to be checked and Government reformed; when labor and capital are to be harmonized on just principles; when commerce between the States is to be regulated in the interest of the merchant and farmer; when a thousand evils are crying with a million tongues at the doors of this House, the only answer they can get is that there is but one evil from which we suffer, and that is the protective tariff.

Millions are watching our course as to the public lands for the hundreds who are interested in radical tariff agitation. Free land for free men is more than free trade for men who can not buy and have not anything to sell. From the quaking castles of feudalism in Europe the bogus lords and masquerading marquises are hurrying to erect their robber holds on the free prairies of the West. If these invasions are not checked the American freeman farmer, noble, manly, and self-reliant, will soon give way to the cringing tenant of a transplanted lord. The independent and intelligent freeholder is the hope of the Republic, and the Republic is founded upon a free soil, not shadowed by feudalism and not blighted by monopoly. The public domain is the heritage of our people; and no people can be happy, free, and prosperous who are not strongly intrenched on the soil they till.

Sir, the action of these gentlemen reminds me of a false diagnosis of a physical disease. The patient comes to the physician suffering many evils, and he diagnoses the case simply to please a hobby or in the light of a specialty, and he offers him a universal panacea with the same effrontery and audacity that a quack vender of nostrums peddles his wares to the sound of a drum and an absurd eloquence.

I have heard it said by members of this House that they have educated their districts, that they have gone to Republican districts and planted this sentiment of truth and justice, as they call it. I tell them, sir, to-day, but I hope I am a false prophet, that the crop which they planted in the fall, when they were elected on free-trade principles, was seed sown upon thin soil, and that when the storm shall beat upon it, when the scorching sun of this summer and the fatal frost of next November shall blight it, they will find they have made a great mistake. They have diverted the patient with the novelty of the remedy, but they have not eradicated the disease from which he suffers.

I perceive by the clock my time is limited. I wish to say, so far as we of the Democratic party who are opposed to this bill are concerned, that we have no hesitation here to-day. We believe we are doing our duty to our country and to our people. We believe that we are advocating the cause of eternal truth and justice. We believe we are upholding the dignity of American labor, making stronger the Republic, and perpetuating a great and historic party.

I know we will not be applauded in this hour of passion. I want no applause from that side of the Chamber. I do not court Republican smiles, but I wish to say, as a noble Virginian said when Cornwallis surrendered and the American Army, with bad taste, gave vent to cheers—I wish to say with the noble Virginian George Washington, who raised his hand in a deprecating attitude and said: "My countrymen, do not cheer; let posterity cheer." [Applause.] When the passions of this hour shall have subsided, when reason resumes her sway, the Democrats who vote against this bill will look with confidence for vindication from their countrymen and for the approbation of their party.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRISON. I will yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY.]

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Chairman, it is a familiar experience in boat-racing to take a man's water, but as this is in the open course of competition it passes without comment or objection. Here in the House we reverse the process, and take a man's wind with his permission and use it against him.

I would much rather have spoken in my own time than to be under seeming obligations for courtesy which I am forced to use against the gentleman granting it. It seems an impolite and an ungenerous thing to get ten minutes and then use them in trying to defeat a measure which the gentleman who has yielded the time has so much at heart.

But I am against his bill in principle and details. It is to me like Dr. Johnson's mutton, ill-fed, ill-cooked, and ill-dressed. Whether it shall be ill-killed or not depends upon the vote we are about to take. It is entitled "A bill to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes." Was it not enough—would not the title of the bill have discharged any proper function belonging to it if it had stopped with the reduction of duties? Why "war-tariff taxes?" Is this an appeal to the anti-war sentiment? Is this the reverse side of the bloody shirt? Is it your design to stir up enmity against the tariff not only upon principles of free trade, but by appealing to the memories of the war in that quarter where they are coupled with a sense of oppression and defeat? Let your bill stand upon its true basis; let it fly its true colors.

You denounce the gentleman from Connecticut, who was carrying the banner of Democracy before the most of you were born, because he instituted an argumentative comparison between the Constitution of the United States and the Confederate States. You said that it was not fair to appeal to prejudice in a discussion of this kind. I did not understand him as appealing to it. But your bill in its very title is an appeal to prejudice from another quarter. It is as much as to say, "Men of the South, here is an opportunity; abolish this war tax; get rid of this relic of conquest and subjugation; get back to that tariff which took effect just previous to the actual outbreak of hostilities." Whether this was the motive or not, the South, with some few notable exceptions, has to a man seconded every attempt from the organization of this House to the present time to wage war upon the tariff, and is now almost a unit in favor of this bill.

I am against the title of the bill. It is a bill to get rid of war taxes, and at the same time proclaims a principle of eternal war against American mechanics and manufacturers. It smites with more than the indiscriminate fury of Herod, for it not only slaughters the innocents of 2 years and under, but it lays its murdering hand upon all industries, young or old, alike.

Sir, the first petition considered by the First Congress under the Constitution of the United States came up from the city of Baltimore, from mechanics and tradesmen, seven hundred strong, in favor of protection of American industry. The workingmen of that day at least believed that a judicious tariff was what it was afterward declared to be by General Jackson when he took the Southern heresy by the throat, a wise measure for the fostering of home industry.

That petition was in strict consonance with the growth and development of those institutional ideas of which the Constitution was the embodied expression. The first petition brought before the confederate congress on this subject, if any such there was, must, in the nature of things, have been the direct opposite. It must have recited in accordance with section 8 of the constitution of that government that a tariff for the protection of any branch of industry was an economic error, a philosophical fallacy, and an enormous commercial blunder.

There is a reason and a deep one for this. The United States Government was formed in part for the creation, extension, and promotion of manufactures. The Confederate States Government was formed for the purpose of stimulating and encouraging agriculture. Its labor was slave, and no other form of development was possible. For this they went to war—not for slavery, but for free trade. The thinkers, the great men of the South, the seers of the people, reveled in the vision of a commercial alliance with England, of which the basis was to be unlimited cotton and cheap manufactures. That is the vision of the free-traders of to-day. It is not 20 per cent. off to-day, 10 per cent. to-morrow; it is not merely to get rid of war taxes, but war-tariff taxes; which means, if I understand it, the tariff itself.

There is no use trying to disguise or dodge the issue. It is protection on the one hand and free trade on the other. Every sentiment which has been applauded on this side of the House is a free-trade sentiment. The more extreme, the louder the applause. "Down with the walls and out to the seas!" cries an enthusiastic disciple of this doctrine which is to give a new force to a national pace already tremendous. "Do not be content with the coping or a layer or two of stone underneath. Away with a horizontal cut; down with the wall, the whole wall, foundation and all!" cries that impetuous son of Ohio, and thunders of applause roll out the sentiment to the country. It is not reduction of duties that you are after. The title to your bill is a sham; it is free trade and internal taxation.

There have been times, Mr. Chairman, since I became a member of this body when I was inclined to think that the record of its proceedings as published was a mistake, on account of the opportunity it offered for printing the views of gentlemen—the only genuine raw material that I know of—at the public expense, and thereby promoting that active elocution which has been wittily described as the natural state of the average American. I have seen cause, however, to revise this judgment, and now regard the RECORD as a friendly conductor to take the sting, as it were, out of the tail of the storm, and thus emasculated to permit it to rumble and lighten overhead in intermittent thunder and harmless heat lightning.

Why, sir, imagine all this spontaneous eloquence in manuscript, all this indignant passion on paper, all this fresh sympathy for the suffering masses, gushing from the perennial fountain of Maynard's ink, and no outlet for it. Who could picture the consequences of such enforced congestion? Who could measure the loss of a generous constituency or a humbugged public? Let us have the RECORD by all means. It is nature's safety-valve, a crater for pent-up volcanoes, a national boil or ulcer, by which when the flow is freest we may gather, upon the soundest principles of pathology, that there is something wrong in the system. Ubi fluxus, ibi irritatio.

The bill before the committee, Mr. Chairman, is entitled "A bill to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes." I voted against its consideration, and it is my present purpose to present in as brief and compact form as possible the reasons of a public character which induced me to give that vote. I had other reasons of another character which it would be improper on this occasion to bring into the discussion.

I have always regarded the tariff as the debatable ground of political economists and not of politicians. The deep questions which lie imbedded far beneath the surface of this subject are to be brought to the light by some prospecting apparatus of long reach and persistence like the diamond-drill. The ordinary Congressional probe will not answer. I do not believe that it is a local question or that it should be remitted to each Congressional district for settlement, as at least one Democratic platform declared, but I believe that the question is national in its scope, and as such should be determined by this House upon consideration as purely non-partisan as a shipping bill, a bankrupt bill, or a bill regulating interstate commerce.

Approaching its consideration from this standpoint, the first observation I have to make is that certainty is the essential and fundamental idea of all law. No man has any difficulty in conforming to the requirements of the physical world, because they are certain and uniform in their operation. He may violate them if he sees fit to take the consequences; but he knows with absolute certainty that those consequences will follow, and that there is no possible escape. The sun has risen in his appointed place without the deviation of a millionth of an inch; the seasons have succeeded each other in regular order, and the whole economy of nature has been conducted from the beginning, like the ongoings of the Almighty Himself, without "variableness or shadow of turning."

The laws which we make for ourselves, however, necessarily partake of human infirmity, and will be more or less distinguished by fickleness or caprice, as that infirmity is excessively or moderately developed. The moral economy, too, is continually changing, while the physical remains comparatively stationary, and this constant fluctuation requires corresponding changes in the laws. It is impossible, therefore, that any law of human devising should attain to that degree of certainty and stability which distinguishes the operation of natural law, and very wisely too, since if it were not so bad and foolish legislation might be difficult of modification or repeal. But while this is true, it is also true that uncertainty in the laws as well as in everything else is the mother of confusion and disorder. This is specially true of any law which affects the people in their business, commercial and industrial, relations with other nations and among themselves.

There are about eleven hundred items entering into the daily use and consumption of the people which are made the subjects of tariff changes. The most of these items represent articles of manufacture or growth which are made or produced at home, passing through a process of distribution more or less complex before they reach the consumer, and most, if not all, coming into competition with similar articles made or produced in other countries. The tariff is thus directly connected with the importers, the manufacturers, the laboring classes, the transportation agencies, the middle-men, and the consumers of the country, and in fact there is no law upon our statute-book that affects so many and so vast interests and with which it is so difficult and dangerous to meddle.

Such being the general necessity for stability in legislation, and such the special necessity for it in the case of the tariff, I was unwilling to disturb a status scarce ten months old. It seemed to me that one of all the infant industries which stood most in need of protection, and I was not willing to change the legislative bases of industry and commerce as I change my clothes, with the recurrence of the season. I do not believe that any law which concerns so many interests ought to be changed except upon the gravest considerations, and when change is resolved upon it ought to be carried out in pursuance of a system, conceived and executed upon the basis of large and permanent results.

This brings me to my second objection to this bill. Its distinguishing feature is what is known as the horizontal cut, by which the excrescences of a system confessedly overgrown and abnormal as well as the healthy parts are to be lopped off by a uniform rule of excision, applicable to all alike. This has been fixed at 20 per cent., not because that sum bears any relation to the reduction which any particular item in the schedules can stand, but because the net result of the reduction in the aggregate, as estimated, calculated upon this rate per cent., will amount to about such a sum as may be safely abated from our redundant revenue. In other words, this revenue can be safely reduced, say, thirty to thirty-five millions; and treating the problem simply as an arithmetical one, the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means find that 20 per cent. off will give the required result. They have coolly marked down the whole list at a certain rate per cent., and have made the laborious and remarkable discovery that this per cent. reduction will diminish the totality of revenue to a certain figure. Perhaps I should be nearer the truth if I said that they arrived at this result not by a process of their own, but by a deduction accomplished by an expert in the Treasury Department.

The work of the majority of this committee was simply to resolve that they would take off 20 per cent., with a limitation that the rate should not fall below the basis established by the Morrill tariff, and then the expert came in and showed by comparative tables what in detail upon each article or group and what the aggregate in general of such reduction would amount to.

But, sir, a bill is to be denounced not simply because it is upon its face a lazy bill. Sir Isaac Newton was not very busily engaged when, according to tradition, the apple fell, which, unlike that other apple that brought chaos and confusion into the world, started the imagination of the philosopher into a conception of the universal law of order. The fact is, if tradition is to be believed, this profound mathematician was flat of his back, enjoying perhaps his after-dinner repose beneath the shade of the tree, when he received that shock which, like that fired at Lexington, was heard round the world.

The genius of intuition is not confined to physics. It is not to the philosophers alone that such brilliant strokes occur. The statesman, too, has his rapt moments of high intellectual frenzy when he feels the future in the instant and sweeps from the zenith to the nadir. So Beaconsfield was stirred by the impulse of immortality when he forged the Egyptian link in the British chain of commercial supremacy. So Bismarck's lofty soul caught the first dawnings of the Germanic Empire. And who shall say that we lag in the rear of these comprehensive intuitions, when we can point to a Democratic Committee of Ways and Means rectifying the inequalities, iniquities, contradictions, and absurdities of the present tariff by a single stroke of the pen, on the principles of free trade, moderated and chastened by the Republican standard of protection in 1861?

Who shall say that we do not with a single leap go far beyond those degenerate prophets of England and Germany when we accomplish all this by the simple contrivance of trimming all the trees in this orchard the same length without regard to whether they are big or little, young or old, or whether they require or can stand any trimming at all? I use a figure which implies that the reforming hand is applied to encourage and stimulate, and not to check and dwarf, this growth. The pruning-knife is put in here, not to kill the trees, but to develop them into more vigorous shoots, yielding a larger and more generous fruitage. Is not the horizontal process a somewhat singular one to accomplish this result? If encouragement is really what is meant, is it not patent to the dullest observation that the depleting process which may add new life and vigor to one will kill another?

But, sir, this is not what is meant. The avowed object is not encouragement but obstruction. The charge is that these sources of revenue are drains upon the prosperity of the people, and that this bill of pains and penalties is only a step in the right direction. That means, if it mean anything, that a tariff is not the proper mode of raising the national revenue; that the true principle regulating the commercial relations of the modern world is the freest interchange of commodities, and that any burden or restriction upon this intercourse by the levy of the impost duty is a mistake, and a barbarous relic of a crude and exploded system of taxation.

This bill, which is the "step," and the "right direction" which is to follow, if it means anything, means that the internal revenue is to succeed the external as the fixed, steady, and permanent source of supply for the Federal Government. This is denied, I know, by those who choose to call themselves revenue reformers, as distinguished from free-traders, but every one at all familiar with the history of political changes knows that the moderate men of a party are invariably dragged up to the plane occupied by its more extreme members. Revenue reform, if by that is meant mere reduction in the revenue, is a meaningless cry. That can be accomplished by reducing the internal as well as the external revenue.

The free-trade clubs, the doctrinaires and hobby riders, the men of enthusiasm and convictions, the radicals, in a word, in the party only look upon this bill as a short step in the direction of the true goal, which with them is free trade. There are men to-day protesting that they are not free-traders who in a very few years will be compelled to atone for their early shortcomings by a more daring advocacy of the cause than even its leaders will now attempt.

Consider for a moment the principle, if principle there be, underlying this bill. Opinion upon the tariff seems to shade off into three distinct and well-defined classifications. There are those who believe in protection for protection's sake; there are those who believe in such protection as may be incident to the raising of revenue by such a discrimination in the levying of the impost duty as will encourage domestic manufactures; and there are those who believe in a tariff for revenue only, to be established without regard to protective discrimination.

In what class do the supporters of this bill fall? Apparently in neither. They deny the right to protect for protection's sake. They affirm the same policy when they lop off protective duties at the same rate through the whole list of dutiable articles, and yet they can not be classed with the "revenue only" disciples, because by a singular contradiction their project rests upon the high protective tariff of 1861. The result of this curious jumble puts them in favor of substantial protection and yet against it, in favor of incidental protection and yet against it, in favor of a tariff for revenue only and yet in favor of the Morrill tariff, which had protection in its eye quite as much as revenue.

This I say is their apparent position, but when we come to examine it a little more closely we find that it is not their actual one, but that underlying these apparent inconsistencies there is a specific, definite purpose that gives method to their madness. This bill takes off 20 per cent.; but, like faith, it is declared to be the substance of things hoped for and the evidence of things not seen. It is to be followed up at the next session—I will not say the next Congress, for that is a materialization of faith I would not be bold enough to attempt—with still other and further reductions upon the horizontal plan, which of itself is an irrecognition of the principle of protection, and which, then as now, will be a necessary sop to be thrown to the free-trade Cerberus. Where is this course to end? It must end in the complete abolition of the tariff, except possibly upon such articles as are not produced in this country.

Even England, which in these modern days has become the great exemplar and model for American statesmanship, raises, I believe, in the neighborhood of a hundred millions by her tariff; so that as long as we are under the influence of this example her admirers here would not declare for absolute free trade. But the protective feature of the tariff would be gone, and it is against that feature that the free-trader makes open war, and against which the revenue reformer will be forced by sheer party momentum to declare equally pronounced hostility or drop out of the ranks. There is a difference in degree merely between absolute and incidental protection, and the men who oppose the one must logically in time oppose the other.

We have reached a period, therefore, in the history of this Government when we are forced to elect between the two great systems of taxation, the external and the internal, for revenue we must have from some quarter, and quite a handsome sum, too, for some time to come.

The latest calculations made at the Treasury Department show that for this present quarter the probable expenditure will be $62,000,000, and this added to what we have already expended for the three previous quarters of the present fiscal year gives a grand total of $242,000,000, to which is to be added also the reserves for the sinking fund, amounting to $45,000,000 more; in all, $287,000,000. Of this sum the tariff yields about $200,000,000 and the internal revenue about $120,000,000; a total, say, of $320,000,000. There are $24,000,000 from miscellaneous sources. Allowing a margin for other appropriations and expenditures, there is about $50,000,000 more going into the Treasury than is absolutely required, unless the excess should be applied to the immediate extinction of the debt, the greater portion of which is not due for a long time to come, which, therefore, would have to be bought at a heavy premium, and which, as the base of our banking circulation and for other reasons, ought not to be disturbed.

The estimated reduction by this bill is $30,000,000, but as this is only one step in the right direction, we should expect the next one to give the finishing stroke to tariff reduction by cutting off the remaining $20,000,000 of the $50,000,000 surplus. What does that mean? It means the perpetuation of the whisky, tobacco, and fermented-liquor tax, with all the galling and oppressive machinery devised for its collection. It means a permanent departure from that method of raising the Federal revenue which has existed without change, except in the exigencies of war, from the foundation of the Government. It means the permanent occupation by the United States of the field of direct taxation, which has hitherto been exclusively enjoyed by the States. It means, in a word, the perpetuation of a system which has done more already to consolidate the central power and extend its overshadowing influence over the States than all other causes combined. Do not let us make a mistake.

That which distinguishes the genuine statesman from his counterfeit presentment is the faculty of seeing the end from the beginning. The end of the movement in which this bill originated is free trade and internal taxation as the fixed policy of this Government. Are you prepared for it? It is said that free trade, or even the conventional free trade such as exists in England, is impossible. Why? The same paragraph in the Constitution which gives the power to levy the import duty provides also for the excise. The one tax is just as constitutional as the other. There is, therefore, no constitutional obstruction in the path of this new departure. What can create the impossibility, then, if the tariff is founded in an economical fallacy, and if the internal method of taxation be the true one? I can see none. You men of the South who followed the banner of State rights until it went down in mire and blood; you who in the evil days of reconstruction felt the heavy hand of the Government not only in the exercise of public control but in the privacy of your very hearthstones, are you to be the first in giving fresh force and direction to that power by introducing the Federal tax-gatherer into new and unfamiliar fields.

Our taxes will be this year in Baltimore about $1.80 on the $100. Suppose we add to this our proportion of the Federal tax under the benign system of free trade and direct taxation and make it, say, $3 on the $100. I am afraid the people would say at once that they could not appreciate the utility of two governments instead of one, that the idle pageant of State sovereignty scarcely paid for the expense, and the sooner it was abolished the better. The General Government represents the people in its external relations and the States in their internal affairs. And there is a natural propriety and an obvious wisdom in confining the taxable areas of each within its own proper jurisdiction. Direct taxation means destruction of the States.

The General Government is now raising about $200,000,000 by the indirect system of taxation. There are over $300,000,000 raised in the States by direct taxation for State, county, and municipal purposes. Do you wish the General Government to abandon its own customary field of taxation and enter that which has been exclusively enjoyed by the States? Are you prepared, in other words, to have $500,000,000 instead of $300,000,000 taken directly from the pockets of the people? States stand or fall as the taxing power is wisely or unwisely used, and nothing has tended more strongly to preserve our own form of government than this separation and appropriation of different sources of revenue to the States and the United States respectively.

I will say nothing of the whisky tax. This House has passed a resolution declaratory of its sense that this tax shall neither be abolished nor reduced. There is a very prevalent opinion, particularly among the advocates of prohibition, that the collection of this tax tends to diminish the consumption of whisky, but as far as I can observe consumption goes on without any perceptible change, except where prohibitory measures have been enforced. I look upon the tax as an obstacle in the way of prohibition.

But that is neither here nor there. Let the whisky tax stand. But you men of Virginia, North Carolina, Missouri, ay, and of Kentucky, what have you to say about the tobacco tax? Do your people like it? Do they relish the infernal system of law and regulation, which puzzles even a lawyer to understand, by which the tax is laid and collected? I will say nothing of its being a tax upon the products of the soil. So on corn and barley. Let that pass. But I speak of a system which permits a man to be dragged hundreds of miles away from his home and, in a distant Federal court, fined and imprisoned for selling a bunch or two of leaf-tobacco to a neighbor.

I speak of a system which, under my own eye, permitted the solemn judgment of the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland, in the good city of Baltimore, to be trampled under foot by an executive ukase issued here at Washington. I am not dreaming and speculating now about economic theories and their conjectural results. I am speaking of facts, facts which fell under my own observation and of which I was a part. I can not speak of them even now, after a cooling time of nearly six years, without emotions of the bitterest and intensest indignation. I swore an oath of vengeance, nay, of perfect fealty to truth and justice, that I would never let the matter rest, and I am here to keep the vow.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue issued an order to take effect on the 1st of May, 1878, that manufacturers of cigars, when they occupied a single room, should separate the portion used as a factory from the sales-room by a substantial partition extending from the floor to the ceiling. To the manufacturer of limited capital who had but a single room within which to manufacture and sell this was a hurtful and an annoying regulation. It cramped him for room and cut him off entirely from the light which came in from the front. The association of manufacturers in Baltimore asked my opinion as to the validity of this regulation, and I advised them that it was not warranted by anything I could find in the Revised Statutes, and was, therefore, illegal. We made a test-case with the consent of the local authorities representing the Government, the manufacturers in the mean time putting up the partitions as required by the Commissioner.

The case came on to be tried, and after full argument and deliberate consideration of the learned judge of the district court of the United States judgment was rendered in favor of the manufacturers, and an opinion expressed by the court that the order of the Commissioner was not only illegal but absurd. The learned judge in delivering that opinion said that he could not understand how the wildest imagination could conceive of any other construction than that which I had placed upon the law, and more than sustained the opinion which I had given to the manufacturers.

After this decision by the court in this test-case the partitions were taken down. What happened? The Commissioner was not satisfied, and asked the opinion of the Attorney-General. That official held that the partition was lawful, and ordered the Commissioner to act accordingly. Then he did that which cut me to the bone. He ordered the partitions back again under pain of immediate seizure and confiscation. Again these law-abiding citizens, dazed and bewildered by this conduct of the Government, applied to me for advice, and I advised them that the judgment of the court must stand until reversed, and that the opinion of the Attorney-General could not affect their rights. But it did nevertheless. The Commissioner gave instructions to seize the stock of every man who refused to put up a partition, and these instructions were rigidly enforced, resulting in the seizure of 55,000 cigars.

So here under this cursed system, which the supporters of this bill would fasten upon the country forever, these innocent, law-abiding men, who had first taken down their partitions, in obedience to the judgment of a court of the United States, had their property seized because they refused to put them up again in compliance with executive orders pronounced by that judgment to be illegal. I say, down with the system. I know that there has been so much clamor about the tariff, in a certain quarter, hereditary and acquired, that gentlemen are compelled to share the fate of those who by sowing the wind must reap the whirlwind.

But it is not yet too late to make a new issue or to escape from the fatal embrace of an old one. Go home to your constituents, tell them since you left that the narrow lines of local interest have widened and expanded into the all-encasing, all-embracing horizon of people and country. Tell them that from this elevated plateau upon which the Capitol rests you have caught a larger view of national greatness. Picture to them that solidarity of interest, that interdependence and nice correlation of parts which has built up in less than a century the most stupendous fabric of human development the world has yet seen. Tell them that agriculture is nothing, that commerce is nothing, that manufactures are nothing, standing alone in frigid and sterile virginity, but in the happy union of reciprocal interchanges are the blessed mother of all that enriches, ennobles, and dignifies a people. If they will not listen to you, if they can hear nothing but the rattle of trace-chains or feel nothing but the compress of cotton-ties, if nothing rouses them but the trumpet-blast of per centum and cost, then teach them the cost of that system which has oppressed their persons, confiscated their property, and debauched and demoralized their politics.

Nay, more, sir. This internal-revenue system not only affects the local politics of the South and crops out even in contested-election cases in this House, but extends its baneful influence to national politics, and at this moment is exerting all its power to name a Presidential candidate in a dozen States where he will not receive a single electoral vote. It can not be possible, if the South realized that now was her chance and her only chance to get rid of this pest, that she would not eagerly embrace the opportunity. I call upon her here in the presence of the country to witness that if this bill passes she will not only carry the burden she now bears, but in time it will be as a man's little finger to his loins.

The vote of the South to-day, yes, sir, before the sun goes down, can break the fetters of a chain as galling as ever fretted or annoyed a free people; but if the opportunity is missed which an imperative demand for reduction in revenue now presents, she will not find it in this generation or the next. But, oh, I forget—the moonshiners are to have relief! There is a tub for you of the South. Spirits distilled from fruits are to pay 10 cents a gallon—a nominal duty, or perhaps none at all. Ah! indeed.

It is not in horizontal cuts alone that modern statesmanship realizes its most perfect intuitions. Think of the brilliancy of that conception which proposes to exercise the taxing power upon the principle of select discrimination, under a rule requiring absolute uniformity, which says to the distiller of grain, "You shall pay 90 cents a gallon," and to the distiller of peaches or grapes, "You shall pay 10 cents," and holds this promise out as a bid for votes.

Was it not the great Kepler who exclaimed when he made his splendid discovery:

I will triumph; I have stolen the golden secret of the Egyptians; nothing shall restrain my sacred fury.

Perhaps that much-abused and sometimes forgotten instrument the Constitution of the United States may put a quietus upon the triumph of this discovery. I take it that a tax upon spirits, however produced, must be uniform; that as the tax is necessarily imposed upon the proof and not the wine gallon, the law must define what a proof gallon is; and that whenever it is ascertained that there is the requisite volume of alcoholic liquor to make a proof gallon of spirits, then the same rate of tax must be applied, it matters not what the material from which the spirits have been produced. And if authority is wanted to show the necessity of uniformity in levying the excise, I think it can be found in the case of the United States vs. Singer (15 Wallace). You may rely upon it that there is more moonshine in this proposition than substance.

Mr. Chairman, the tax on tobacco and fermented liquors and the special taxes connected with them, according to data furnished by the Treasury Department upon actual and estimated receipts for the present fiscal year, will amount to about $42,000,000. The country demands a reduction of revenue, so we all say. Why not begin the reduction here. It will be absolute; it will be in accordance with the settled policy of this Government, and it will at the same time rid us of an obnoxious and pernicious system of taxation. It will not only accomplish all this, but it will remove a tax from articles which enter into the daily use and consumption of the laboring masses. I believe that there is a large class of our population that would sooner go without sugar and coffee than beer and tobacco. I believe that the removal of the tax on them and its retention on distilled spirits would produce temperance, as experience has shown that the lighter stimulants, when brought into general use, are sufficient to allay that thirst for excitement over and above the normal which seems natural to man.

TAX ON CIGARS, DOMESTIC AND IMPORTED.

The tax on manufactured tobacco, cigars, &c., under the intricate system of law and regulation by which it is collected is not only a burden upon the consumer and the producer, but an annoying restriction as well upon all the labor employed in this very general and useful industry. But the Morrison bill, among its other eccentricities, proposes to reduce the tax on imported tobacco and cigars the regulation 20 per cent., at a time, too, when the domestic grower is confronted with a serious enemy in Sumatra leaf, under a classification in the present tariff which nobody seems to understand but the Attorney-General.

Why liquors should not have been scaled in the same bill with tobacco is one of the mysteries of this bill. Champagnes, other wines, &c., pay at the existing rate, but the fragrant Havana, consumed only by the rich, gets off with a 20 per cent. reduction, while the home-grown and home-made article, consumed to a large extent by those who earn their daily bread by manual labor, is still taxed at present rates. I will vote for no bill which makes such a discrimination against an article of domestic growth and of such universal consumption. Silk, too, is recognized as an infant in its swaddling-clothes, and the strong arm of the tariff is thrown around its cradle; but tobacco, one of the principal agricultural products of the country, and in its manufactured state the solace of millions, is stripped of a large portion of its defensive armor and left naked to its enemies. I will vote for no bill that maintains the duty on silk and scales the rate on imported tobacco.

The mining and transportation of bituminous coal is one of the great industries in my State; millions of capital and thousands of men are employed in its production and distribution. It is used almost universally, with nominal exceptions that do not count in the aggregate, for the manufacture of gas and for fuel for steamships. It is stated upon the best authority that not 10,000 tons of this coal are consumed for domestic purposes on the seaboard. The cry of cheap fuel for the poor is the cry of the demagogue or of the enthusiast who overruns the facts. Anthracite is the fuel of the masses, and nature herself has protected anthracite.

Under the present tariff the duty of 75 cents a ton scarcely gives our product a living chance in the market. But this Morrison bill does not even show it the cold favor of a partial reduction, but wipes out the duty altogether. Coal is put on the free-list as one of the raw materials. Why, pray? It may be raw in the sense that it is not cooked. You can not eat it, and it would be rather difficult of digestion if you did; but raw in the economic sense it is not, and can not be in the nature of things. Raw it may be in the mine, but it can not be brought to the point of use without coming in contact with labor at every step. And labor, too, diversified all along the scale, from the mere work of the hands, with pick and shovel, up to the skill which constructs and operates the most powerful engine of transportation which the genius of man has devised.

How it has been most cunningly formed by the hand of the Almighty in long processes, which would tire out any other artificer who had less time than eternity to work in, I do not speak. But when it has been dug up, when these black diamonds have been extracted from their sunless treasure-house and made to sparkle upon the myriad fingers of art, when you come to think of the many agencies connected with its transportation and distribution as well as production, you might as well say that the car in which it is carried or the locomotive by which it is drawn is not a manufacture.

All this talk about raw material is founded in a singular fallacy. There is no such thing in existence except when it is beyond the power of man to use or control. Timber standing upon some of those unforfeited lands in Oregon, remote and inaccessible to market, may be called raw material. The uses it has for man are prospective and fall within the claim of his proprietorship only under the terms of the original grant which gave him dominion over the earth and all things in it. Every now and then in these vast timber tracts a cyclone bows the head of the mighty, and there is a fall and a crash like the overthrow of a Cæsar or a Czar.

Three thousand miles farther east this neglected windfall, which can only decay and rot where it lies, would have been by the genius and art of man transplanted to a new element and made to bloom and blossom, like Aaron's rod, with strange and unaccustomed flowers. In Oregon it is raw material, whether it lifts up its venerable head to the heavens in the full pride of primal growth or lies prone upon the earth a dismantled wreck, but in the ship-yards of Maine and Maryland it is a part of subdued nature appropriated to art, a remote and potential vassal on the outposts of ideal empire, reduced into immediate and effective homage.

The fact is, besides Congressional speeches before alluded to, I know nothing which falls within the definition of raw material except certain natural products which in some few favored spots of earth spring up in spontaneous abundance as a reminder perhaps of the orignal paradise.

I have before me the picture of a native, before the daring of Columbus had disturbed the tranquillity of his indolent repose, reaching out a languid hand to pluck the banana that dangled in tempting lusciousness before his eyes, while he dexterously dodges the cocoa-nut which some malignant monkey, mad to see a man so happy, throws at his head.

Nature, stinting in nothing, has so tempered the wind to this shorn lamb of the tropics that he needs no clothes, and so he follows the shadow of his cocoa-nut tree all day long in naked bliss, cramming himself with the raw material which every bush supplies and washing it down with the sweet milk of the fruit, over which he and the monkey exercise a divided and disputed dominion.

This is the Eden of the materialist, the raw materialist; but outside of this paradise I know of no country or clime where there is such a thing as raw material which in its production, transportation, and distribution does not require labor, and in some cases labor of as high order as any finished article usually styled a manufacture.

Take wool, where the most desperate attempt is made to pull it over our eyes in the effort to show that the public is in some mysterious way being fleeced. It is true that man has nothing to do with its creation. The combined genius of the civilized world could not make a sheep, although it produces a plentiful crop of lambs every now and then, particularly in Wall street. His mysterious evolution out of the dark into the light, like that of man himself, is the act of a higher power. While this is so, it is also true that without the care of man sheep contending with their natural foes would carry on such a doubtful conflict that it is probable the species would soon cease to exist. It is the most tender and timid of all the animals, and its proverbial gentleness has supplied those beautiful figures of speech which our Saviour uses when he sinks the God in the effort to claim a closer affinity with man. It requires constant watching, careful tending, and frequent nursing ere the bleating lamb, that comes with the violets and robins, grows into the full-fleeced buck ready for the shears. Wool is no more raw material than a blanket.

But my more immediate concern is with coal. I will vote for no bill that puts coal on the free-list and keeps up the bar of protection in favor of other articles not one bit more meritorious. If you want free trade, say so; be honest about it; but do not come in here with a measure that is neither sea nor good dry land and ask my support.

Right here I beg to call the attention of the House to another anomaly of this hybrid bill, compounded in equal proportions of Democratic free trade and Republican protection.

There are no tin-plates, I believe, made in this country. That was one of the infant industries that fell still-born. Perhaps there is no article in the whole tariff schedules in which the people of Maryland have a deeper interest than in cheap tin-plates.

One of the principal articles of export from the city of Baltimore is canned goods, for which that city enjoys a world-wide reputation. It is one of the few things on which the United States still maintains a decent position in foreign trade, about which so much is said and which this bill is to do so much in restoring to its former prestige. And yet the same bill which proposed to kill one great Maryland industry by putting coal on the free-list refuses to do anything to aid another in a case where confessedly the doctrine of protection has no application.

I will vote for no bill which admits competing coal free of duty for the benefit of the manufacturing interests alone and yet taxes at a heavy rate tin-plates, which are non-competing. I will vote for no unequal discriminating bill which while it blesses other sections of the country blasts my own by two opposite and contradictory courses, freeing one article and taxing another.

There is another, among a dozen objections, I have to the bill. It is wrong in principle and all its details. Take cotton-ties. I express the opinion with considerable confidence that the South will not get the benefit of the reduction on these articles made by this bill. I can not here assign the reasons for this opinion, but with the leave of the House I will print with these remarks a statement showing the inaccuracy of the bill in this and many other matters. It is a house of cards built upon a quicksand; it has no certain base; it is a contradictory mixture of free trade and protection, with discriminations against both, and an impenetrable jungle of ad valorem rates, specific, compound, and complex duties.

It reminds me of a picture you may see in any of our drug stores. Free trade is sitting in the person of a naked little boy and a dog by his side, both of them squatting on a rail and looking wistfully out to to the sea, where, under full sail, dipping with the waves, rides a ship carrying the old flag, which, under the benignant influence of this new economy, is to chase its dancing shadow over forgotten seas. Such is the picture, sir, at a distance; but on closer inspection the delusion is dispelled, and on the bare back of the boy you discover a protection plaster, and around the neck of the dog a protection collar; and, saddest of all, regenerated, rejuvenated, disenthralled commerce, upon the broadest and the whitest of her expanded wings, bears the same disastrous sign and symbol. Poor free trade, writhing in the throes of alternate constriction and depletion, how shall she survive the ordeal of Allcock's porous plaster and Brandreth's pills?

Mr. Chairman, I have said nothing of the economic questions underlying this discussion. I am not a free-trader. Abstractly it may be right, and possibly the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] may live to vote for it when he ceases to be a Representative of that great State of the Union and takes a higher seat in the parliament of man as a representative of the federation of the world.

But this country is not ready for free trade and will not be until there is an equilibrium of the labor forces created between the United States and Europe. All the argument that can be made from now until doomsday will not alter the fact that labor is cheaper over there than it is here, and that as long as that continues foreign will undersell domestic manufactures. When this country fills up by natural increase and immigration, and European ratios of population to the square mile are established here, we shall also, who live to see it, witness a nearer equalization of the rates of labor, and then the race of competition may be fairly begun.

There is a higher law, sir, than tariffs or the law of free trade, and that is the law of supply and demand. The world with the aid of improved machinery can produce more than is required, and just now, after a run of unexampled prosperity, we have reached a period when the market is suffering the consequence of overproduction. This is true the world over. England is suffering as much from it as the United States. Her warehouses are bursting with the products of the loom and the forge. Suppose you abolish the tariff to-day; the only consequence would be that England would work off her surplus and the American manufacturer would be ruined. How would that give us trade to South America? If there was any trade to be had in that quarter what hinders England with her cheaper labor from supplying the demand? There is none.

Machinery has done its work, and the world has more than it can consume. Twelve thousand men out of work on the Clyde, reduction of wages among the iron workers in the north of England, strikes in the middle, that is the story that Great Britain tells to-day. If we tell the same story here, under different economic conditions, then be assured that the cause lies deeper than the tariff. I do not pretend to that philosophic insight which can penetrate to the core of the mystery. Still less do I pretend to be able to prescribe with infallible certainty a remedy for the evils. But I believe if you can invent someway of checking the combined genius and greed of man you will get nearer to the root of the disease than by following the quack prescription offered by this bill.

John Stuart Mill has said somewhere that it was melancholy to reflect that all the improved machinery which man had brought to his aid had not lightened or diminished the hours of labor by a single minute. It is indeed a mournful and humiliating reflection that the genius which has been able to capture and domesticate all the wild forces of nature and impress them into the service of man has not been able to make of man himself anything more than a beast of burden. The saddest part of it all is that when the world is full to overflowing; when granaries and elevators are bursting with plenty; when warehouses are overstocked with the materials for raiment, there are so many who go without sufficient food or shelter, or even decent clothes to their backs. If there is any man in this world for whom I feel the profoundest sympathy it is he who is able and willing to work and who can find no man to hire him. It is the same old sad and sickening story which has come down to us from the parable of the vineyard, and which, doubtless, had made itself felt long before the Son of Man entered upon His course of suffering and sorrow.

Is there no mode by which we can lift labor out of the ruts in which it has wearily revolved for so many ages and place it upon the high road that leads to comfort, independence, and self-respect? Can not we by constitutional amendment, if in no other way, provide some means by which the hours of labor shall be reduced, and stop the clang of this infernal machinery that goes on grinding forever and forever what the world can not consume, and ruins labor by the excess of its own production? There is the true field for the display of American statesmanship.

Sir, I listened to the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Ohio with that pleasure and exhilaration that lofty sentiments clothed in fitting diction always inspire. If I did not follow him in the connection he sought to establish between the tariff and the wheat-fields of India, it was not because the way was not made smooth or the journey easy by the soft blandishments of a pleasing rhetoric, but because with even all this help I was too feeble in thought or imagination to bridge the tremendous chasm. I do not believe that business concerns itself with either magnanimity or revenge.

I do not believe that the tariff forces tribute from our wheat by this roundabout process any more than the farmer of Ohio will pay tribute to the King of Siam when he goes to see Barnum's white elephant. I know there is a connection between cats and clover, for Darwin pointed that out long ago by a process that my scientific friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN] will readily recall. Quite singularly it turned out the other day in a case tried in Baltimore, and in a manner that will baffle even his philosophic mind, that there was a close relation between mint-juleps and baked potatoes.

It is a matter of history how intimate the connection was between chops and tomato-sauce, and the responsive affections of Mrs. Bardell for the innocent and unsophisticated Mr. Pickwick. I shall not, and therefore, endeavor to show that if India can sell wheat in Liverpool at 80 cents to the bushel, so far from our tariff, which levies a duty of 20 cents a bushel on grain, being an enemy to the farmer, the day is not far distant when the farmers of Ohio will beg for an increase of the rate to save them from the pauper labor of India.

But, sir, I have wandered a little from the point. I was discussing the labor aspect of this question. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to say that it was useless to attempt to stay this agitation, because the culture and the chivalry of the country were moving, and that when they come down on anything it was like Mulberry Sellers—heavy.

Sir, I have read history wrong if the culture or the chivalry ever led the van of any great movement that reached or touched the popular heart. Great revolutions, those which agitate society to its profoundest depths, come from below and not from above. Such a revolution swept France with a storm of fire and blood in the days of the first republic; Cromwell led another in England, and it was the great Commoner of Virginia who sounded the tocsin of '76. It was not the culture or the chivalry of Judea that followed Christ, born himself in a manger and of humble parents, but the poor fishermen and the common people who heard him gladly.

If you are listening for the first rumblings of that ground-swell that portends revolution and change, turn away from the culture and chivalry; get your ear down, if you can, close to the popular heart; take a careful account of what is passing there, and reckon by its pulsations the violence of the coming storm. Speak of labor and its emancipation, and you will hear that great heart beat quicker and quicker; tell it that it shall yet hear its matin and vesper in the prattle of children at home and not in the roar of the mill and the forge, and you will find it throb high with exultation. Whisper to it that the dawn of the day is at hand when the divine rule, "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you," is about to take the place of that other rule which has so long governed, but which was only recently formulated by a clerical free-trader, that the law of price is the law of brains, but whisper gently, lest the great hearts should burst in excess of joy. This is the movement that the gentleman had better turn his attention to, for just as sure as the culture and chivalry are moving in one direction, the labor of this country is moving in another.

One thing more, Mr. Chairman, and I am done. Threats of discipline have been thrown out if we do not accept the dogmas of this new school. We are gravely informed by the gentleman from Ohio that it is our duty, on a great economic question like this, in which, as we understand it, there is involved a complete and radical departure from the old and customary methods of taxation, to be governed by the will of a caucus and accept its dictates with blind submission. I repudiate the suggestion. I defy the threats. Why, the caucus resolution had in it, if I remember, that pitiful subterfuge by which votes were to be captured, not by threats, but by the bribe of free brandy distilled from fruits?

Sir, this is a question that concerns the business interests of this vast country, and when such a question arises I will follow the dictates of my conscience; I will follow in the lead of no party, but I will cast my vote on my oath as a Representative in this national Congress. If the gentleman can afford to repudiate the Democratic platform of his State, if he expects to denounce it as a heresy and trample it under foot, he must permit me to exercise the same liberty of opinion in dealing with the behests of a Congressional caucus. I will not be bound by it, and I trust that every Democrat of this House who had the courage to vote his convictions in December will not have lost it in May. I voted then against the present Speaker of this House, with strong personal predilections in his favor, formed on the very highest opinion of his ability and character.

If nothing else had been at stake but his own illustrious merit I think the chances are more than even that my ballot in that election would have been cast with the majority. As it was I voted for his distinguished opponent, a man who has rendered eminent service to both his country and his party, and who in the crucial hours of the South's struggle won a battle in her defense, of which it may be said that peace hath her victories no less renowned than war. He was opposed to reopening the tariff question which had just been closed, and in favor of giving the country a breathing spell after the long and trying agitation through which it had just passed. He believed in the reduction of revenue, but it was a reduction which could be safely accomplished without shock or disturbance to the business interests of the country, and the amount of which could be stated with absolute certainty. He believed if war taxes were to be gotten rid of, then the place to strike first was at that system, which was the creature of the war, devised purely as a war measure, and not at the customary and permanent source of supply recognized from the beginning of the Government and enacted into law in the second statute passed by the First Congress. He believed that he who serves his country best serves his party best; and recognizing this policy as the best for the country, he saw in it also the certain means of his party's advancement.

Has anything happened since to alter the stern logic of the situation? If we were right then, we are right now. If it was right to attempt to kill the movement for permanent internal taxation while it was yet in the egg, it is right to strangle it now as it struts about this Hall in the full pride of flesh and feather.

A distinguished representative of this new-fangled Kentucky idea has said that we of the Democratic opposition were cowards and sneaks if we did not march to the tune of free trade under the banner of the Morrison bill. I will not adopt the polite language of the gentleman, but I think that any man who flinches now may well dread that his character for consistency and firmness may be justly questioned. The proper, the wise, and conciliatory course for all sides, for Democrats as well as Republicans, is to recommit this bill, with instructions to report a bill framed on the principles declared in the resolutions I offered yesterday.

But if this proposition is voted down, if every offer of compromise is refused, if pressed to the wall and there is no retreat, I should be compelled to break the ties that bind me to this side of the House on a purely economic quuestion—while I should most regretfully part company with so many friends who have won my confidence and esteem, and while I could not and would not cross yonder aisle, I could at least take refuge in a sentiment of nationality under the folds of the old flag, where I sought and found shelter in the early days of my political life, and where its sweetest and tenderest memories still cluster.

APPENDIX.

A PRACTICAL DISCUSSION OF THE CASE.

The first objection to the bill is that it takes the present tariff law, act of March 3, 1883, and proposes to scale all the schedules excepting two by a reduction of 20 per cent., limited, however, to rates of duty as fixed by an act approved March 2, 1861, which, however well calculated for the interests of the country at that date, is only a stumbling-block as applied under this bill—

First. Because it would make the rate of duty in every instance depend on whether 20 per cent. off the present tariff would be less than was collected under act of 1861, and every invoice or part of invoice would have to undergo the test of two acts instead of one in order to fix the rate of duty, and thus render the rates uncertain and fluctuating.

Second. That it would destroy the carefully prepared rates of duty as applied to certain fixed grades and classes of manufactures as imported under act of March 3, 1883.

Third. That it would change ad valorem to specific rates, and vice versa, when years of experience have shown the wisdom of one or the other as fixed in act of March 3, 1883.

Fourth. That owing to the different grouping and wordings of the act of March 2, 1861, and act of March 3, 1883, it would confuse rates, revive compound and complex duties, where these have been done away with in the present tariff, and would be destructive of the principles of the decisions of the courts, decisions of the Treasury Department, and Attorney-General; and Fifth. That it would be destructive of relative values of similar classes of merchandise and detrimental to manufacturing and producing interests of this country in a variety and multitude of ways.

SCHEDULE I.—Cotton and cotton goods.

Cotton yarns, warps, &c., are under act of March 3, 1883 (page 4 of table), provided for at specific rates per pound. These under this bill would be subject to duty by the pound, or according to value at 30 per cent. ad valorem, owing to whether the act of 1861 would bar the reduction from present rate or not.

Cotton cloth (page 4 of table), "if dyed, colored, stained, painted, or printed," under the act of March 3, 1883, provided for at a specific duty of 5 cents per square yard, while the bill would have the effect to restore the ad valorem rate of 19 per cent. and 3½ cents per yard under the act of March 1, 1861, thus making compound duties.

SCHEDULE J.—Hemp, jute, and flax goods.

On brown and bleached linen, ducks, canvas, and all textile fabrics generally of linen (page 5 of table), on which duty of $5,468,701 was collected in fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, the rate of duty under present tariff is 35 per cent. ad valorem, without regard to square-yard value, while this bill has the effect to revive the square-yard rate as basis of value, thus making the rate complex in its application. So with regard to burlaps (page 6 of table), on which a duty of $1,317,502 was collected for fiscal year 1883. The reduction of duty on burlaps is barred, however, by act of March 2, 1861, owing to former grouping, hence no reduction would follow.

The effect would be if the bill were enacted in its present form to make burlaps dutiable at the same rate as the fine fabrics of hemp, jute, and flax, whereas the present law justly makes a difference of 5 per cent ad valorem in favor of the burlaps; in other words, the fine goods are now dutiable at 35 per cent. and the burlaps at 30 per cent., but this bill would make them both 30 per cent. This would have a tendency to disturb values not only directly but indirectly, for other items in this schedule are barred in their reduction by the rates of act of March 2, 1861.

SCHEDULE K.—Wool and woolens.

Owing to the difference in the wording of the act of March 3, 1883, and act of March 2, 1861, and the limitation clause of the bill, it would be impossible to scale the rates in equal proportion. Some of the wools would be scaled at 10 per cent. and others at 20 per cent. in reduction, thus again destroying values and discriminating against certain grades of wool, and without reason or seeming intent, but wholly from trying to merge two acts and one bill into one act at a reduced rate, subject to limitation, hit or miss.

So much has been said regarding the effect of a reduction of duty on wool that it seems unnecessary to more than point to the facts above stated.

SCHEDULE C.—Metals.

The rates and groupings under the act of March 2, 1861, here also act as a bar to the equal scaling of rates of duty at 20 per cent., the effect being to leave many items at rates now fixed by act of March 3, 1883, while others are reduced 20 per cent. or less, and all without the least regard to how they may affect either values or the manufacturing interests of this country. The advancement of the arts and sciences and the superior mechanical devices and processes since the enactment of the Morrill tariff in 1861 have worked a marked change in the mode and cost of productions of various forms and character of manufactures of iron and steel in Europe and America, and the basis of protection and revenue as framed in 1861 for this country would not be a safe or correct basis for the present, even if applied intact, and hence an indiscriminate reduction of 20 per cent. of the present rate limited, while it might be well and safe in some things, may also have the effect to destroy interests which it is the part of good legislation to foster. The limitation of the act of 1861 therefore rather aggravates than otherwise the relation of values of various forms of iron and steel.

I may instance "boiler or other plate iron," the rate of duty under present law being 1½ cents per pound, or $28 per ton; under the proposed law the duty would be $22.40 per ton; a difference of $5.60 per ton (page 11 of table).

"Sheet-iron thinner than 1½ inches and not thinner than 20 wire-gauge," is now dutiable at $24.64 per ton. Proposed rate is $20 per ton; a difference of $4.64 per ton.

"The same," thinner than 20 wire-gauge and not thinner than 25 wire-gauge, is now dutiable at $26.88 per ton. Proposed rate, $25 (because it is limited by act of March 2, 1861 in its reduction); a difference of only $1.88 per ton.

Now, how might these disturbing rates of duty in their differences, as compared with present rates, affect manufacturers and the markets in this country?

Referring to the disturbing elements of the proposed law as affecting decisions of the courts or the Departments, or vice versa, let us look at the item "Iron and steel cotton-ties" (page 11 of table). These are now provided for under act of March 3, 1883, at a duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem, which yields a duty of about $13 per ton. The proposed law is intended to reduce this rate to 28 per cent. ad valorem, or say about $11 per ton, if not barred by act of March 2, 1861. The table accompanying the bill shows the rate under act of 1861 to be 30 per cent. ad valorem as "manufactures of iron not otherwise provided for." But here arises a complication. Were cotton-ties imported in 1861; if so, at what rate? Cotton-ties were not named in act of March 2, 1861. Under act of June 30, 1864, they were held to be dutiable as "hoop-iron," and the rate of duty on hoop-iron was under that act 1½ cents per pound; and hoop-iron under act of March 2, 1861, was $20 per ton. Not until by circular letter of July 11, 1868, issued by the Treasury Department (see Treasury Decisions for 1868, page 54, No. 181), were cotton-ties admitted to duty at 35 per cent. as "manufactures of iron not specially enumerated or provided for," and then under act of June 30, 1864.

This decision was based upon a decision of the United States circuit court at New Orleans. So we see that not until 1868 were cotton-ties admitted to duty at a less rate than $20 per ton, the rate for hoop-iron (with which they were held to assimilate by the Treasury Department), until the decision of the court on a subsequent act. Hence under the proposed law, taking the limit of 1861 act into consideration, the question would arise, can a reduction of 20 per cent. on the present rate of duty be applied to cotton-ties, or taking the rate as held until 1868 as a guide for the interpretation of 1861 act, are they barred from a reduction? To enact the bill in its present form as regards cotton-ties we would be involving the rate of duty in doubt, and leaving again the Treasury Department or the courts to settle the rate after appeals and suits and many embarrassments to the disadvantage of the cotton interests of the South. And this condition of mixing tariff rates leads to endless other items on which a doubt would be similarly enacted.

SCHEDULE M.—Books, papers, &c.

Attention is called to inconsistencies in the bill compared with the present law:

The act of March 3, 1883, makes the duty on books, engravings, and all printed matter similar 25 per cent. ad valorem, and it provides for paper, sized or glued, suitable only for printing-paper, 20 per cent ad valorem, and paper on which engravings are printed 25 per cent. This bill would affect the trade and manufactures seriously, as it would reduce books, engravings, and printed matter to 20 per cent., or the rate of duty it provided for the material itself, and would actually make engravings cheaper than the rate for paper upon which they are usually printed. A reduction of rate in duty could only, in consequence of limit of rate by act of 1861, be applied to two groups in the schedule.

SCHEDULE F.—Tobacco.

This schedule should have been left out and exempted from reduction, same as Schedule H—liquors. To reduce the duty would be to cheapen foreign tobacco and cigars at the expense of domestic tobacco and cigars, and is against the interests of our producers and manufacturers.

SCHEDULE B.—Earthen and glass ware.

Here again the act of March 2, 1861, acts as a bar to a uniform scaling of duties and breaks the relation of duties to values and grades of glass, and utterly demolishes the fair rates of duty on glass as fixed in the act of March 3, 1883—present tariff—and this without regard to how it may affect either manufacturers, values, or the glass interests of the country.

SCHEDULE N.—Sundries.

Here also the act of March 2, 1861, acts as a bar to uniform reduction of duties, and affects the items in the schedule, hit or miss, without regard to anything save the rate of duty under said act, and hence disturbs values and the relations of cost to production in various ways. Turn to "Clocks and parts of clocks" and you will find no reduction can be made in duties, as the rate is now 30 per cent. ad valorem and was the same in act of 1861. Then turn to page 23 of table and you will see "watches, watch-cases, watch-movements, parts of watches, and watch materials," now dutiable at 25 per cent., would be reduced to 20 per cent. Now this difference of 10 per cent. in rate of duty would be inconsistent and against the watch and clock manufacturing interests of this country.

Then look at India-rubber fabrics—page 22 of table. The act of March 3, 1883, makes these dutiable at 30 per cent., and they can not be reduced, because barred by act of 1861, but articles composed of India-rubber, including boots and shoes, are now dutiable at 25 per cent., and, not being barred by 1861 act, would be reduced to 20 per cent. duty. This is not consistent with the rubber productions of to-day, whether it was in 1861 or not, and how it might affect the rubber interests of the country is a matter of importance as well as some doubt.

The question of duty on tin, or tin-plates, as familiarly called, is one of importance to the whole canning interests of the United States, and I know of no tin-plate manufactory in this country (there may be, though), but in comparison with the amount used the manufacture of tin-plates, if at all, is very small, and as great quantities of can goods are now exported, and as an encouragement to the export trade to run off our surpluses, tin-plates should pay very little if any duty.

The table accompanying the bill, prepared by Mr. Evans, is based upon values, weights, measures, &c., of the importations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and was intended merely to show by comparison the reductions on each item of the tariff and total amount under the operations of the bill. The rates, if made up exactly similar for the present fiscal year, would be very much changed, owing to the collections being made under act of March 3, 1883, and fluctuations in values, &c., which would change the per cent. basis of calculations; but as the table is not, as I understand it, to be a part of the act, each invoice of merchandise would have to be acted upon, having the act of March 3, 1883, as a basis and the act of March 2, 1861, as a limit in the reduction of duty under the proposed law.

In perfecting any legislation in the formation of a tariff it would seem to be sound policy, well-considered political economy, and good statesmanship to have in view always the advancement of domestic affairs of the country. To attempt to limit the changed condition of this prosperous country of to-day by any standard fixed so far back as 1861 is therefore like putting "new wine in old bottles."

The act of 1861 was passed before the era of steel ships, ocean cables, the telephone, and the appliance of electricity to use as light or power, and when the volume of business of the country was vastly inferior to that of to-day. When it is considered that the wealth of the country has more than trebled since 1861, that business has kept pace with wealth, and progress with business, it may be seriously questioned if we can safely tie down the present tariff to a stake driven in 1861. No, sir; the changed condition and relative values of nearly every commodity and the steady increase in volume of business forbids it.

It would seem to be the true policy to foster all manufacturing and producing interests at home, so that internal developments may keep pace with the growth of the country and furnish all needed materials for the building up of the great West in railroads, mills, factories, and the implements of husbandry and daily wants of a growing population.

The tariff act of March 3, 1883, contains some unintentional inconsistencies, but in the main is the clearest we have had; but the provisos in House bill No. 5893 in their entangling ramifications are highly objectionable, and to enact them into a law would be vicious.

NOTE.—"Ad valorem duties" are rates fixed at a percentage of value; "specific duties" are rates fixed at a given amount per pound or measure; "compound duties" are both ad valorem and specific rates to one article; "complex duties" are both ad valorem and specific rates to an article the duty on which is regulated by the value per pound or measure.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, the discussion evoked by the bill under consideration appears to me to have assumed and taken a wider range than was necessarily involved in determining its merits. I for one do not regret it. The measure pending does not propose a complete revision of the tariff system of this country. It is primarily a bill for the reduction of taxation rather than for the revision of a tariff system. And yet the tariff laws of this Government, from its foundation to the present hour, have been passed in panoramic review. They have been defended upon the one side and assailed upon the other with a fairness and an ability in excess of any tariff discussion to which I have ever listened since I became a member of this House. Unlike the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], who has but recently addressed this committee, I am not here to complain of the conduct of this debate or its general run of utterance. In the main it has been fair; fair from the different standpoints from which this bill has been reviewed. In the main it has been courteous, lacking that acerbity and acrimony that is always to be regretted.

I did regret, Mr. Chairman, that the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] should have seen fit in the exuberance of his zeal to indulge in remarks that were received and could be received by many of his political associates only with the sense of sincerest pain. I regret that he found it necessary to arraign those who advocated this measure and spoke for its passage and many of its supporters after a fashion that was rather sectional instead of being national. I regretted that he should have found it necessary to appeal to prejudices and to passions that should have been buried with the war that gave them birth, and that he should have undertaken to flaunt a bloody shirt in the face of an American Congress when a sense of dignity on the part of the Republicans themselves has long since consigned it to oblivion. [Applause.]

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. EATON. I suppose my friend alludes to a remark I made with regard to the confederate constitution?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Not only that.

Mr. EATON. I will talk about that for one moment, with the gentleman's permission. I will try not to take up much of his time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. EATON. I thought I explained to the entire satisfaction of my friend from Georgia exactly what I meant, precisely what I meant; that I intended to point and did point an argument irresistibly that the very making of that confederate constitution leaving out the general-welfare clause showed that the sense of that people when they undertook to make their own constitution was free trade. And permit me to say in defense before I am arraigned—I was not aware of it till this moment—the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, my friend and I presume yours, Mr. GIBSON, quoted the same clause of the confederate constitution, made precisely the same remarks that I did, and I have yet to hear that he is a sectionalist. And I am almost led to say that the remark which I heard attributed to my friend from Maine ought to be repeated. I understand he said he had not entirely lived in vain, for he had lived long enough to hear his friend from Connecticut called a sectionalist. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not and did not blame the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] so much for the language he used with reference to the confederate constitution. I knew that the responsibility for its introduction into this debate did not lie at his door, but that it was a suggestion furnished to him by one who comes to this House from a section further South.

Mr. EATON. I thought I would not name that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do name it. But that is not all. I regret that in the gentleman's speech the word "traitor" should have crept into a tariff debate on a tax-reduction bill.

Mr. EATON. I ought to say a word there.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. EATON. I thought my public record would be a defense against any charge of that character. I was speaking of the Revolutionary war. I was speaking of a Connecticut man who was called a traitor, as he was; and I said there were other traitors than he and the woods were full of them everywhere. [Laughter and applause.] And I said in near connection, as my friend will see if he will read my speech. I have not read it; I have not revised it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have read it carefully.

Mr. EATON. The gentleman will see that I said, when speaking of the late terrible civil war, I would have laid my life down——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to repeat his speech for I have not time to yield him for that purpose. But I have this to say: if the gentleman's opprobrious epithets were intended only for those who figured unfortunately in the Revolutionary struggle, I had no cause to complain on that score, and I am glad to have him say so.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think I have given up time enough.

Mr. HUNT. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly. Take my hour.

Mr. HUNT. I will not take your hour. I desire to take one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will yield to anybody. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT].

Mr. HUNT. I think the gentleman owes it to me to yield now. He came to me and asked me why I had suggested the provisions of the confederate constitution by way of argument to my distinguished friend from Connecticut. He asked me if I had done it. I said I had.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is all I said.

Mr. HUNT. No, sir; just one minute.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I must go on. I can not yield all my time.

Mr. HUNT. Allow me one minute.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have allowed you three already. Go on, but for God's sake get through.

Mr. HUNT. The object was to show that a constitution, to wit, that of the Confederate States, where it contains a certain clause giving congress the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, &c., for revenue necessary to carry on the government, but providing that no bounties shall be granted from the treasury, nor any duties or taxes laid on importations from foreign nations to promote or foster any branch of industry, and making no provision for the general welfare, does not mean what section 8, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States does and where the language used is essentially different.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well. Now I trust I may have the permission of the committee to proceed. The rightful taxing power of the Government is limited to that Government's necessities. There is and there can be no claim to any rightful taxing power possessed by this Congress except it be employed for the purposes specified in the organic law, the maintenance of this Government and the meeting of its obligations.

We are at last to-day this near together; I mean all sides, all sections, all shades of political opinion. It is asserted that we are raising more revenue than this Government requires. No man denies it. It is contended that the taxes are consequently heavier than there can be any necessity assigned for. All men admit it. It is asserted and confessed that a surplus of revenue rests yonder in the vaults of the Federal Treasury idle and unemployed.

Under these circumstances each of the two great political parties of the country have committed themselves openly and fairly to a reduction of taxation rates, and to the abatement of that surplus revenue. The opportunity is now offered; here is the bill. We propose by it to abate tariff taxation to the extent of 20 per cent. Is it an unreasonable bill? What objection is urged against it? Does it propose to insert the knife too deeply? Will you undertake to say, you gentlemen upon the other side, will you dare to claim that the reduction is too heavy?

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman allow me just one moment?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I can not. Meaning to be courteous and polite, I must decline to be interrupted at all.

Mr. BRUMM. Only a half a minute?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Not for one second.

Mr. BRUMM. Does not your own side deny that proposition?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman can speak in his own time, not in mine. I trust I may be spared the annoyance of further efforts at interruption. If I can start again with a reasonable prospect of being allowed to proceed for a single minute, I will make my profoundest obeisance to this House.

I say that the bill which is now presented has not proposed to cut the rates of taxation too deeply. I will prove it by competent witnesses. I subpœna for that purpose every man who belongs to the party on the other side of this House. I do so for this reason: In the last Congress we saw a bill passed which is known as the Tariff Commission bill. A commission was raised and appointed and the work of tariff revision was farmed out to it. It drafted a bill which passed through the House from a conference committee and was crystallized into law. Its authors promised us that the bill would reduce the tariff rates from 20 to 25 per cent. That bill went into operation, but it has failed to make good the pledges that were given. Instead of reducing the tariff rates 20 or 25 per cent. it reduces them but 1¾ per cent.

I know that the necessities of party required that there should be some supplemental statement made in order that it might appear that possibly the reduction may be greater. But according to the last report obtained from the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics you were not able to extort from him a promise based upon hope or supposition that would carry the reduction of tariff rates by the bill of 1883 above 5 per cent. instead of 20 or 25 per cent.

The bill that is here before you, if it shall become a law supplemental to the measure of 1883, will still fall short of the tariff taxation relief that the Republican party promised to the people of this country. There is a saving clause in this bill which it seems to me would be sufficient to commend it to the support of every protectionist. While putting this horizontal cut on the tariff list, it expressly provides that the duties on no article that is to be affected shall in any case or under any circumstances be reduced below that rate of protection which was afforded by what is known as the Morrill tariff bill of 1861. It carries an omnibus or a basket clause into which fall for protection, to the extent of the war-tariff rate of 1861, every article no matter how little the duty upon it may now range above the rates of that statute.

The tariff bill of 1861 was passed in the face of the greatest civil war of modern times, when the necessities of this country forced Congress to exaggerated attempts upon the tax-paying people of the land, when producers by the million were turned into consumers in the persons of soldiers; when armies and fleets and navies were to be raised and builded and maintained; when war was to have all of its frightful exactions met. The tariff that was deemed sufficient for that purpose constitutes the minimum rate of protection contemplated in the bill before you.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] tells us that if we pass this bill it is going to be fraught with all untold horrors; it is going to work injury to invested capital; to destroy established industries; to mar the prospect of commercial development, and to bring ruin generally upon the industrial classes of the country. Why, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as everybody knows, stands here to-day complaining of the Committee on Ways and Means, and says that the bill it has produced is a confession of incapacity to handle the intricate subject of the tariff.

Yet, sir, that gentleman stood here in the last Congress advocating at its every stage, supporting in every shape possible what can only be described as a tariff abortion in the shape of the Tariff Commission bill. He supported the Committee on Ways and Means in the last Congress when it farmed out its work of tariff revision, farmed it out to a commission, who by their own works, upon the united testimony of the President of the United States, embodied in his messages, upon the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the testimony of the other side of this Chamber, and upon the evidence of all men, proved itself to be a most consummate failure.

Yet he would ask us to accept him as a safe counselor and a trustworthy leader upon the question of the tariff. Hardly so. That gentleman has changed his own opinion upon the subject of tariff legislation, and that quite recently. I find that in 1882, with this surplus revenue and this burden of taxation staring him in the face, he made a speech in this House in which he used the following language:

The existing overflowing Treasury brings a demand for a reduction of the tariff and internal-revenue taxation.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to say that I will print that speech in connection with the one of to-day.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And I will print that part of it, for it answers my purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. I would be glad to have the gentleman print the whole of it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, we find the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not want any reduction of tariff taxation. Ay, more, he has gone further, and illustrating that aggressive nature for which he is justly proverbial, he protests against even a whisper in the direction of an agitation of the tariff. If it was necessary to combat the surplus revenue in 1882 by the reduction of tariff taxation, tell me why it is not more necessary now? You heard him say that if you would abolish the internal-revenue system of taxation, there would be no surplus of revenue that would amount to anything. I ask you, sir, in common candor, to tell me how close did that avowal approximate to a confession that the war now waged upon the internal-revenue system of taxation is for the single and ill-disguised purpose of maintaining high protective-tariff rates?

I was sorry that the gentleman made at least one blunder as to fact. He told us we were insisting upon free trade and wanted to drive this Government back to the policy of the old Confederation—a resort to direct taxation. I was amazed at the gentleman's lack of familiarity with the early history of his country. The old Confederation never had any taxing power. The old Confederation never claimed any taxing power. The old Confederation never did, by tariff or direct taxation, undertake to raise a dollar for its maintenance or its support. It was a "free-love" affair. It received voluntary contributions from the States, but admitted that it stood shorn of all power either to lay a tax or enforce its collection.

But, sir, we have various phases presented in this discussion. My friend from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] tells us that the issue is made here now for incidental protection upon the one side, and absolute free trade upon the other.

Mr. FINDLAY. I said this bill was the beginning.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is neither the beginning nor will it be the end.

Mr. FINDLAY. I do not think it will be the end.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I claim that I have a right to go to the majority, not the minority of the opposition to this bill, when I seek for a declaration of their purposes. I choose rather to take the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], a distinguished member of the Committee on Ways and Means. He has forced the issue; he has not allowed us to shape it or frame it. He told you on this floor the other day that the issue was made; that it was protection for the sake of protection.

Gentlemen, we ask you what is it you mean by your opposition to the bill? Is it revenue that you want? If so, we tell you to take it. Take all you need. Take until you yourselves admit that you have all that you can use. Take what the necessities of the Government demand, but when you have obtained that say "halt" to the tax-gatherer, for whenever you go one inch beyond that limit the tax-gatherer's hand becomes a robber's hand. [Applause.]

What is your estimate of the people with whom you are dealing? Do you think the people will think you sincere when you tell them that a tariff is a tax, and in the same breath assure them the laying of that tax upon a certain article will cheapen its cost to the man who buys and consumes it? What is your estimate of popular intelligence, if you expect the people to believe you, when you tell them that your policy is either fair or friendly to the laborer while you force him to sell the coinage of his sweat in the cheapest market known among men, the free-trade market of the world, and at the same time compel him to buy that upon which he lives in the dearest market that either human or devilish ingenuity can construct through the agency of protective arbitrary tariff laws like this?

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the victims of this deception so long practiced will continue to endure it. The time will come when they will grow weary. The time, I believe, is not far distant when they will repudiate such bald political hypocrisy and refuse to submit to such political jugglery.

The people are aroused for the first time in our lives upon this tariff issue. It is the issue in American politics to-day. It will not down. Cunning and insincerity have for years been able to evade the issue. It can not be longer deferred. Parties are ranging themselves upon this line, and whether we will or no we must fight the battle out in that direction. I do not care what gentlemen may say about free trade and the ultimate purposes of the party here. That is not the issue. It is not the question presented. Their effort is not sincere when they seek to evade it through such a subterfuge. There is no man proposing free trade. I do not know a man who wants to destroy a single dollar of invested capital. I do not know a man who wants to cripple a single established industry. I do not know a man who wants to put under the ban of proscription the great manufacturing interest of this country. For my part I want to see that interest put upon a normal and natural footing. I want to see it kept there, and I want to see it promoted and expanded, moving on and keeping pace with other honest industrial interests of the land. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, protection is an enemy to barter and trade. Its only purpose is to choke those channels which commerce has fashioned and opened for itself. The commerce of this country or any other can not be carried on with a foreign nation upon a gold and silver basis. There is not coin enough among the civilized nations of the earth as a basis of transaction to support the trade of this country or England for a single twelvemonth. It can only be conducted on the basis of exchange of commodities.

What fairness is there, what honesty is there in your telling the American laborer he can take the product of his toil and sell it in open market, but he shall not receive in exchange the wares, goods, or merchandise he may need of him with whom he traffics? You force him to sell abroad, you oblige him to buy at home, and the only reason you can assign is that the home manufacturer must needs be cared for. This is class legislation, and no one can successfully deny it. You tell him after he has carried the productions of this soil into the open markets of the world and sold them there in competition with this pauper labor, as you are pleased to call it—you tell him he must return home and make his purchases here in the protected market for the benefit of your pampered and favored classes. He answers that this is not fair; that if you have forced him to sell what he had to dispose of in open market and in competition, why not give him the right to buy upon the same terms, if it is barter and trade he is engaged in.

We all know, Mr. Chairman, that the home demand here will not consume the produce of our soil. You tell us 90 per cent. is consumed by our own people and 10 per cent. goes abroad. I will not say that is not true; I will content myself by saying that it is a questionable if not an exaggerated calculation. But suppose it to be true. That surplus which is sold in the foreign market determines the price of the commodity. It determines it at home and abroad. Then it can not be fair to put the determination of the product of the farmer in the hands of the foreign nation and put the determination of the price of commodities upon which he lives in the hands of the protected class.

But you tell me you are going to furnish him a home market in which he can get what supplies he needs, and he answers and tells you, yes, but he says if the home supply of manufactured goods shall not equal the home demand, then you compel him to pay tribute to the manufacturer of exactly the difference between his demand and the price at which the foreign article can be had.

But suppose on the other hand the home supply of manufactured goods exceeds the home demand, what then? If the home supply is in excess of the home demand what follows? An overstocked market and a shrinkage of value, and either a diminution of the amount of manufacturing labor employed or a reduction of the wages of the laborer. In this case the producer and the consumer are plundered, and in the second the laborer is robbed, but in both the manufacturer is safe and he alone rises superior to the exigency.

But, sir, that is not all. I say the protective tariff policy of this country is baneful in its results for many reasons, that it tends to concentrate capital in a particular section and in the hands of a particular class. If you deny it, I ask you to look at the tables. I will not detain this House with reading, but will print them with these remarks. Tell me, if you please, what was it unless it was protection that brought about the results shown by these tabulated statements furnished me within the last ten days from the Treasury Department? Of thirty-eight States in this Union nine are, par excellence, protected; I allude to the six New England, and New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.

I find in 1850 they had a total population of 8,626,851 people. In 1860 the same States had 10,500,000; in 1870 this had increased to 12,200,000, while in 1880 it was 14,500,000. All the States of this Union had 23,000,000 in 1850, 31,000,000 in 1860, 38,000,000 in 1870, and 50,000,000 of population in 1880. Of this total population the nine States to which I have alluded had the proportion that I have stated before. But mark you here: their percentage of population in 1850 was 37 per cent. of the total. From 1850 to 1860 the percentage went down from 37 to 33 per cent.; from 1860 to 1870 they changed from 33 to 31 per cent., and from 1870 to 1880 it went still further down, and stands to-day at 28. How is it, Mr. Chairman, with their percentage of wealth or their per capita fund? The per capita wealth of these nine States was $360 in 1850. In 1860 it was $527, being a fair increase for that period. But from 1860 to 1870 under a protective tariff it jumped from $527 to $1,243 per head, and went from 1870 to 1880 and stands to-day at $1,353 per head. How was the per capita with the other twenty-nine States of the Union during the same period? I find that in 1850 the per capita of the other States was $274. In 1860 it was $506. Mark you, it had nearly doubled in that revenue-tariff decade. But from $506, in 1860, it only went to $562 in 1870, and stands at $673 to-day.

What was it, now, that brought this unnatural accumulation of wealth with a constantly decreasing percentage of population? How did the largest and most thoroughly developed of all the States in the Union manage to gather together this unnatural increase of accumulated wealth unless it was the direct result of the protective-tariff system of which they are the special beneficiaries? If there is any other explanation that may be offered I ask any man on this floor to give it to this House. There are the figures, there are the facts; now what is the explanation?

But we are told frequently by the advocates of a protective system that all they want to do is to equalize the wages of American labor with those of foreign countries. I answer and say that that is not a case of sincere explanation. That is not what they mean to do; nor, Mr. Chairman, is it the effect of what they undertake to do.

I hold in my hand, and I will print it here that all may see it, a list as long as this [indicating], covering the most important textile fabrics of the country in which the protective duties imposed upon them amount absolutely to more than all you have paid for the labor in the production of the goods yourselves at home. It is not to equalize labor, then, when you demand more protection than you pay for labor entering into the commodities that you manufacture. There can be neither justice nor honesty in the claim.

The result of the prohibition of the export of cotton by the war, and the cramping, strangling consequences of your protective policy since the war, did this. The increase in our production of cotton from 1850 to 1860, under a revenue tariff, was 118 per cent., while from 1860 to 1880, under your protective policy, that increase was but 6 per cent. Prior to 1860 the culture of cotton was the sole employment of the planter, because with unobstructed trade with Great Britain it was more remunerative than any other crop or product. Then the cotton-planter purchased all his breadstuffs, his pork, his mules, horses, and provender from the people of the Northwest. He was content to give all his land, his labor, and his efforts to the production of his own peculiar staple, while furnishing this great home market to his neighbors of the Northwest. Your policy has transformed the planter into the rival instead of the customer of his Northwestern neighbor, and he is now raising his own corn and pork and mules, and this home market has been destroyed. These figures will not be questioned, for they are taken from the highest official authority of the British Empire. This is a part of the work of protection.

But, sir, objection is made to this as a tariff bill upon the ground that it fails to correct existing abuses and irregularities in the present tariff system. That does not come well from your side of this Chamber. You made this tariff bill yourselves, with the assent of some few who sit upon this side of the House. You made this tariff bill and you took eight months in which to perfect it, and you employed at a heavy expense a lot of men better known for their capacity in politics during the early part of this or the latter part of the last century than they are at present. You made it as it is, and now refuse to vote for a reduction of taxation because you say that we have not corrected the abuses and inequalities in that production.

My answer to that argument is that if the present bill does not correct the abuses that exist it makes them no worse and it abates them to a certain degree. It cuts down one-fifth of the enormous exactions imposed upon our people. As a tariff bill you seek to quarrel with it. As a tax-reduction bill you are left without any rational reason to assign or objection to it. You can not do it, and in sheer desperation you say that instead of reducing the surplus revenues of the Government the effect will be to increase them. Why, what do you mean by that? You say you are afraid to reduce the taxes $30,000,000 for fear of adding to the Federal revenues!

Gentlemen, if you have honest, intelligent constituencies behind you I defy you to go and tell them that. Tell them you refuse to reduce the burden of taxation upon them for fear that the Federal Treasury would be flooded with a stream of coin that comes from foreign countries. Go home and tell your people that you vote against the bill that looks to the relief of their burdens of taxation, because you wish to keep from getting more money into the people's Treasury, and therefore wrench more money out of the people's pockets. The answer of those who support the protection minority report as an argument for not supporting this bill upon the floor will be that the bill reduces the revenues thirty millions only, but it will reduce taxation under the present tariff system $125,000,000 a year.

I trust that while it does that and works such a benefaction it will increase your revenues a hundred millions annually. If that should be the result, as you foretell, then with caution and with prudence we will proceed in our effort to obtain tax reduction until we will bring the revenues of this Government and its taxing limit to exactly the demands for administration and for maintenance. There is no free trade in this fight. It is a proposition to limit the taxation of this people to the demands of this Government. He who refuses to stand by it finds new ground on which to plant himself, unknown till within the last twelve months either to Democrats or to Republicans.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not the question submitted for determination here to-day. It is not whether this bill shall become a law so far as the action of this House is concerned. The first vote that you are to be called upon to give is to determine whether this bill shall be considered up to a point where it may be amended and perfected if it be not perfect. The man who votes to strike the enacting clause out of this measure to-day declares to his people and the country that he is not willing to have the tariff revised, taxation reduced, or surplus revenues abated. [Applause.] The man who votes to strike the enacting clause out of this bill admits to the country and the world that he dare not face the issue either of a revision of the tariff or a reduction of taxation even on the terms which he himself may offer. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we are receiving to-day a hundred millions of money more than the Government's requirements now call for. It is useless for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to undertake to tell this House that the surplus of revenue this year will be $60,000,000. He knows that the estimate is made by the officials of a party that stand almost in solid phalanx protesting against the passage of the bill for whose defeat this stratagem is paraded here. There are a hundred millions and more of surplus revenue; two hundred and sixty millions of bonds subject to call, none of them being called. With that surplus in your Treasury you will decree here to-day if you carry your motion to strike out the enacting clause that that burden must remain, when neither justification, palliation, nor excuse can be offered for its continuance.

Now, sir, if you shall defeat this bill by this summary process, I wish to appeal to every man, whether he sits upon this side or the other, that there shall be a frank and candid statement of the issue made; that the people shall understand, without any guise or gauze being thrown over the question, that this measure was not either an initial step in the direction of free trade nor a demand that went beyond the single proposition stated—that it was an effort at a reduction of useless taxation and an abatement of a redundant revenue. I do not know, sir, what the fate of this bill is to be. I say if it is a good bill it should be passed; if it is a bad bill it should be amended and perfected. And no excuse can be offered for this House if it refuses and withholds that effort.

I say, sir, the issue is made up. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] upon this floor on the 18th of April declared:

> Both parties should clearly and boldly assert their positions. Let the people be no longer deceived by meaningless and deceptive platforms. Let now the protective feature of the tariff be submitted to the people in the next election. If after a fair and full discussion they desire to eliminate from the tariff laws the element of protection for protection, let them assume the responsibility, choose between the two systems, and accept the consequences.

That gentleman has a right to speak for his party. He is among its ablest advocates. He is among its most honored exponents. He stands pre-eminently high and worthily respected. Protection for protection is his battle cry. That is the ground upon which he throws his gauge of battle. And I answer we can not lift it soon enough. Let the issue come. Let the great national contest before us be inaugurated upon the ground of his own selection. Let the one party go with its banners blazoned to the field "tariff for tribute" and we will carry upon ours "tariff for revenue." [Applause.] Let that be the issue. We want no better.

If it were possible for men to rise above the ruts of party, if it were competent for us by an honest appeal to lift them above the bias of the partisan, I would make a final appeal to all, no matter upon which side of this Chamber they may sit, to agree at least to this, to lighten the burdens of taxation in proportion and to the exact extent of the demands of the Government and make our party divisions on some other ground. But for party's sake I welcome the contest where Massachusetts pitches it. I like to have it here and want to see the party lines drawn as sharply and as well defined as possible. You can not make it too clear. The fighting will be made hot enough, and we will appeal to the people.

If this bill shall die in this House or the other, if it shall fail to be crystallized into law, there is nothing left for us to do except to go to the country and another court higher than this. There is another tribunal that is the last resort where the American people will be impaneled as a jury. To them we will take it, and there we will make our appeal for the triumph of a set of principles that have been battled for for nearly a hundred years; principles that for more than half of its existence have shaped and guided the destinies of this great Government; principles whose reacceptance by the American people accounts for the ponderous majority that sits about me.

We will go there and the advocates of these principles and the defenders of this faith are ready for the fray. Armed in a cause that we know to be just, proud of its history and proud of its hopes, remembering the many victories with which it has blazoned the century that lies behind us, trusting to the fairness of its tenets, recollecting all the glorious traditions that cluster about its past, cheered by the opening promise of its future they await in confidence the issue that is to come.

If I lacked faith in the people I could hold no confidence in popular government. My trust in the ultimate triumphs of my party and the maintenance of our institutions rests deeply rooted in my unwavering and unfaltering faith in the intelligence, patriotism, and the manhood of the American people. The end of this conflict must come, and when it comes the people will stand for the right.

Let us broaden our policies. Let us liberalize our laws. Let us give a free American register to which each citizen may go and under its ægis may fly the American flag from the mast-head of every American-owned vessel, whether built here at home, or upon the Thames, the Mersey, or the Clyde. Do this; repeal your cramping statutes, release your throttling grasp from the strangling trade of a struggling people, rebuild your shattered and wasted merchant marine. And when you have done that, put your country upon the high road of that destiny for which her location, her power, her advantages, and the genius and the manhood of her people have fairly entitled her. Unhand this young commercial giant and leave him to work out his own grand destiny among the nations of the earth, unfettered by the shackles with which folly and selfishness would bind him.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] told us that England for six hundred and fifty years was busily engaged in following the ignis fatuus of protection; that she refused to allow goods to come from foreign countries into her ports, but went there and obtained foreign skilled labor and made it the possession of England. So she did, and groveled on in poverty and comparative obscurity until within the present century she shook off these commercial shackles, declared her broader policy against the dogma of protection, swept the seas, and became the admitted arbiter of universal commerce.

We are doing to-day what he complained of England's doing for so many centuries. Read the testimony of one of the constituents, I believe, of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], a glass manufacturer, who testified before the Committee on Ways and Means that he, too, was busily engaged in importing—what? Foreign skilled labor to run his manufacturing establishments here, thereby forcing and crowding down the wages of the home laborer or displacing him from employment, practicing this philanthropy toward the object of his affections, and proving that he was both a philanthropist and a Christian, but somehow after the fashion of the Pharisee who thanked God that he was not as other men, but blest with better opportunities for plundering the poor and robbing the helpless. [Applause.] I doubt not that the devil will apologize for the presence of such a hypocrite when found in the limits of his dominions. [Laughter.]

These are the advocates of a policy that shall have but one object and one result—to protect the American laborer. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that an appeal from any one would have the effect of influencing a single vote. I wish to protest here and now against the injustice that has been done and the effort that has been made to create the impression or the conviction that there were purposes cherished by us to excommunicate and drive from place or to exile from party any who may differ from us. I have no mission to issue a threat against any man. I hold no power of expulsion. It rests with each and all of us to determine our party affiliations as we will. Any man can vote himself out of the party if he wants to; it is not for another to drive him out. We have no harsh words to employ, no threats to utter.

But upon a measure as broad and as fair as this, as clearly defensible and as easily maintained, having for its object these beneficial results which no man dares to oppose, I do appeal to those who sit around me to let us stand together, having assumed the people's cause, and keep the faith that we plighted to that people. [Applause.]

We told them—these gentlemen know that I utter the truth—we told them in the last Congressional campaign that if we gained power in this country we would revise the tariff laws and make them equitable. We told them we would reduce their taxation that was burdensome and needless. Here in this House at least we hold the power to make that promise good. If we fail, then we will not be worthy to receive and will not receive the indorsement of the people.

It is a solemn contract that we have entered into. The conditions have been complied with at the polls by the sovereigns of this land. The power has been vested in our hands, and let him who would strike down his party, its principles, its measures, and its policies, show by the record upon whose hands that blood is to be found.

As I stand here looking up I see over me the broad and grand and wise motto of my own beloved Commonwealth. I can do no more than to emphasize that motto which is above us in an earnest, an honest, and a final appeal to those of my faith. If we stand united we will conquer; if we are divided disaster may likely come.

I appeal to my party friends to recognize this as a party measure, made so not of its own essence or character, but by the action of the other side. I appeal to them, recognizing it as such, not only to maintain and defend the position which their party has assumed, but to redeem the pledges which were given to the people and which can not be forfeited except by an abandonment of faith.

Mr. Chairman, I will not go further, except to express the hope that in the near future we may be able to bring to this House enough of enlightenment, of patriotism, and progressive intelligence to repudiate the bigotry that disgraces politics in the shape of protection, as bigotry is a disgrace even to the cause of religion. No bigot, whether he be Christian, so called, or politician, ever contributed one atom to the advancement of humanity's cause. The bigotry in connection with this question is driveling in its tendencies; it curbs and restricts the natural course to greatness which commerce would bring. I ask at the hands of this House, with a firm reliance upon a favorable answer, that it shall never be said that a Democratic House in an American Congress refused even to consider a bill that proposed to reduce admitted excessive taxation and to revise to a degree an admittedly bad tariff. [Great applause.]

Mr. KASSON obtained the floor and said: I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] for his courtesy.

Mr. Chairman, in this debate two wholly different questions have been largely considered: First, the general doctrine of protection or the opposing one of free trade; and second, the precise application which should be made of these principles in fixing the rate of duty on the 3,000 articles embraced in our tariff, or in determining what articles shall and what shall not be placed on the free-list. Deferring a discussion of these doctrines to a future occasion, I now wish simply to restate my position, and to indicate the course I shall take respecting the pending bill, and do so only because I have been misconceived by some gentlemen and misrepresented by others.

Upon the first of these questions I stand to-day as I have always stood, and shall always stand, upon the principles of the Republican party as enunciated in its national platforms, fully believing them not only to be grounded in economic truth, but to be the safest policy for our national guidance, and the most beneficent for all our people. I quote all of them:

1872. And that revenue, except so much as may be derived from the tax upon tobacco and liquors, should be raised by duties upon importations, the details of which should be so adjusted as to aid in securing remunerative wages to labor and to promote the industries, prosperity, and growth of the whole country.

1876. The revenue necessary for current expenditures and the obligations of the public debt must be largely derived from duties upon importations, which, so far as possible, should be adjusted to promote the interests of American labor and advance the prosperity of the whole country.

1880. We reaffirm the belief avowed in 1876 that the duties levied for the purposes of revenue should so discriminate as to favor American labor.

I maintain the doctrine of protection in its truest and fullest sense, and, as it is variously understood, shall specify its outlines. I advocate the principle of levying such a tax upon certain imports as shall, by increasing the price thereof to the consumer, give a greater profit to American than to foreign manufacturers or producers, and so protect American labor, capital, and industry against the cheaper labor, capital, and industry of other nations. I favor a tariff which will, by virtue of this extra profit, secure such a competition between our own manufacturers as shall cause them to divide this extra profit with those whom they employ in the form of better wages, and with the farmer or miner whose products they use in the form of better prices for material, thus securing remunerative wages to American labor in its broad sense; a tariff which will also protect the American people against the cupidity of American manufacturers by maintaining such competition between them as shall insure the lowest reasonable prices to the consumer of the articles they make, and which, while fixing the duty sufficiently high to assure these results, shall not place it so high as to free them from foreign competition and deprive the people of this safeguard against exorbitant profits; one which will promote the prosperity of the whole country by fostering those industries which, after due protection, shall become self-depending and of national value. I advocate such a tariff, on the one hand as against free trade or a tariff for revenue only, or one for revenue with incidental protection; and on the other hand as against a prohibitory tariff, which, by lifting manufacturers above the plane of competition, may give them a monopoly hurtful to the American operative, farmer, miner, and purchaser alike—in other words, a competitive as distinct from a prohibitive tariff, and fully indorse the following words of the late President Garfield, uttered on this floor:

We have seen that one extreme school of economists would place the price of all manufactured articles in the hands of foreign producers by rendering it impossible for our manufacturers to compete with them; while the other extreme school, by making it impossible for the foreigner to sell his competing wares in our market, would leave no check upon the prices which our manufacturers might fix upon their products. I hold, therefore, that a properly adjusted competition between home and foreign products is the best gauge by which to regulate international trade. Duties should be so high that our manufacturers can fairly compete with the foreign product, but not so high as to enable them to drive out the foreign article, enjoy a monopoly of the trade, and regulate the price as they please.

I regret that narrow view which considers industry any one particular form of labor. I object to any theory that treats the industries of the country as they were treated in the last census, when we had one schedule for "agriculture" and another for "industry," as though agriculture were not an industry, as though commerce and trade and transportation were not industries. American industry is labor in any form which gives value to the raw materials or elements of nature, either by extracting them from the earth, the air, or the sea, or by modifying their forms, or transporting them through the channels of trade to the markets of the world, or in any way rendering them better fitted for the use of man. All these are parts of American industry, and deserve the careful and earnest attention of the legislature of the nation. Wherever a ship plows the sea or a plow furrows the field, wherever a mine yields its treasure, wherever a ship or a railroad train carries freight to market, wherever the smoke of the furnace rises or the clang of the loom resounds, even in the lonely garret where the seamstress plies her busy needle, there is industry.

I am for such a protective tariff because it will aid in securing remunerative wages to American labor and increase the industry, prosperity, and growth of the whole country; because it is republican, framed on republican principles, deeply rooted in fertile truths, safeguarded against abuse by rapacious greed, and finally mellowing into that cessation of action which we call ripeness in fruit and which is emblemized by the bronze and golden tints of an autumn forest. I am for it, whether yielding revenue or not, because insuring to our nation the most diversified industry and highest art of which the human mind can become capable or the best genius of civilization unfold; because affording a defense to our own artisans against foreign labor cheapened below the point of common humanity; because insuring to our farmers markets at the barn-door, mills on streams, and the bright light of wife-hood and home in the gloomiest forest; because, in due time, over every sea and in every harbor that commerce visits, flaring out our flag from American topmasts above American hulls filled with American products.

The doctrine of protection is a party doctrine; its principles are held and defended by the Republican party as a party issue. To it the Democratic party, in various degrees, opposes the doctrine of free trade. But the details of a tariff bill never were and never can be made a party issue, because gentlemen will differ according to the interests of their constituents as to the exact application which shall be made of these principles to the thousands of articles which may be included by a tariff. The line of division here to-day is not that between political parties so much as that between the manufacturing and agricultural industries, and everybody on this floor knows it.

The Republican voters of America who really constitute "the party" are living in forty different States, having diverse material interests with different vocations, necessities, and opinions as to the details of economic subjects. They not only may but do and will stand athwart a continent, elbow to elbow, in solid and unified phalanx upon the protective principles of our national platform, without a shade of difference as to their truth and beneficence; and what is more they will elect the next President, which result this debate has fully assured. But they equally may and should exercise the right to discuss and differ as to just what application shall be made of these principles, to what articles, at what rates of duty, and for what period. And so let me persuade some of you gentlemen on this side to preserve the continuity of your faultless raiment and heartily concede to those Republicans living in the district which I represent, who believe that lumber or salt should be placed on the free-list, the same right and liberty which you exercise in believing to the contrary, without questioning the genuineness of their Republicanism, their sense of justice, or their patriotism. A larger proportion of them wore the blue than can be found in any other State. And whether you do this or not, just so long as they shall place me on this floor I will use the best industry and judgment of which I am capable toward ascertaining their interests both as Republicans and Americans, as affected by proposed legislation, and will maintain those interests as I shall believe necessary at any and all personal sacrifice.

If some of you gentlemen on this side who represent manufacturing districts want a party vote, you can have mine the very instant you present a true party issue, and dismiss your Democratic allies led by the distinguished Presidential candidate of the Pennsylvania Democracy. Till then I shall believe that you, though stanch Republicans, are not voting in that character and upon a party issue, but according to the interests of your constituents, as I also shall do; because I just positively know that, however estimable they may be, the gentlemen, from Pennsylvania Mr. RANDALL, from State-rights Mr. EATON, and all the rest of that half-hundred Democrats, are not Republicans, or a bit zealous to promote the interests of the Republican party; on the contrary, "quite the reverse." The bond between you is not a political one, it is the mutuality of industrial interests, and every man man on this floor knows it.

Now, with respect to these details as presented by the bill before us, I hold that the duty on each one of the thousands of articles in our tariff should be determined by its exact merits and surroundings, and am therefore opposed both to the plan of horizontal and of lump reduction. That the recent revision was alike imperfect and inadequate is certain, but scaling down these inequalities 20 per cent. will not remove them. The existing ratios between the manufacturing and producing interests will remain the same. We reduced the duty on wool an average of 10½ per cent., and that on manufactured woolens but 6¼ per cent. I advocate a return to the old ratio.

That the surplus must be reduced is also beyond question. Within thirty months we will have paid all the bonds which can be redeemed except at an exorbitant premium. Then the $100,000,000 surplus will either act as a bonus for public plunder and corruption, or so contract the currency as to beget universal ruin. I favor its reduction by stopping the collection of more money than is needed for a liberal support of the Government and the payment of the interest and principal of the debt at maturity.

I am opposed to the manufacturers' game of abolishing the internal revenues, and especially to its most recent phase, that of abolishing the tax on tobacco and of reducing the whisky tax under the guise of free alcohol for manufacturing purposes. I prefer free lumber to free whisky, free salt to free tobacco, and favor such a reduction of the sugar tax as will still give ample protection to sorghum rather than a reduction of that on national-bank circulation, because preferring to ease the burden of taxation on those who use the former articles instead of on those who use the latter. As between the agricultural industry and the manufacturing, I shall still endeavor to protect the former rather than the latter because being of more importance to our national prosperity and because embracing by far the greater number of our people. For these reasons I voted to consider the Morrison bill, as it afforded the only opportunity we are likely to have this session for revising the tariff, with the intention of proposing as a substitute therefor one placing lumber and salt on the free-list, reducing the tariff on sugar as indicated, and restoring the duty on wool, which amendment I shall make whenever an opportunity occurs. For these same reasons, and until yesterday, I had intended to vote against the motion to strike out the enacting clause, and my reason for changing that purpose is a belief that, owing to the exceeding closeness of the division of the House and to the certainty that the lump process will be followed, the results which I desire can not now be obtained, and because of a fear that any changes which are now likely to be effected will give still further advantages to the manufacturing interests by reductions of the whisky and tobacco revenues rather than to the agricultural interests by free lumber and salt. I shall vote accordingly.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped at the conclusion of the last Congress that both this House and the country would be relieved from further agitation upon the tariff long enough to enable both the House and the country to know what would be the effect of the measure so recently adopted. I feel that in entering upon the debate again at this time, at the very next session following the passage of the present law, we are traveling over beaten ground, and very little can be said to further enlighten either this body or the country upon the great questions at issue. We are to a great extent necessarily thrashing the straw-stack of last year's harvest.

A new bill has been formed and presented before six months had elapsed of the operation of the previous law. This bill was inaugurated under circumstances differing from any which have previously existed. Ordinarily a tariff bill is formed clause by clause under the consideration of a regular committee. This tariff bill, it is an open secret, sprang full-armed from the brain of our Jove of the Ways and Means Committee, or of the Olympian council which surrounded him. We of the minority were not permitted even to share the duties of a nurse of this promising infant when it made its appearance among us. So jealous of the child were its authors, that they allowed no change to be made in its garments, no suggestion to be accepted, but insisted that it should be brought to your baptismal font, Mr. Chairman, without any aid from us, there to receive its baptismal designation of "20 per cent."

I object, sir, to this bill in the first instance because of the twelve schedules affected by its provisions six are aimed at the interests of the agriculture of the country. The proposed reduction strikes a blow in six instances at one or another branch of this great interest, and that at a moment when the advocates of the bill are claiming on this floor that those interests are depressed and need relief.

I object to it, because in one especial particular it touches largely the interests of the Northwest. I have before me a telegram received this morning urging that on account of its effect upon flax and flaxseed this bill should be defeated. It affects injuriously this interest to which Northwestern farmers are to-day turning their attention, as the profits on the wheat crop diminish. That interest is one which needs a continuance of protection during its growth. Recently at the Institute in Boston a new process was disclosed for reducing the flax fiber which now goes to waste to the condition necessary for the manufacture of linen, largely cheapening the process in that particular which has alone disabled us hitherto from successfully introducing the linen industry into the United States and adding it to the profits of our agriculture. At this juncture, when our people are most encouraged to develop on a large scale this branch of industry, when they most need an enlargement of the diversity of agriculture, comes the blow by this bill to inflict greater discouragement than before.

But I object to the bill also because as an administrative law it is simply impossible of administration. Not a member of the Ways and Means Committee can tell the importing merchant to-day what duty he will be obliged to pay on numerous articles in its schedules. A variety of questions must be asked touching every article imported under its provisions, and these questions must be separately investigated. The first is, what did the article cost; next, what is the present duty; and third, what is 80 per cent. of the present duty; fourth, is that above or below the tariff of 1861; fifth, if below, how much will exactly equalize it with that tariff? In the case of cotton an additional question is to be asked: is it above or below 40 per cent. ad valorem? In the case of woolen goods an additional question will be asked: is it above or below 60 per cent.? In the case of metals an additional question will be propounded: is it above or below 50 per cent.?

I challenge the tariffs of the world to produce a legislative enormity, a principle of confusion, equal to that presented by this bill which is now commended to the country. [Applause.] Neither in our history nor in any other has it been required that there shall be a complicated catechism, with numerous catechumens to answer the questions which you propose at the custom-house before a foreign article can be introduced into our markets. In less than six months every importing merchant will clamor at your doors begging you for Heaven's sake to restore the old or any other tariff, that he may be able to get his goods into the country at any rate of duty whatever. I repeat that as an administrative measure this bill is impracticable. It is impossible of administration except with great delays, hinderances, and embarrassments, and an additional corps of custom-house employés far beyond all calculations of the authors of the bill.

But, sir, another objection to the bill which may fairly be offered on both sides of the House to-day is this: It gives to you and me, now legislating for the revenue and for the interests of the country—it gives to you and to me no information as to what the duties are to be on the articles embraced in the schedules. This was so patent to the gentlemen who are its authors that they proposed to remedy it for the information of the House by producing these crowded pages of figures which you see here, attempting and professing to show the present and the proposed rates of duties. But I beg gentlemen not to overlook the introductory note to those statements. They procured from the Treasury an expert, who was consulted during the progress of the construction of this bill, and who desired to be accurate, but could not be. He says at the head of the schedules what his attempt has been, and I call to that the attention of the committee. "It is not claimed," says he, "that the column of estimated receipts and rates under act of March 3, 1883, is more than a proximate exhibit of results; with the changes in both classification and rates made in act of March 3, 1883, an absolute exhibit is not practicable." Yet the committee publish that with their bill as giving trustworthy information to the House and the country as to what the old duties are and the new duties are to be. I assure gentlemen that if they will study, even so far as I have done in the attempt to apprehend the effect of this bill on our rates and revenue, the effects of the 20 per cent. reduction, subject to the various conditions of 40 per cent., 50 per cent., 60 per cent., and of the tariff of 1861, and of the additional ad valorem elements introduced, you will be utterly discouraged. On the arrival of every ship from abroad your accountants at the custom-houses will be thrown into inextricable confusion in their effort to ascertain what the duty is on a large part of the merchandise imported. You declare your wish to remove the hinderances and embarrassments from the foreign trade of the country. Yet you have made a bill here which means at every step almost insurmountable hinderances and embarrassments without precedent in the history of your legislation. The parties most interested in having accurate knowledge of the conditions upon which that foreign trade may be conducted must remain in ignorance of them till their goods are actually passed by the custom-house.

I object to it further because, with the exception of a single clause, it tosses into the lap of Canada and of Europe one-fifth of the duties which now flow into the Treasury of the United States without an equivalent or compensation from those countries which have imposed hinderances and embarrassments on our commerce. With Germany still excluding our meat products under as we believe inaccurate pretensions; with Italy doing the same; with France still resisting our just claims; with Spain embarrassing our commerce with her colonies; with Canadian obstruction, while our executive government is trying to-day to procure from these governments better conditions for our commerce, what do you now propose? At this time of all times you say to them, we give freely into your laps one-fifth of the revenue of the United States and demand nothing in return. To call that statesmanship is to nullify the meaning of the English language. The authors of the bill recognized this rule of reciprocity in the case of coal placed on the free-list, but in that only. They provided that this clause should not take effect until Canada admitted our coal free instead of under a duty as at present. The committee was right in that. Why did you not extend the principle to lumber, on which the duty which Canada now imposes on American lumber is higher than our duty imposed on Canadian lumber? Yet you say to Canada, you may fill our markets; we will permit your lumber to come in free, and you may still by your higher duty shut all American lumber out of Canada. Is there justice in that? Such legislation does not deserve the name of statesmanship. You give away our interests, demanding nothing in return, when for these great concessions of duty you could obtain important advantages to the commercial and industrial people of this country. For that reason, and I commend it to both sides of the House, I demand a new bill instead of going into the details of this, in order that the interests of our country may be protected on more just principles of legislation.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, there are two kinds of protectionists. There are men on this side of the House, and some on that also, who are for protecting Americans and American interests. There are men on that side, I am sorry to say, who are by this bill proposing to protect the interests of Canada and of Europe instead of the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.] I should much prefer—it would be far better than this bill—to act on a report from the Committee on Ways and Means asking our executive government what better conditions could be obtained from foreign countries in respect to the admission of our exports if we would concede 20 per cent. on this schedule, 30 per cent. on that, or 10 per cent. on the other, or if we should put certain articles on the free-list.

Now, sir, we are not to be understood as objecting to all further revision and reduction of the tariff. We do object to that sweeping reduction which professedly ignores the interests of our national industries; which professedly marches to free trade, and which professedly repudiates the principle that we can protect our national interests under our Constitution. We demand that this question shall lie open at least for another session, until a better start can be taken for the care of both the commercial and the productive interests of our country.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have this opportunity of contesting the views of gentlemen on the other side of this House who incline to free trade and who rest their arguments on the unconstitutionality of protection. Your position is that we have no constitutional right to impose a duty for any other purpose than to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government. Am I not right in this statement? You maintain that under our Constitution—not under the confederate, but under our own Constitution—we have no right to impose duties for any other purposes than to get revenues for the support and maintenance of the Government. Is not that your theory? [A pause.] There is no denial of your position. On the other hand there are gentlemen here who rely upon the "general-welfare" clause of the Constitution, and say that under that we may protect our home interests. I go further still, and say that under the clause giving authority for the regulation of foreign commerce you have a distinct, absolute, constitutional right to take care of the American people as against foreign interests. [Applause.]

One of the greatest causes of the Revolution was the continued effort on the part of England to rob us of all our manufacturing facilities. It was the desire of that government to keep us poor in all save raw materials. They prohibited even the erection of slitting-mills in the Colonies, they restrained the manufacturing of hats, and prohibited even the transportation of wool by water; and many other restrictions upon the productive interests of the country were imposed to compel the Colonies to receive all their manufactures from England. I beg to read a statement of historical interest, being some questions and answers of Benjamin Franklin before a parliamentary committee in 1766:

What will be the opinions of the Americans on those resolutions?—

Asserting the right of Great Britain to tax the Colonies.

Answer. They will think them unconstitutional and unjust.

Q. Was it an opinion in America, before 1763, that the Parliament had no right to lay taxes and duties there?

A. I never heard any objection to the right of laying duties to regulate commerce, but a right to lay internal taxes was never thought to lie in Parliament.

Q. On what do you found your opinion that the people of America make any such distinction?

A. I know that whenever the subject has occurred in conversation it has appeared the opinion of every one that we could not be taxed by a parliament where we were not represented. But the payment of duties, laid as regulations of commerce, was never disputed.

You observe here that Franklin, afterward one of the framers of our national Constitution, speaking the "unanimous" voice of the Colonies, as he said, regarded the laying of duties as a power inherent in the authority "to regulate commerce." Imposition of duties is of itself the regulation of commerce by the custom and usage of all nations.

Lord Chatham, a few days after this testimony was given by Mr. Franklin, on the 14th of January, 1766, in his celebrated speech in the house of commons on the right of taxing America, pointed out the same distinction. He said:

There is a plain distinction between taxes levied for the purpose of raising a revenue and duties imposed for the regulation of trade.

Go with me one step further. After the defeat of the British at Saratoga they became convinced that by war this country could not be conquered. Then it was that they passed a bill, under the direction of Lord North, in 1778, yielding the demand of the Colonies, but too late. That bill declared:

It is expedient to declare that the King and Parliament of Great Britain will not impose any duty or tax for the purpose of raising a revenue in the Colonies, except only such duties as may be expedient to impose for the regulation of commerce.

I should be glad to read you what that eminent historian, for whose long-preserved life the whole country is grateful—what Mr. Bancroft says on the occasion of the formation of our present Constitution; and to read from Hildreth's History of the United States what he says. But enough to say that at the close of the war with England, as soon as peace was made, we were deluged with foreign goods, even from the miserable second-hand shops of Dublin and of London; that our people incurred debts they could not pay, and that in a short time they imported thirty million dollars' worth of goods, and could export only $9,000,000; that the country was drained of its specie, and that impoverishment and poverty everywhere prevailed.

It was under these circumstances that our Constitution was framed. It was to secure the regulation of commerce by the imposition of duties that that clause was put into the Constitution. In the light of Franklin's statements, of Chatham's speech, of the British act of Parliament; in the light of the condition of the American Colonies as certified by authenic history, it is an established fact that our fathers understood by the right to regulate commerce with foreign countries the right to regulate it by the imposition of duties. That fact was further established by the first general act passed by the First Congress which met under the American Constitution. In the very title which they gave to this first act imposing duties they declared it to be "for the encouragement and protection of manufactures" in this country. And yet gentlemen say, and my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] said an hour ago, that our constitutional power was limited to raising revenue for the purpose of revenue only, and therefore that there was no right whatever in Congress to impose duties for the regulation of commerce and thus protecting the interests of our own country and of our own people.

Now, sir, in proceeding with my argument, I turn to that offered by the eloquent gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD]. If your right exists, if it has been established in this country from the beginning of the Government to have two objects in view in levying duties, one the raising of revenue and the other the regulation of commerce, then you gentlemen can go with us the next step in the inquiry, whether such duties imposed for the regulation of commerce are beneficial to this country or not. The gentleman from Ohio, in his admirable speech the other day, said:

Subject to the necessities of the Government, every man has the right to sell where he can get the best price for what he has produced and buy where he can buy most cheaply.

He treats our Government and our people as two independent bodies; the Government on one side, the people on the other; the Government to take money out of their pockets and the people to submit without benefits in return. The Government may tax to fill its own coffers, but it can pass no legislation to refill the empty pockets of the people. The Government may take from the people, but it can give nothing to the people in return. I dissent by the width of the heaven from the earth from that proposition There are no two adverse sides in this country as Government and people. The people are in the Government and the Government is in the people, thank God! [Applause.]

What the people have a right to do for the Government the Government has a right to do for the people within the limits of the Constitution. The Government is not a power of exaction alone. It is a power of protection also to the interests of the American people. It has been for most of its existence a power of blessing; it ought still to be a power of blessing in all its years to come. When, if ever, the theory offered by the gentleman from Ohio shall be established by the laws of the land, and the Government exhausts without protecting in return, that moment will the people find an opportunity to choose a different government, and one which can bless as well as burden the citizens who are subject to its laws.

Sir, I am reminded of what John Quincy Adams, as a member of the minority of the Committee on Manufactures, said in 1833:

It has been said there is no philosophic falsehood so absurd but it has been maintained by some sublime philosopher. Surely there is no invention so senseless, no fiction so baseless or so base but it has been maintained by some learned, intelligent, amiable, and virtuous but exasperated and bewildered statesman.

It may be said here that in the course of this debate there is no economic theory so baseless, no free-trade sophism so absurd, that some "exasperated and bewildered statesman" of that flock has not accepted it and advocated it on this floor. [Laughter and applause.]

There is on the other side of the water a sort of religious meteor, "an exasperated and bewildered" fanatic, who has appeared in the deserts of Africa, and the whole world has become familiar with the name of El Mahdi, the false prophet. He preaches a new doctrine, and insists that his followers shall accept and circulate it through the world. Are there not El Mahdis in America? I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the El Mahdis on this floor, the false prophets of free trade, surpass in the extraordinary character of their teachings and in the extraordinary abundance of their prophecies the original El Mahdi of the Soudan. [Applause.]

Let me refer to some of these teachings and prophecies. They say that protection creates monopolies, gives a bounty to individuals, enhances prices by the amount of the duty, is robbery and oppression of labor, obstructs trade, has robbed America of half the markets of the world, and impoverishes the country. In the fervor of his eloquence my honored friend from Ohio [Mr. HURD] said the other day that "the fruits of protection in America are want, penury, and starvation." So teach our El Mahdis.

I wish to examine these teachings. How does protection create monopolies? Must you assail not only the laws of your country, its interests, and its history, but must you assail even the standard dictionaries of Webster and of Worcester in their definition of monopoly? A monopoly, they tell you, is that which one man or one set of men alone can do or possess. It is a privilege confined to one from which others are excluded. Now, where is your American industry which is not open under our legislation, and on equal terms, to rich and poor, to high and low, and even to the foreigner who comes upon our soil? Where is the element of monopoly in a system which creates conditions for increasing rivalry and competition? Where is your monopoly in a system under which where ten manufacturing establishments existed years ago ten hundred exist now to supply the wants of the country? Where, I repeat, is the monopoly in a system of protection which enormously augments competition? The only monopoly that threatens to be created is the British monopoly, gentlemen, that you propose to foster by this bill and its sequences. You say this is the first step in the progress toward free trade. I speak now of all the three gentlemen, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON], the gentleman from Ohio whose speech was most loudly applauded [Mr. HURD], and the gentleman from Kentucky who last spoke [Mr. BLACKBURN]. I assume that they substantially concur. If I am incorrect let me be corrected now, that I may make the proper distinction. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] declared this to be the first step, and that you are going on with reductions—how much? Ten per cent., 20 per cent., 30 per cent., or 50 per cent.; the country knows nothing of the result at which you will ultimately arrive. If you succeed and by accident or design reach that point where any one of the industries of this country is substantially broken down and its doors closed, then will you arrive at the establishment of a monopoly, and that monopoly in Canada, in England, or in Europe, and not in this country. [Applause.] So long as you foster American production and enable it to grow, so far you increase that competition which destroys monopoly.

Is it a bounty to individuals? I have had occasion heretofore to implore this House to recognize the fact that for some reason or other the old principle of patriotism is decaying in this land. I repeat to-day that this free-trade argument on the other side shows that the element of American patriotism has somehow disappeared from too many of the Democratic breasts in public life. Why was this protective principle established? Why was it introduced in the first act of the First Congress? Why was it enlarged in 1816 with an addition of 42 per cent. of duties at a single jump? Why was it further continued in 1824? Why was it still further continued in 1828? Why was it again perpetuated in the bill of 1832? It was so perpetuated because our patriotic fathers of both parties knew that no nation in the world could be independent if it did not have the means of self-support both in peace and in war. [Great applause.]

We are of that kind of protectionists to-day. It is not bounty to individuals; it is bounty to the country of our birth. It is not because a factory is in my district or a mine in yours that we are protectionists. I am a protectionist because my country can not live in the presence of the great powers of the world, liable to war on land and to disaster by sea, without she has in her power, within her grasp, the means of clothing her people, of feeding her people, of defending her people, summer and winter, in peace and in war. [Renewed applause.]

From the beginning of the Government that has been the principle of protection. It is to make our people independent, and you can trace it step by step before the Revolution, after the Revolution began, after the peace, in the formation of the Constitution, and in the laws passed under the Constitution. We stand here to-day supported, I regret to say, by only a small minority on that side of the House; we stand here upon the platform of our fathers, both Democratic and Whig. The Democratic majority of this House in this latter time has left that platform, has introduced a new interpretation of the American Constitution, which denies the right to protect our own people. The gentleman from Kentucky, in his speech just made, has attempted to support that interpretation by pointing above us to that coat-of-arms of Kentucky, with its motto "United we stand, divided we fall." I reclaim that motto given to Kentucky by Henry Clay himself, the constant supporter of the American protective system. [Great applause.]

It was Henry Clay who forty years ago uttered words in the debate which preceded that fatal law of 1833 which we are now asked to re-enact in principle—words full of warning for us to-day. Speaking of the probable fall of the protective policy in the then condition of parties in Congress, he said: "The fall of that policy would be productive of consequences calamitous indeed." I ask the Clerk to read the passages I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

But in my opinion, sir, the sudden repeal of the tariff policy would bring ruin and destruction on the whole people of this country. There is no evil, in my opinion, equal to the consequences which would result from such a catastrophe. * * * And what is the just complaint, on the other hand, of those who support the tariff? It is that the policy of the Government is vacillating and uncertain, and that there is no stability in our legislation. Before one set of books are fairly opened it becomes necessary to close them and to open a new set. Before a law can be tested by experiment another is passed. Before the present law has gone into operation, before it is yet nine months old, passed as it was under circumstances of extraordinary deliberation, the fruit of nine months' labor; before we know anything of its experimental effects, and even before it commences its operations, we are required to repeal it.

Mr. KASSON. Thus you find that Kentucky then was of a different opinion from Kentucky to-day. And I would wrest back from the hands of my eloquent friend the motto which he misappropriates in aid of free trade and apply it to the holy cause of American labor and home interests. [Applause.] Here and now I beg to say to the protection members of that side of the House, "United we stand, divided we fall," and our country falls with us. Acting on the principle of that motto we shall defeat this bill and continue the prosperity of our country. [Applause.]

I ask you to mark the similarity of conditions in 1833 and now. The country was prosperous then; it is prosperous now. After 20 per cent. reduction under that law was effected the ruin and all the evils which Mr. Clay predicted fell upon our unhappy country in 1837. You propose now to break down the policy, beginning with the same reduction of 20 per cent. We have not had one year's test of the existing law; and you propose to sweep it away and introduce this conflicting and impossible system of assessing one-fifth less duties. Your effort, if successful, will be followed by like disastrous consequences. The law of 1833 provided that of the existing duties all were to be taken off down to 20 per cent. in nine and a half years. This change was effected by a reduction of 10 per cent. in January, 1834, 10 per cent. in 1836, 10 per cent. in 1838, 10 per cent. in 1840, half the residue in January, 1842, and the other half in July, 1842.

Now, you are proposing a reduction of 20 per cent. only; but you have avowed by the utterances of your leaders that you intend to go on further hereafter; that this is only the first step. And you propose to go on in this way without notifying the years in which you will do it. The law of 1833 provided for a gradual reduction, and it gave ten months' notice before it was to go into effect. It was passed March 2, 1832, and was not to take effect until January, 1834. By this bill you provide for no notice at all. It is to go into effect on the 1st of July next, though if it should pass it can not pass before the 30th of June. You are reckless in your dealing with the interests of the country. Aiming at free trade you have no motive to consider the interests of the country. Your principle does not admit it. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means said in his speech that if the bill were to be formed upon the principle of protecting American industry, then the people should turn it over into the hands of the friends of protection. I accept that declaration, and I wait for that time speedily to come when the people will turn this question over into the hands of the friends of protection, whose blows they would rather receive than the dangerous caresses which the enemies of their industry are offering them in their false teachings and false prophecies.

I pass without special comment the revival of our industries and of popular prosperity after the restoration of a protective tariff in 1842. I also pass without comment the recurrence of disaster and distress in 1857, after the free-trade politicians had again reduced the tariff to mere revenue rates, without discriminating for protection. It is enough to say that the people turned out of power in 1860, as they did in 1840, the reckless party which persistently ignored the rights of American industry and labor. Since 1861 your tariff has been continuously and unquestionably protective, and it has been one continuous history of prosperity, with the exception of 1873, when the whole world suffered from panic, from which our country, still under the protective policy, was the first to recover.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have presented this sketch of the period of 1833–'37 to show the effect of a persistent horizontal reduction. We then had a surplus of revenue to be got rid of. We have a surplus of revenue, it is claimed, now to be got rid of. Then it was done by a gradual flat reduction of duties, as you propose to do it now by horizontal gradation of duties. It was then accomplished, and emptied the Treasury most effectually. I believe if accomplished now it will empty the Treasury far beyond your desire. It emptied the pockets of the people then, and brought them to ruin, absolute and universal ruin. I believe the same result, because of the same causes and conditions, will follow if adopted now.

Then it was effected by the votes of a nearly solid South, headed by South Carolina. In 1832, at the very time of the consideration of this question, that State was organizing troops to resist the power of the United States. Then it was that South Carolina passed an act declaring that the revenue laws of the United States should not be executed in South Carolina, and were null and void. The South stood together for free trade; and while, thank God, South Carolina proposes no such extreme measure now, I am sorry to observe that the South does stand to-day largely for repeating the ruinous process of 1833. They are demanding a reduction of the duties now with far less reason than they demanded it then, because the very industries which have grown prosperous under the protective system have since that time been largely developed in the Southern States. On the testimony of their own citizens prosperity is spreading over the entire South as it has never spread before. Mines, forges, furnaces, factories, railroads have largely increased, and manufactures have been extraordinarily developed in Northern Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, West Virginia, and Virginia. Farms and real estate in their neighborhood have shared the general advance. The home consumption of cotton has increased from 20 per cent. in 1860 to over 30 per cent in 1883. In a word, all the elements of national development have advanced as rapidly in the South as in the North. Prosperity has not only dawned upon them, but it beams with the light of the midday sun all over the regions of the South. [Applause.]

Sir, I repeat my regret that we should find the South still lingering in the bondage of the old South Carolina interpretation of the Constitution, and still declaring that free trade must be forced upon the prosperous North, because in some States they have not yet reached that degree of prosperity which prevails in the Northern States of the Union, with their diversified industries.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] appealed to the statistics of the different States of the Union to show that there was larger per capita of wealth in the manufacturing States than in the States from which manufactures were largely absent. Why, then, does he not encourage in the South the growing manufactures, which bring increase of wealth, instead of depriving the prosperous States of the very elements of their prosperity. Instead of diminishing the wealth of others I would invoke that gentleman to encourage the introduction into his own and other States of diversified industries, bring among his own people these new elements of wealth, and then he will find that the per capita of wealth amongst them will grow as rapidly as it is growing anywhere else in the Union. [Applause.]

Time fails me, Mr. Chairman, to speak at length of the effects of protection on the prosperous history of my country. Is it true that the system is one of robbery and of oppression? Has it obstructed trade; has it robbed America of half the markets of the world; has it impoverished the country?

In these two decades of protection the population of the country has risen from 31,000,000 to 51,000,000. It has not, then, embarrassed the unprecedented growth of the population of the country. The immigration, chiefly of laborers, has risen from 150,000 in 1860 to 593,000 in 1880. It has not, then, been opposed to the interests of labor, for labor migrates from worse to better, and not from better to worse. The value of farms has risen from $320,000,000 to $10,197,000,000. The annual value of their products has risen from $1,600,000,000 to $3,600,000,000, according to Mr. Dodge, the statistician of agriculture. It has not then impoverished or even retarded the farming interests.

Our production of manufactures has risen from $1,885,000,000 to $5,369,000,000. Our exports of domestic manufactures have risen from $45,000,000 to $111,000,000. Our whole domestic exports have advanced from $373,000,000 to $825,000,000. Our total imports have advanced from $362,000,000 to $751,000,000. It has not, then, obstructed but promoted trade, with the balances in our favor. The total wealth of the United States has increased by the census from $16,000,000,000 to $43,000,000,000. Its annual increase is put by a free-trade economist at $825,000,000—more than double that of any other nation in the world.

Yet El Mahdi by the mouth of one of his prophets says that "the fruits of protection in America are want, penury, and starvation," and lifts up before us "the protection giant of robbery and oppression."

I turn now to the false prophecies of free trade. It is directly declared that if you would introduce free trade into the United States all the markets of the world will then be opened to us in generous rivalry. My eloquent friend from Ohio promises us, in the exuberance of his rhetoric, two thousand millions of people who will be waiting for our supplies. These El Mahdis of ours, like the false prophets of antiquity, make up for their deficiency of facts in the past by liberal promises for the future. In this case they enlarge the figures of human history in order to create a population out of their imagination to be supplied by an imaginary condition of free trade in the United States. [Applause.] It is a slight excess in the world's population of only about six hundred millions, including the breechless sons of Africa. [Laughter and applause.]

Sir, after the establishment of free trade are you not subject to the same competition of the whole world? Will not the cheapest still be first sold in the foreign market? Can you sell a bushel of American grain against a bushel of Indian wheat, unless you can furnish it as cheaply as the Indian? Can the manufacturer find a market unless he can sell cheaper than free-trade England? It is self-evident that the elements of production must be as cheap with us as with any other foreign country before we can take away the markets from it. Our manufacturing plant has cost more, our rate of interest is higher, our labor costs higher wages, and you will still, even under absolute free trade, have these embarrassments to contend with before you can drive foreign countries from any market of the round world which they now possess. Your proposition would simply cost us our home market by turning it over to foreigners, without enabling our people to manufacture on equal conditions with those which foreigners now enjoy. Even wheat can be delivered in New York to-day from India as cheaply as it can be delivered in Liverpool, and under the menace of this competition you ask us to take off one-fifth of the duty which saves the wheat market of this country from the surplus of India, with which you have been threatening our farmers in this debate.

Yes, free trade must open up the markets of our own country to the products of all Europe and Asia, or we are told by the gentleman from Ohio that—

> Before January next the price of wheat will be so low that it will not pay the cost of production, and the corn raised on the Western prairies will be burned again for fuel, as was the case years ago. When that time arrives the farmers will be beggars in the midst of their own plenty and paupers by the side of their own golden gathered sheaves.

And the Democrats burst out with applause as he made that prediction of misfortune to our farmers. Sir, the census shows that there has been an increase beyond all precedent in value of all of the products of the farmers of this country during this period of protection. Even wheat has advanced on the average 15 per cent. in price. From 1847 to 1861 the average was 1.48\frac{1}{15}$ per bushel in New York; from 1863 to 1877 the average was 1.69\frac{14}{15}$. Everything produced on the farm has on the average increased in value throughout the length and breadth of the land under the principle of protection. Meanwhile the manufactures which our farmers buy have greatly fallen in price. Our American system has produced an unexampled aggregation of wealth and distributed it among our people of all classes; it has saved labor from pauperism and made the United States the admiration of the world. In this condition of our country the eloquent gentleman from Ohio is obliged to invoke dumb and inanimate nature to support his theories. Every ripple of the water upon the seashore, he says, is an invitation to free trade, and every stormy wave a denunciation of our existing policy. He declares that—

The culture and the chivalry of the nation, long anxious for this hour, are ready to take the lead.

I recall his eyes, Mr. Chairman, from the sandy shores and dreary wastes of ocean and from the beggared homes of labor abroad. Let him look upon our farms, into our contented villages and thriving towns, and into the school-houses of town and country, where the children of toil and of wealth sit side by side in preparation to become sovereign citizens of a great and free Republic. Every murmur of instruction that rises from a myriad of these school-houses in valley and on hilltop is an invitation to maintain our system of home industry and good wages which has made our people happy and our nation great. [Applause.]

And I point him, sir, to the million of laborers who at eventide come from the caves of the earth, where they produce the infinite value of ore and coal, both more precious than gold, and to the other million who come forth with the declining sun from the doors of blazing furnace and forge and from countless factories in mountain valleys and on the plains. These all unite against the degradation of wages and of labor involved in free trade. Their concentrated voice, more powerful than the roar of the inanimate billow, is lifted up in denunciation of the reckless Democratic and free-trade policy which you seek to inaugurate to-day. [Applause.] "The culture and the chivalry" may be ready for it, but the enterprise and the labor which have made your country prosperous and powerful protest against it.

Ah, says El Mahdi, away with protection! It enriches you, but away with it! Every day's sun, according to your own prophet Mulhall, "sees an addition of two and a half million dollars to the accumulated wealth of the Republic, which is equal to one-third of the daily accumulations of mankind." Still away with it! But we will not throw away this giant's shield of our national defense, under whose shelter, with God's blessing, we have reached the foremost rank of the nations of the world. We will fight the battle out and we will win the victory. All hail to that giant of protection who strews his pathway with gold and plants all its borders with the flowers of popular comfort! [Great applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.]

Mr. STORM. I hope unanimous consent will be given to the gentleman to continue his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. That can not be done by the committee.

Mr. MORRISON. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes of my time.

Mr. KASSON resumed and concluded his speech.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BAGLEY took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Two messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries; who also informed the House that the President had approved joint resolutions and a bill of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 236) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan two hundred flags to the city of Charlotte, N. C., for the celebration of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 240) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Thomas H. Herndon, late a Representative in Congress;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 223) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the mayor of Richmond, Va., a certain amount of flags and bunting for use at a fair; and

An act (H. R. 5966) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln, and to increase the capital stock of the First National Bank of Nashville, Tenn.

THE TARIFF.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, should the motion soon to be made, of which we have notice, prevail, it will cut off all legislation for reduction of taxes proposed by the bill in its present form or as it may be amended. It will be a declaration of this Congress at least that tariff taxes are not too high and ought to be continued. It will mean an appeal from the Congress to the country, and the people will so understand it.

In opening the debate I anticipated and answered, so far as I am capable of answering, most of the objections which have since been urged against the bill.

In his anxiety that the country's wonderful progress shall be credited to his favorite theory of protection, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] who has just spoken forgets the high courage, the inventive genius, and industrious skill of our people, their endless wealth of mine and field, and puts aside the history of his State and country. It is but fourscore years since the Mississippi River marked our western border, and Iowa, the home of his adoption, was part of the dominion or territory of a nation alien to us in language, laws, and civilization. The indomitable spirit of our people, guided by a wise statesmanship which now it is the custom of some to decry, extended our territory—our own country and its institutions—to the other ocean, set his own Iowa in the heart of the Republic, and laid the foundation for much, for most, of the prosperity which the gentleman credits to his pet system of bounties, restrictions, and burdens.

This territory is now the home of 20,000,000 of our people. It may be the home of 250,000,000. Its acquisition postponed for centuries, I trust, that crowded condition which is now the chief misfortune of the inhabitants of the Old World. It was from this territory we took that $700,000,000 which during the existence of the present tariff we have sent abroad to pay balances of exchange against us. In this territory even the poor and landless may find and enjoy their own homes and escape the burdens of the taskmaster. It was from this territory we carved out and gave to the railroads tying together our two great seas 200,000,000 acres of land. Acres less than these in Germany and neighboring nations support a population larger than our own.

Among all the agencies which have contributed to our great material growth the extension and development of railroads rank first, for agriculture, first among our industries, has found its too meager profits not in higher markets, but in lower cost of reaching them.

Protection has not helped to build, but has been a great hinderance to the building of railroads and lower cost of transportation. It will be remembered that two years ago, when the Tariff Commission scheme was under consideration, it was shown upon unquestioned authority that railroads were then being built through Texas and into Mexico upon terms with the Mexican Government which admitted locomotives, rails, and railroad materials free of duty for use south of the Rio Grande, while north we required the payment of high protective duties, and that, as the result of this, the same railroad built at the same cost for labor cost 25 per cent. more in Texas than in Mexico. Upon this basis is it not apparent to all not blind to truth that the vast sums used in building the 80,000 miles of railroad since 1860 with the help of protection would have built 100,000 without such help?

Railroads must be renewed once in twelve years; that is to say, the cost of maintaining them twelve years equals the first cost, and the yearly cost of maintaining and keeping in repair our 120,000 miles is equal to the cost of building 10,000 miles. If we estimate the first cost as low as $20,000 per mile, one-fourth of which is shown to result from so-called protection, it will be seen that this bounty system increases the annual cost of repairing our 120,000 miles of railroad $50,000,000, which sum is an annual tax on the people, charged up to them in the cost of carrying the products of their labor to market. No State in regulating rates and charges on railroads fails to take into account the cost of building and maintaining them. As it taxes the people on their transportation, so this bounty system follows them in all their pursuits and exacts a part of their earnings; for to increase the cost to the producer is to increase the price to the consumer.

Often as it has been shown to be a protective fallacy, it is to-day again repeated that this bounty-taxing policy lessens the cost of commercial and business intercourse on land and sea and of carrying over both; that it has cheapened the cost of fuel, food, clothing, and shelter of the people, added to their comfort, and given them increased abundance. Need I again expose this false claim of those who make it that existing abuses may be continued and again show that all this abundance and plenty results from our ever-growing control over nature's forces. This growth continues not by reason but in spite of tariff-tax restrictions and is not confined to any country. Why it is so may be shown by a most homely illustration, which I do not now use for the first time.

Not forty years ago corn was mostly shelled by hand. An industrious man might then shell as much as five bushels in one day. If he received but 50 cents for his day's work it cost 10 cents to shell a bushel of corn. In the gentleman's State of Iowa last fall I saw men shelling corn and receiving a dollar for a day's work. They were using machinery of most simple structure and shelling corn for 2 cents a bushel. The wages were double, while shelling corn was one-fifth the former cost. But for the protective tax on the machinery and on the cost of living wages would be higher; corn-shelling lower. What is true of shelling corn is true of the cost, and consequently of the price, of making articles for use in our fields, homes, and shops, for most of all that contributes to the health and comfort of the people. It is true of everything that is made largely by or with the help of machinery. Such are the means and the methods by which, in spite of protection's burdens and not with its help, the people enjoy their greatly increased abundance. [Applause.]

By offering bounties we have induced our people to invest in manufactures and to abandon the sea to our chief commercial rivals. Englishmen now take to themselves all the profits of carrying our products to foreign markets. Competing with themselves, they have made greater reductions in transportation on the sea than we have made on land, greater reductions than we have made on anything in our own country. In the lower cost of ocean freights surplus agricultural products have found their profits, and certainly this can not be claimed for protection by its most greedy advocate.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] suggests that reduction in the cost of all manufactured articles resulting from the use of machinery has occurred in and is common to all civilized countries, and I may add, this reduction has occurred here under revenue tariffs, under all tariffs. On this subject Mr. MORRILL said here in 1860, that a comparison of our tariffs, including 1846 and 1857, "will show that we have made more rapid strides in cheapening manufactures, and therefore lessening the necessity of incidental protection, than ever England made herself in any equal period of time."

In his argument for the continuance of existing customs duties the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Judge KELLEY] gave us details of his recent travels abroad and some account of the discontent, and he says the "indescribable sufferings, which the masses of the people of all transatlantic countries feel they can no longer endure." Finding the people in Great Britain in like suffering condition with the people of "all transatlantic countries," some with, others without, the protective system, he, with accustomed protective logic, finds that the people of England, Ireland, and Scotland are suffering because of free trade and for want of a protective tax on their too scanty means of subsistence.

While I am not called upon to defend any commercial system to justify a moderate reduction or partial removal of unnecessary taxes, I will be pardoned the suggestion that an unbiased look at the history of the countries visited by the honorable gentleman could hardly fail to discover to him other causes for the misfortunes of the English people than their lack of that protective system which has not saved neighboring nations from like misfortunes which he found in "all transatlantic countries."

The merits of any governmental policy or bounty system can only be ascertained when tried under like conditions. The effect of Great Britain's commercial policy must be determined by a comparison of that country with other densely populated countries, or by a comparison of England to-day with the England of forty or fifty years ago under a protective policy similar to our own, and to the want of which the gentleman attributes all her woes.

Whatever might be its good or evil effects upon our own country, the condition of the English, Irish, and Scotch people, bad as it still is, has been bettered since the adoption of a freer commercial policy. In a late paper or address of Robert Giffen LL. D., president of the Statistical Society of England, already referred to in this debate, it is shown that the working classes have made such progress in the United Kingdom that in some employments their wages have increased one-half, in some they have doubled, in others they are three times as much, and taken altogether it may be fairly stated that wages are twice as high as they were forty or fifty years ago.

On the same authority it may be correctly said that if the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania had sought anything but suffering he could have ascertained that where there was no national system of education fifty years ago, now nearly all the children of England are in school; he would have found there less crime, less pauperism, the hours of daily labor shortened, the cost of better living cheaper, and as a convincing proof to all but a protectionist that the people are better fed, better clothed, and better housed he could have found the duration of human life extended, the mean (or average) age at which men and women die nearly three years longer where he found nothing but misery and misfortune.

The itinerant humanity of the gentleman from Pennsylvania might find temporary exercise in his own country. There is more of what is called defective population, more suffering, where society is old than where it is new. And so it is with States or nations. Proportioned to population in the comparatively old State of Pennsylvania there are twice as many criminals, twice as many paupers, as in the newer State of Iowa; more persons in Pennsylvania who can not read and who can not write. There are more fools in Pennsylvania in proportion to population. [Laughter.] I mean more idiots and insane people. I do not lay the greater misfortune of this older State to protection. They come to Pennsylvania as they come to all the more densely populated countries where the people are in each other's way; but protection, which is but another name for taxation, aggravates these evils of society.

Gentlemen who attribute our national growth and greater prosperity of the people to the progressive and creative power of taxation forget all the advantages of this newer world of ours, which yields to both capital and labor greater profits than they obtain elsewhere, although labor gets less than its share. The older countries, the miseries of whose people are so often reiterated in behalf of protective taxation, have but one or two acres of land to the person; here we have forty or fifty acres. Do gentlemen wonder, then, that our people produce more and earn more both in wages and profits on their forty acres than "transatlantic" people do on their two acres? As often as I have discussed this subject of protective taxation I have urged as one of its chief objections, if not its greatest wrong, that it resulted in an unjust distribution of the earnings of labor, and enabled those who worked least, or not at all, to profit most from the labor of others. And so much at last seems to be conceded by the ablest advocates of the protective doctrine. In closing his speech on the pending bill the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania points to the necessity of saving "our laboring classes" from "justifiable discontent" by securing to them "a larger proportion of the joint production of labor and capital." This he proposes to accomplish by so increasing protective taxes on our people that they can afford to pay themselves more money for less work.

In my remarks on this bill while discussing the unequal burdens imposed by indirect and protective tariff taxes I said that estimates based on census statistics showed that as many as 18,000,000 of our people do some work and are engaged in what are called in the census returns gainful pursuits; that all that was saved by or all the surplus earnings of the whole went to about two millions of the eighteen, and that the average earnings of the other 16,000,000 did not much exceed $300 per annum and were consumed in the means of daily subsistence; that our boasted accumulations of national and individual wealth go into the hands of one-tenth of our people. These estimates the demure gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] criticises in a manner not the most courteous, but of which I do not complain, for his terms of criticism are courtly courteous compared with the brutal coarseness and shuffling insincerity of the criticisms made here on the bill, its author, and all who favor its adoption by those who professedly favor a modification and reduction of the tariff while striving to prevent such reduction.

The statement questioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts is substantially true. There are more than 4,000,000 persons engaged in manufacturing, mining, and mechanical industries, the hands employed numbering nearly 3,000,000. In the census year 1880 their average wages was $346. At a great public gathering last year in New York city, Mr. Jarrett, president of the labor organization, declared that wages had been reduced 20 per cent. since the census year. The truth of his statement, which has not been questioned, shows annual wages to be $277. With reductions made in the last year, the stoppage of mills, and loss of time, annual wages are less than $277 for hands employed. Classed with those engaged in manufactures are a large number of miners and mechanics, whose average earnings are not much more, and together they do not equal $300, the amount stated by me.

Of the 6,000,000 engaged in trade and transportation, professional and personal service, one-half are laborers or in domestic service, and most of the others are in employments where the compensation is not large. Taken together they are not better paid than those engaged in manufactures.

Of the 8,000,000 in agriculture, the farmers outnumber farm laborers about 1,000,000. The estimated value of all farm products for 1880 given in the census is $2,212,000,000. Divided equally, it leaves to those engaged in agriculture but $289 each. Having challenged the correctness of my statement as to the earnings and savings of the mass of the people, the gentleman from Massachusetts sustains himself by his own assertion that the laboring people have made large deposits in the savings-bank at Lowell. It may be true that such deposits have been made. The census shows it to be the most industrious of all our cities. There are none where so many women and little children toil all the day long. Counting all the men, women, and children, one-half of them are at work.

Lowell is the great seat of the cotton industry, and the wages in 1880 in cotton-mills was 81 cents per day. With the 20 per cent. or more reductions since made, the laboring people who deposit in the Lowell banks earn 61 cents per day; and I now again insist that those who earn but 61 cents per day can only make deposits, as they pay their unequal portion of tariff taxes, by subtracting them from their too scanty means of comfortable living.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] in his speech only a few days since insisted that the value of the agricultural product for 1880 was, in fact, $3,600,000,000, and not $2,212,000,000, as taken by myself and others from the census. This discrepancy or error he claims is because ranche products and meat and maple sugar, &c., are not included in the lower census estimate.

Mr. Dodge, of the Agricultural Bureau, seems to be the author of both estimates. I find a meat product valued at $303,562,413 counted as part of our manufacturing wealth, and it may be that neither estimate of the agricultural product is correct. But supposing the higher estimate to be true, and remembering that agricultural products, like labor, have decreased in value, and allowing a low rate of interest on farms, the cost of fences and fertilizers, and the income of the farming classes falls below $268 each. I do not care to go more into details. But at page 300 of the Agricultural Report for 1882 there is a statement, made by the same Mr. Dodge, showing the income for that year of more than 2,000,000 farmers to be $160 each, and more than 3,000,000 to be $261 each, thus showing the average earnings of 5,042,937 persons engaged in agriculture to be $220 in 1882. Of course there are many engaged in all these industries who earn much more than $300, but there are so many more of the 16,000,000 who are to-day earning less, that the estimate given by me is above the actual earnings.

Remembering that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] and the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] come here session after session, and by vote and speech maintain tariff taxes that money may be put in their purses through their protected business pursuits,

I accept with some qualification their assurances of special care for and sympathy with the workers and planters in the fields of agriculture. From their fields they gather corn as pious men gather godliness, down on their bended knees, because the stalks are so short. [Laughter.] In our fields we reach the ears of corn with the help of a ladder, the stalks are so long. And yet these gentlemen are continually offering us their services in protecting our agriculture by taxing us. In opposing this bill the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] only to-day invoked censure on the internal-revenue system because of its horde of tax-gatherers. Sir, the tax-gatherers in the customs-revenue service outnumber the other by hundreds of thousands. Whoever buys a nail, a hoe, an ax, a yard of cloth, or spool of thread in all the ten thousand stores and shops where merchants sell their wares, meets there the tax-gatherer taking taxes for the Government or bounty for the manufacturer.

Mr. FINDLAY. I have never seen him there.

Mr. MORRISON. You do not work for $300 a year or you would have felt him. [Laughter.]

So much sympathy has been expressed here for men who toil in the field or who toil anywhere that it needs to be accepted with something of caution. In this I have no reference to anything said by the gentleman from Maryland.

In the progress of the remarks lately made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], when he was telling over the advantages of a home market afforded to agriculture by taxing it to support manufactures, I asked him what part of the agricultural product was consumed by those engaged in manfactures? Taking refuge in his usual adroitness, he replied, "All they need."

With greater candor he would have replied, "Less than half as much as we export;" but such frankness would have exposed the home-market fallacy, which is an unkept promise a century old and yet growing away from realization. Do gentlemen who so idly talk of a home market for the products of farms and fields forget that all wheat and corn now grown in the country can be grown in Iowa and the adjoining Territory of Dakota? That Texas alone will grow all the field products now grown in all the States and Territories? Do gentlemen forget that all the cotton consumed in the whole world will grow in the State of Mississippi? These facts are apparently overlooked by gentlemen who are continually promising here to tax agricultural people into a profitable market.

I believe I have already said that the trouble with gentlemen who professedly oppose this bill for making a horizontal reduction do not oppose it because it cuts horizontally, but because it cuts at all. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] finds nothing in the bill which commends it to him, and while commenting on its (to him) objectionable features assumes to find in the bill some confession of incapacity and some evidence of indolence. These are terms near akin to those employed by his Democratic allies and incidental confederates, and therefore I do not complain of his use of them. [Laughter.]

When I inquired of him whether if the form of the bill was so changed as to omit the features criticised by him it would then have his support, he very candidly replied it would not. He had elsewhere said he would not vote for any bill putting anything down, but would vote for a bill putting duties on several articles up. When asked if any cut would receive his support, he declared the 20 per cent. proposed ruinous, because he asserted twenty inches off of a long-legged man would still leave him "stumps," while a like cut would leave a short-legged man no stumps at all. A 1 per cent. horizontal reduction of that stumpy witticism will leave it the shallowest nonsense.

The gentleman feigns ignorance of the fact that the great, oppressive, taxing monster stands with its unequal burdens on legs of unequal length. Does he forget that woolen rags and shoddy and waste wool and rags, not wool but mixed, used in making woolen goods are taxed 10 cents per pound? He remembers that. Does he remember that cloth made of the 10-cent rags is taxed a dollar a pound? Then the question is not whether a horizontal cut is right or wrong as a test between the gentleman and myself. This is the question: Is the tariff too high or too low? Is 10 cents too much on rags and a dollar too much on cloth? [Applause.] When I make the horizontal cut I leave the one at 80 and the other at 8—the same proportion he left to them. [Applause.] If they are not left in right relations the fault is his, not mine.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; you are doing the cutting.

Mr. MORRISON. I did not put 10 cents on rags and a dollar on cloth.

Mr. REED. But you are complaining of inequality, and yet you perpetuate it.

Mr. MORRISON. In addition to some inequality I complain that duties are all too high, and in this bill I propose to make them lower. If I can cut off the ugly tops of these things and others like them you will be the first man to come in and help me to regulate and adjust any inequality. [Laughter and applause.] If I can deprive you of your bounty, your unjust exactions secured to you under the false pretense of protecting labor [cries of "Good!"], you and the gentleman from Ohio will be the first men to come in and say, "Let us equalize." That is what all protectionists will hasten to do. There will be no trouble about equalizing if I can first take from you your bounties. These I am trying to cut off a little, leaving for the present the adjustment made by you and which you still insist is too perfect to be disturbed.

On the authority of some officer in the Treasury my friend the gentleman from Ohio says the bill will be difficult to execute. I call him my friend, for that is what he called me [laughter], and I feel so nearly that, that I am not going to vote to put him out of his seat unless there is a good case against him, for he is one of the best of his kind. [Laughter and applause.] But somebody, an officer in the Treasury, told him that the bill had in it absurdities and would be expensive to administer and execute. Who this officer may be is a protective secret which the gentleman will not disclose. I suppose there is such an officer, because the gentleman from Ohio has said so. If there is, he is doubtless the same description of person as the president of the Tariff Commission, of whom Mr. Delano, the ex-Secretary of the Interior, said——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Columbus Delano?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes; once a member of General Grant's Cabinet, and before that a member of this House. He said of the Tariff Commission that after it was gotten up by the manufacturers they took their hired agent and made him president of it; I suppose to give them an impartial report. I suppose the officer who imparted the information mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio is not unlike the president of the Tariff Commission in his relations to the manufacturers, whose hired agent he probably is. One of the absurdities which he thinks he discovers in the bill is the proposed cut of iron ore, which would reduce it to 60 cents, and under the Morrill tariff it was 20 per cent. ad valorem; that it might fall so low or go so high in price it would be difficult to tell on which side of the ad valorem line it was dutiable, and confusion would result.

Remembering that we have collected duty on ore under the ad valorem rate always before the present law, why need we be confused about it. The confusion is all in the reduction. He fears confusion from the rates on files, rasps, floats, &c. A great many hard-working carpenters have been filed and rasped by this tariff. [Laughter.] The duties on these he finds uncertain, because under the Morrill tariff the duty was 30 per cent. on the value. Under the present law it is by the dozen. Under the old law it was by the pound. The changes heretofore made created no confusion except to those who pay the high existing rates. The proposed reduction is the only inconsistency which pinches the friends of the file-makers.

Out of one of the rates fixed or clauses made in the last tariff bill by the gentleman from Ohio and his associates, experts who have made all the tariffs since 1860, I am told 5,000 protests have already come and 5,000 lawsuits may follow. So it would appear that there is something defective, more or less imperfect, in all tariff bills. And dread confusion haunts the gentleman from Ohio because the duty on grindstones is to be lowered. He came confused from yonder conference-room, where he was a member of the conference committee, to the confusion of all tax-payers. The office and duty of a conference is to adjust the difference between the two disagreeing Houses. This House had decided that bar-iron of the middle class was to pay $20 a ton; the Senate that it was to pay $20.16 a ton. The gentlemen of the conference, including the gentleman from Ohio, reconciled this difference—how? By raising bar-iron above both House and Senate to $22.40 a ton. [Great laughter.]

The Tariff Commission at the end of its deliberations reported that the tariff on iron ore should be 50 cents a ton. The Senate said that it should be 50 cents a ton. The House said it should be 50 cents a ton. Gentlemen of the conference committee, including the gentleman from Ohio, neither indolent nor wanting in capacity of a kind, reconciled the agreement of the House, Senate, and Tariff Commission into a disagreement, where there was none, and made the duty on ore 75 cents a ton. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentlemen of the conference did a similar service for the great corporation of corporations, the Iron and Steel Association, by giving it a tax of $17 on steel rails, which the House fixed at $15 and the Senate at $15.68 per ton. In all this there is no confession of want of capacity, but an exhibition of it which commends itself to the gentleman from Ohio. It is such an exhibition of talent and special fitness as in Ohio would be a breach of public trust and drive him from an honorable profession. Here it is statesmanship. It gives bounty to corporations and royalty to mine-owners. [Laughter.] It adds to the burdens of the people, who are mocked with the pretense that it protects labor. The more of such evidences of capacity as were exhibited in that conference, of which the gentleman from Ohio was a distinguished member, that might be shown in this horizontal bill, the more infamous it would be and the less support it ought to have. [Laughter and applause.]

Some right-thinking merchant in Boston, anxious to commend his wares with a good name, has given out that they are of the "Carlisle shape." The gentleman from Ohio discovers in this an aspiration for the reduction of war-tariff taxes, and so he will have none of the Carlisle shape. He longs for the Keifer shape. [Laughter and applause.] Let him take comfort in the fact that his allies about me who are striving to defeat this bill, and with it all legislation necessary to relieve the people from unnecessary taxes, are speeding the return of the Keifer shape.

These gentlemen who come here from Iowa, Wisconsin, and Michigan pledged to abate something from taxes taken from the people to go into a treasury already full come as the representatives of a people who believe the Tariff Commission scheme was a sham and a cheat, devised to maintain and not to reduce taxes. And now they are here, and the chief financial officer of the Government tells them (whether it is a cheat or not) that this scheme has not reduced taxes as it was promised they should be reduced—as all advocates of the commission plan promised they should be reduced.

If the gentlemen from these States must return to their constituents with their pledges unredeemed and promises unkept—unkept not because of the votes of the gentlemen from Ohio and his party associates, but because of the votes of their Democratic allies—what answer shall they make to the people, who had their assurances that with the help of their own party associates here they would give to the people that relief which had hitherto been first promised, then denied? Must they return with faith unkept by reason of the action of their own party associates, who are always professing a willingness to grant relief, which when they have the power to grant they take care to refuse? Is this to be the result?

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed for debate has expired.

Mr. MONEY. I move that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed to proceed.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Illinois has not occupied the time to which he was entitled, having yielded to me a portion of it. [Cries of "Go on!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois yielded six minutes to the gentleman from Iowa. If there be no objection the Chair will recognize him for that time.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRISON. With such a result of course the Keifer shape will return to comfort Ohio statesmen. But will the gentlemen already referred to return or will they be considered unfaithful because their Democratic associates have been so? Then those by whose votes on this bill all reduction of taxes shall be postponed will be further comforted with the return here of the genial Governor Pound, who weighs a ton for many purposes. [Laughter.] The gentle Hazelton, and the amiable gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Robeson, may be here again. Probably the budding statesman from California may give place to jolly Mr. Page.

Mr. WILLIS. And besides that "My dear Hubbell." [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRISON. Yes; my dear Hubbell and my Ohio friend and all his Democratic allies here will be made happy in the assurance that all the "industries" are safe in the hands of men of "capacity."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], who does not honor me with his presence——

Mr. RANDALL. That is a mistake.

Mr. MORRISON. I am glad to know the gentleman is here. He too was once in favor, or professed to be in favor, of a substantial reduction of high tariff taxes; said so in a speech to the convention which nominated him as a candidate for the place he holds in this Congress, if the Evening Telegram and his own city papers correctly report him. It is true that since then the commission scheme of revision procured by his assistance has been made, but I think it is substantially conceded by all that this is not such a revision as was promised by him and his associate advocates of that measure, for they promised relief which it did not afford and which is still refused.

The gentleman with his associates in that work reduced the tax on silks from 60 per cent. to 50 per cent. or 16 per cent. On the cheaper woolen goods, some of them taxed as high as 100 per cent., he voted with other revisers and tariff adjusters to add another 30 per cent. I ask him now to help me to reduce this onerous tax that was already too high, and his answer is, not that it is not too high—he does not say that—but he says he does not like the horizontal cut. Then why does he not offer a proper plan—another cut? He claims to have the power to strike out the enacting clause of this bill and thereby defeat any legislation. If he and his Democratic adherents have the power to do that they have the power to amend the bill and make it what they desire it to be. [Applause.]

But this is not a horizontal cut. It removes part of the monstrous tax put by him on woolen and other goods, but leaves silks taxed as he taxed them. I do not propose an indiscriminate reduction. When 20 per cent. is taken off, those now as high as 100 per cent. will still be 80 per cent. Another provision of the bill reduces them to 60 per cent. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the Democrats who act with him think 60 per cent. on woolen goods too low? In God's name how much would you take as bounty for those for whom you have spoken here to-day? Do you know there are a million women to-day in this country earning with their needles dresses made of goods thus highly taxed, and that when they buy ten yards for a dress, even with this second cut, they must give the price of six to the Government? Is that not enough?

Gentlemen but deceive themselves if they expect to avoid responsibility with a pretense that a bill open to amendment is objectionable in form or in detail. The pretense that the advocates of this bill or any bill reducing tariff taxes would resort to direct taxation is a meaningless subterfuge. The assertion that the friends of tariff reform would abandon tariff taxes as a principal source of revenue is a weak invention of those who would hide their own rightly distrusted purposes and evasions of public duty.

But there is the horizontal cut into the bounty-fed Congressional favorites, and therefore I can not have the assistance of these gentlemen even to amend the bill or to legislate upon the subject of taxation because for the purposes of those by whom it is opposed it cuts wrong in cutting at all. And yet most of them (I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not) pretend to believe taxes too high, and assume a willingness to reduce them, while voting to prevent all reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate limited by order of the House has expired. The Clerk will read the first paragraph of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That on and after the 1st day of July, 1884, in lieu of the duties and rates of duty imposed by law on the importation of the goods, wares, and merchandise mentioned in the several schedules of "an act to reduce internal-revenue taxation, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1883, and hereinafter enumerated, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following rates of duty upon said articles severally, that is to say.

Mr. KASSON. I will ask if it is not the proper time to submit a motion, unless some one desires the floor?

Mr. CONVERSE. I move to strike out the enacting clause of this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON], will say that this is the proper time for the motion now made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE].

Mr. MORRISON. Before the vote is taken I ask unanimous consent that the committee rise informally for the purpose of obtaining an order from the House to vacate the evening session for to-day.

Mr. KASSON. I think we had better go on with this for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. MORRISON. Upon that motion I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONVERSE and Mr. MORRISON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 156, noes 151.

So the motion to strike out the enacting clause was agreed to.

[The announcement of the result of the vote was received with great cheering on the Republican side.]

Mr. CONVERSE. I move that the committee rise, and that the chairman report its action to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. MORRISON. I now ask unanimous consent that the order for the evening session for this evening be vacated.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentlemen who have not had an opportunity of addressing the House on this subject may have leave to print in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon concurring in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. MORRISON and Mr. TURNER of Kentucky called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 159, nays 155, not voting 10; as follows:

YEAS—159.

NOT VOTING—10.

Barr,	Nicholls,	Robinson, W. E.	Wood.
Bennett,	Ochiltree,	Valentine,
Muldrow,	Riggs,	White, J. D.

So the report of the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. BENNETT with Mr. OCHILTREE, on all questions, including the tariff. If present, Mr. OCHILTREE would vote to strike out the enacting clause of the Morrison tariff bill, and Mr. BENNETT would vote "no" on that proposition.

Mr. MULDROW with Mr. VALENTINE, on all questions, including the tariff. If present, Mr. VALENTINE would vote to strike out the enacting clause of the tariff bill, and Mr. MULDROW would vote against that proposition.

Mr. RIGGS with Mr. NICHOLLS, on the Morrison tariff bill. If present, Mr. RIGGS would vote for the bill in all its stages and Mr. NICHOLLS against it.

Mr. WOOD with Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, on all questions, for ten days.

Mr. BRUMM. I understood that my colleague, Mr. BARR, was paired with Mr. BELMONT, of New York. I did not hear that pair announced.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BARR] is not paired with Mr. BELMONT on this question; Mr. BELMONT had the right to vote.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 159, the nays are 155. The yeas have it; and the enacting clause is stricken out and the bill is rejected.

[The announcement of the result of the vote was received with loud and continued cheers and applause.]

Mr. CONVERSE. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move that the House now adjourn.

Many MEMBERS. Oh, no!

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I will withdraw that motion.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UTAH COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting a copy of the report of the Utah Commission.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN MEXICO AND GUATEMALA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to that part of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 17th of January last respecting the question of boundaries between the Republics of Mexico and Guatemala, I transmit herewith the report of the Secretary of State and its accompanying papers.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 6, 1884.

APPROPRIATION FOR WITNESSES AND JURORS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, asking an appropriation, to be made immediately available, to pay fees of witnesses and jurors, and submitting communications from United States judges and marshals; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BROADHEAD: Memorial of a large number of manufacturers and merchants of the city of Saint Louis, including manufacturers of iron, &c., in favor of the passage of the Morrison bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CALDWELL: Papers relating to the claim of John Bradley—to the Committee on War Claims.

UTAH COMMISSION REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, May 6, 1884.

STEAMER KEOR JEOR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of March 12, 1884, requesting to be furnished with a copy of correspondence between this Government and that of China respecting the Ward claims and the claim of Charles E. Hill, I herewith submit a letter of the Secretary of State, together with its accompanying papers.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, May 6, 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message of the President will be printed, and also the letter of the Secretary of State, and with the accompanying papers referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Chair does not suggest the printing of the accompanying papers, as they appear to be very voluminous, until the committee shall see whether it is necessary to print them or not.

WORLD'S INDUSTRIAL AND COTTON CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of Congress a copy of the preliminary report by the board of management of the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition, showing their operations, and containing observations upon other matters concerning the project, deemed of importance.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, May 6, 1884.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter of General Sheridan, president of the Board of Commissioners of the Soldiers' Home, requesting the necessary legislation to allow the admission of insane inmates of such home to the Government Hospital for the Insane; which, with the accompanying letter, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of William G. Allen, of York, Me., praying to be granted a pension on account of an injury received while in the service of the United States at Fortress Monroe; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT. I present the petition of Theodore D. Woolsey, Noah Porter, and other distinguished citizens of New Haven, Conn., praying for the restoration of the Nez Percé Indians, known as Chief Joseph's band, to their former reservation in Idaho. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of members of John Sedgwick Post, No. 4, Grand Army of the Republic, praying an increase of pension to those who have lost an eye in the United States military service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 578) to authorize the sale of a certain portion of the Fort Hays military reservation, Kansas, to the Ellis County Agricultural Society, of Kansas, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 179) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint from the sergeants of the Signal Corps two second lieutenants, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 588) for the relief of the estate of Lucien Goyaux, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1391) referring to the Court of Claims the claims for property seized by General Johnston on the Utah expedition, reported it adversely; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. 2166) referring to the Court of Claims the claims for property seized by General Johnston on the Utah expedition; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1411) for the relief of Santiago de Leon, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George Brown, late a citizen of Virginia, praying compensation for certain property taken and used by the Government of the United States during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 608) for the relief of J. S. Underhill, have carefully considered the same, and in accordance with the resolution of the Senate of February 7, 1884, report as follows:

That they have referred the same to the Court of Claims under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," approved March 3, 1883.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON in the chair). The report will be placed on file.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 607) for the relief of William H. Young, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1774) for the relief of William Tabb, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the personal representatives of Ayres P. Merrill, deceased, praying compensation for stores and supplies taken by the Army of the United States, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2168) for the relief of the executrix of Ayres P. Merrill, deceased; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1950) to authorize the construction of a highway bridge across that part of the waters of Lake Champlain lying between the towns of North Hero and Alburg, in the State of Vermont, reported it with an amendment.

ESTATE OF J. J. PULLIAM.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of W. J. Hancock, administrator of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, of Fayette County, Tennessee, praying compensation for property taken and used by the United States Army during the late war, to report an original bill. I ask for the present consideration of this bill. If the Chair will direct the bill to be read for information, I will then state to the Senate the reasons for it. It will not take two minutes.

The bill (S. 2167) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased, was read the first time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to re-examine and settle the claim of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased, late of Fayette County, State of Tennessee, for wood taken by the United States forces during the late war, from one hundred and twenty-five acres of land, located near the village of La Grange, in said State; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum that may be found due said estate: Provided, That the amount shall not exceed $4,167.

The bill was read the second time by its title.

Mr. HOAR. We pass every winter a bill containing in some cases several thousands of claims and always several hundreds, which have been audited by the Quartermaster's Department, for quartermaster's stores taken from loyal persons in the Southern States. When the proper bill came up last year there was a petition in favor of this petitioner. The bill passed the House, and when it came to the Senate it was discovered by the chairman of the Committee on Claims that a mistake, a mere clerical mistake, had been made which fixed the claim of this petitioner at some hundreds of dollars less than he was entitled to. To have corrected the mistake would have required the bill to go back to the House of Representatives, delaying a good many hundred persons whose claims were provided for in that bill, and it was within a day or two of the end of the session and might cause the defeat of the bill altogether. The chairman of the committee, therefore, reported to the Senate stating that that mistake had been found and that the committee had reported a bill with the smaller sum, doing injustice to the petitioner in that respect, and would report at the next session a bill to correct the error.

This bill authorizes the proper officers who examined those claims to re-examine this and give to the petitioner such sum as they shall find him entitled to.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS introduced a bill (S. 2169) to place Ulysses S. Grant, late General of the Army of the United States, upon the retired list of the Army; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I wish to commend it to the early consideration of that committee for reasons which everybody understands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 2170) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. This is a bill introduced at the instance of the parties who are interested and is designed as a substitute for a bill already pending before the Committee on Education and Labor. I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2171) to promote the efficiency of the revenue-marine service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2172) for the relief of Mrs. Claud Morris; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 2173) to increase the endowment of the Louisiana State University and Agricultural College; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 2174) creating the Quilleute land district in Washington Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2175) granting a pension to George W. Eagles; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 2176) to create a permanently deep, wide, and straight channel through the Sandy Hook bar of the port of New York, for the purpose of forming an improved commercial outlet; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2177) granting a pension to Henry Bradford; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2178) for the relief of Abner Lowry, sr., of San Pete County, Utah; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2179) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Saint Joseph, in the State of Missouri, and to establish it as a post-road; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 2180) for the relief of the trustees of the Christian Brothers' College of Saint Louis, Mo.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LOGAN. In introducing the bill I desire to say that I know nothing about it whatever, but I present it at the request of parties interested. I move its reference to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Concurrent and other resolutions" are now in order. [A pause.] If there be none, that order is closed. The Chair understands that it was unanimously understood yesterday evening that the shipping bill should be now laid before the Senate. That will accordingly be done.

Mr. HILL. According to the notice which I gave yesterday, I ask that the Senate now take up the bill (S. 2031) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRYE. Has the shipping bill been laid before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator from Colorado ask that it be laid aside informally?

Mr. HILL. I ask that it be laid aside informally, to take up the bill that I have named.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be laid aside informally, in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2031. Is there objection?

Mr. DAWES. I think that the Senator from Maine ought not to consent to this, after the arrangement last night, at the expense of the Appropriations Committee. If he makes this arrangement at the expense of the bill which he has in charge, I have no objection, but to make it at the expense of the Appropriations Committee, I shall feel it my duty after the close of the remarks of the Senator from Colorado to ask the opinion of the Senate upon the propriety of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. FRYE. I have been in the Senate only a short time, but I have learned that in matters of this kind it is a question of courtesy which I can not by any possibility disregard. The Senator from Colorado has given notice that he desires to occupy an hour or three-quarters of an hour at the present moment, and I feel bound by what I have recognized as a rule of the Senate in that matter, the rule of courtesy.

Mr. DAWES. I made this same statement last night to the Senator from Maine, and he chose to ask unanimous consent last night when I made the statement to him. I do not think the Senator ought now, at the expense of the appropriation bill, to give way this morning. I did not object to his yielding according to his own suggestion last night, but I had stated that I felt called upon to bring up the appropriation bill. The situation of the matter is this: Last Friday I gave way upon the intimation that the shipping bill would be finished on Friday. I gave way on Monday at the suggestion that it would be finished before night on Monday. I gave way yesterday upon the assertion of the Senator from Maine that he would hold the Senate here, if they would consent to stay, till the bill was finished last night. Last night at 6 o'clock the Senator, after this statement, asked unanimous consent to take up the shipping bill this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL]. The Chair hears none. The pending order is laid aside informally.

NEW ORLEANS, BATON ROUGE AND VICKSBURG RAILROAD.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. 2031) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and for other purposes, is before the Senate. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] will proceed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, on the 10th of December the Senate passed a resolution proposed by me directing the Secretary of the Interior to furnish to the Senate copies of all papers then on file in the Interior Department relating to the transfer of the land grant of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company. The copies called for were transmitted to the Senate on the 7th of January, and have been printed and constitute Executive Document No. 31 of this session.

After a careful perusal of these papers I deemed it to be my duty to introduce a bill, which I offered on the 10th of April declaring a forfeiture of the land grant conditionally made in 1871 to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company.

Before moving the reference of this bill to the Committee on Public Lands I will, with the leave of the Senate, state my reasons for believing that it ought to be passed.

The question involved in this case is the validity of the claim of the New Orleans Pacific Railway to the lands conditionally granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by the twenty-second section of the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, creating the Texas Pacific Railway Company.

The full text of the twenty-second section is as follows:

> That the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, chartered by the State of Louisiana, shall have the right to connect, by the most eligible route to be selected by said company, with the said Texas Pacific Railroad at its eastern terminus, and shall have the right of way through the public land to the same extent granted hereby to the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and in aid of its construction from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, thence by way of Alexandria, in said State, to connect with said Texas Pacific Railroad Company at its eastern terminus, there is hereby granted to said company, its successors and assigns, the same number of alternate sections of public lands per mile in the State of Louisiana as are by this act granted in the State of California to said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and said lands shall be withdrawn from market, selected, and patents issued therefor and opened for settlement and pre-emption upon the same terms and in the same manner and time as is provided for and required from said Texas Pacific Railroad Company within said State of California: Provided, That said company shall complete the whole of said road within five years from the passage of this act.

It may be proper to state that the bill creating the Texas Pacific Railway originated in the House of Representatives, in which it was passed without the twenty-second and twenty-third sections, which were added by the Senate. The bill as the House passed it was limited to a road from a point at or near Marshall, in Texas, to San Diego, Cal. The twenty-second section made provision for a connection between Marshall and New Orleans by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, an existing company under the laws of Louisiana, and the twenty-third section for a connection with San Francisco by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, an existing company under the laws of California.

The Louisiana law creating the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company was passed December 30, 1869, and authorized it to build "from any point on the line of the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad within the parish of Livingston, running from thence to any point on the boundary line dividing the States of Louisiana and Mississippi," thus establishing its entire main line on the east side of the Mississippi River; but it was also authorized "to construct and operate a branch railroad from its main line to the city of Baton Rouge," and was further invested with a general and sweeping power "to construct, maintain, and use such branch railroads and tracks as it may find necessary and expedient to own and use." As originally chartered, therefore, the main line of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg was to be wholly on the east side of the Mississippi River, looking to a connection with Vicksburg, in the State of Mississippi, as its title imports, and having no reference to the scheme of a Texas Pacific Railway.

An additional act, passed by Louisiana December 11, 1872, refers to the grants of lands made by the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and for the purpose of giving to that company the power to enlarge its originally designated line so as to avail itself of those grants, made New Orleans its point of beginning, instead of "the line of the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad within the parish of Livingston," and also authorized it to extend the line "to the city of Shreveport, or perfect railroad communications with the Texas Pacific Railroad, or any other railroad in northwestern Louisiana, near the Louisiana State line." But it is to be specially noted that the Louisiana act of December 11, 1872, contained the following proviso:

> Provided, however, That the said company shall construct the line of its road between the city of New Orleans and the city of Baton Rouge, on the east side of the Mississippi River.

Without waiting for the Louisiana act of December 11, 1872, but apparently feeling justified by the sweeping power to build branches given by the act of December 30, 1869, the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, on the 11th of November, 1871, filed in the General Land Office a map showing the general route of a road projected from Baton Rouge to Shreveport, by the way of Alexandria, and on the 13th of February, 1873, filed in the same office another map showing the general route of a projected road between New Orleans and Baton Rouge, being wholly on the east side of the Mississippi River, to which side of the river it was strictly confined between those two points by its original charter of December 30, 1869, and by the supplementary Louisiana act of December 11, 1872. In both the cases of the filing of these maps showing projected lines there was a withdrawal from sale of the public lands within certain limits on each side of the projected lines, and it is not pretended that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company has to this day filed any other maps showing a definite location on any part of its proposed general route, or that it has ever built one foot of railroad anywhere, either within or without the designated limits of its general route.

B. H. Green, the chief engineer of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company until January, 1870, in a letter submitted in 1880 to a House committee describes as follows exactly how much, or it might be more correct to say how little, that company ever did in the way of constructing a road:

> Some ten months after my first connection with this company Messrs. Bates & Co. sold out to Messrs. Willis Gaylord and associates. During said period of ten months some surveys were made, but exclusively on the east side of the Mississippi River, covering a distance of less than one hundred miles, and a little light grading leading out of Baton Rouge was partially and imperfectly performed to the extent of considerably less than a mile. A few thousand crossties were also contracted for and delivered. Subsequently, under Messrs. Willis Gaylord and associates, there has been no survey of any part of the line east or west of the Mississippi River, or any work of any description done within my knowledge.

The New Orleans Pacific Railway was first organized in June, 1875, under a general railroad law of Louisiana, but on the 19th of February, 1876, received a special railroad charter, adopting in the main, but with some small alterations, the provisions of the first organization. The special charter was further modified on the 5th of February, 1878, by the Legislature of Louisiana. Its authorized line, and the line which it now actually owns, either by purchase or construction, between New Orleans and Baton Rouge, is wholly on the west side of the Mississippi River. Between Baton Rouge and Shreveport, by the way of Alexandria, its authorized and actually constructed line is necessarily pretty near the general route between the same points laid down on the map filed in the General Land Office by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad, but nowhere coincides with it, and it is not pretended that the New Orleans Pacific Railway in building between Baton Rouge and Shreveport was in any measure influenced or controlled by the surveys and designations of a general route by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad.

The chartered line of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company began on the right or west bank of the Mississippi River, "at a point at New Orleans or between New Orleans and the parish of Iberville," and was actually commenced at a point at New Orleans on the west side of the Mississippi River and extended, both as chartered and actually constructed (including a purchased road sixty-eight miles in length), three hundred and twenty-five miles to Shreveport, and the company has neither built nor is it by its charter authorized to build beyond Shreveport to Marshall, which is the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railway. From the actual starting point of the road at New Orleans to Baton Rouge Junction the distance is ninety miles and the main line is at that junction connected by a branch of eight miles with West Baton Rouge.

From the evidence printed in House Report No. 678 of the present session of Congress it appears that the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company appeared before the Pacific Railroad House Committees of the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-seventh Congresses asserting and offering proofs to show that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company was a bankrupt and defunct concern, with no assets but a repealed charter and a lapsed land grant, and asking that the lands covered by that lapsed grant should be by Congress given anew to the New Orleans Pacific Railway. It also appears that the House committees of the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses reported in favor of the action thus asked for, thereby deciding that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company had no rights in the subject-matter. These reports were never reached for action on them by the House. The House committee of the Forty-seventh Congress made no report, and probably for the reason that it was the common belief at that time that no more grants of lands for railroads were likely to be made. Before the committee of the Forty-seventh Congress E. B. Wheelock, president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway, appeared and filed a brief in March, 1880, in which he reiterated the assertion that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company, popularly known as the Backbone Company, had no rights whatever, and that he would not negotiate with it at all. In this brief he states that on the 23d of December, 1878, he sent the following telegram to Mr. Elam, of the Louisiana delegation in the House:

No arrangement looking to any recognition of the pretended claims of the Backbone Company will be entertained by my company.

Also that on the 13th of January, 1879, he sent the following telegram to Messrs. ELLIS and Elam, of the Louisiana House delegation:

My telegram to Elam, December 23, is final. We now have ability to complete our road without Government assistance, and if our friends can not secure a land grant we must get along without it.

Having failed to obtain any grant of lands from Congress, and not then having conceived the idea of buying rights from the defunct New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company, which had no rights to sell, the New Orleans Pacific Railway did on the 31st of July, 1880, enter into a contract for the complete construction of its line with the American Railway Improvement Company, the financial responsibility of which was ample (Jay Gould being the principal stockholder and G. M. Dodge president), and which did forthwith enter upon the work of building the road, and carried it steadily and rapidly forward to the end. The American Railway Improvement Company in making this contract was not influenced by any land grant, the New Orleans Pacific Company having at that time definitely abandoned the hope of getting one from Congress, and not having down to that time conceived the idea of getting a title to one by negotiations with the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company.

It appears further from the affidavit of the chief engineer of the New Orleans Pacific Company, now on a map in the General Land Office, that the "actual location" of the road from Shreveport to White Castle, which is 75 miles from New Orleans, and is the northern end of the piece of road purchased by the New Orleans Pacific Railway, was completed by December, 1880. (See page 81, Executive Document No. 31.) The exact date of the final completion of the road does not officially appear, but is understood to have been wholly or chiefly complete in 1881. The dates of the filing in the General Land Office of two maps showing the line of actual construction were October 27, 1881, and November 17, 1882. (See page 82, Executive Document, No. 31.)

In the annual report for 1881 of the late Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Kirkwood, dated several days before the (so called) meeting of the stockholders of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad in December of that year, conveying their land grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway, he says:

One hundred and thirty miles of the New Orleans Pacific Railway have recently been examined but not accepted, and one hundred and twenty-three miles are now ready for examination.

The first shadow of a claim to lands from the United States which is set up by the New Orleans Pacific Railway, if it can be said to be the shadow of a claim, is an indenture dated January 5, 1881, in which the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company figures as the party of the first part, while the New Orleans Pacific Railway figures as the party of the second part. (See pages 21 et seq. of Executive Document No. 31.) In this indenture the party of the first part, "in consideration of $1 and of other good and valuable considerations, releases and quitclaims unto the said party of the second part all the right, title, and interest of the said party of the first part in or to a certain grant of public lands granted to the said party of the first part by an act of the Congress of the United States approved March 3, 1871." The only evidence that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company had anything to do with this indenture is its corporate seal affixed thereto and the signatures of W. H. Barnum and W. M. Barnum (father and son), styling themselves as being respectively the president and secretary of the company, of which indenture and accompanying paper the following is the full text:

This indenture, made the 5th of January, 1881, between the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, a corporation created and existing under and by virtue of a special act of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, approved December 30, 1869, party of the first part, and the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, a corporation created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Louisiana, party of the second part, witnesseth:

That the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of $1, lawful money of the United States of America, to it in hand paid by the said party of the second part, at or before the ensealing and delivery of these presents, the receipt whereof is thereby acknowledged, and of other good and valuable consideration has remised, released, and quitclaimed, and by these presents does remise, release, and quitclaim, unto the said party of the second part, and to its successors and assigns forever,

All the right, title, and interest of the said party of the first part, its successors or assigns of, in, or to a certain grant of public lands granted to the said party of the first part by an act of the Congress of the United States approved March 3, 1871, and entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in any wise appertaining, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues, and profits thereof.

To have and to hold all and singular the above mentioned and described premises, together with the appurtenances, unto the said party of the second part, its successors and assigns, forever.

In witness whereof the said party of the first part hath caused its corporate seal to be hereunto affixed and these presents to be signed by its president and secretary the day and year first above written.

W. H BARNUM, President.
WM. M. BARNUM, Secretary.

Sealed and delivered in the presence of—
CHARLES L. BEAMAN.
CHARLES EDGAR MILLS.

The conclusion seems to have been adopted at the Interior Department that the deed of the Barnums, upon proof of its acceptance by the New Orleans Pacific Railway, was of itself sufficient to convey to that company the land grant of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad and to effect the transfer of a location of that grant from the route of one road to the route of the other. This is shown by the fact that the President, doubtless on the recommendation of the Interior Department, appointed a commissioner to examine one hundred and thirty miles of the constructed line of the New Orleans Pacific Railway early enough in 1881 to make a report (page 28 of Executive Document No. 31) on the 26th day of October in that year. Down to that time there had not been exhibited to the Interior Department, nor has there since been exhibited to that Department, down to January 7, 1884, which is the date of the letter from it, sending to the Senate the papers constituting Executive Document No. 31, any evidence that the organization of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad had been regularly kept up, nor that it had any legally constituted board of directors, nor was any inquiry made whether the board of directors, if there was one properly constituted, had the right and power to convey any title the company might have to a land grant, or whether, if the board of directors had such right and power, they could delegate it to the president and secretary, to be exercised at their absolute discretion and without the subsequent ratification of the board of directors itself. Ordinary business prudence in the conduct of private affairs would have clearly dictated an investigation on all these points in a transaction involving millions of dollars' worth of property.

The Louisiana act of December 30, 1869, chartering the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad, defining in the fifth section the powers of the directors says that they "may make such rules, regulations, and by-laws for the government of its officers and the management of its business as they may deem expedient, and may, in the name and on behalf of said company, make such contracts, enter into such agreements, and do and perform such acts as they, or a majority of them, may deem proper, convenient, or necessary for the accomplishment of the object for which said company was created."

The directors have no other power than what is given in so much of the fifth section as I have just read, and they could never have adjudged that the sale of their title (if any) to their conditional land grant for $1 and other considerations not disclosed, and known only to the Barnums, father and son, could tend in any possible manner to "the accomplishment of the objects for which said company is created," which were the construction, maintenance, and operating of a railroad.

Without doubt the charter might, if the Legislature of Louisiana thought it proper, have clothed the directors with the power, if an abandonment of the enterprise had been compelled by insolvency or other misfortunes, to dispose of the wreck for the benefit of whom it might concern. But the charter as it was actually framed and granted gave them no such power, nor any power except to perform acts "proper, convenient, or necessary for the accomplishment of the objects for which said company is created." And even if they possessed any such power as that of disposing of the wreck for the most it would bring, it would not have been a power which they could have delegated to the president and secretary to be exercised at their mere discretion without any disclosures of the considerations received by them, and the whole of which the president and secretary might retain except such portions of it as they might find it necessary to use to buy off the opposition of such of the stockholders and creditors as were vigilant enough to discover what was going on and to interpose troublesome protests against it.

The papers sent to the Senate by the Secretary of the Interior do indeed disclose an account of what is described as a meeting of stockholders in New Orleans on the 9th of December, 1881, at which by a unanimous vote it was voted to "ratify and confirm" the action of the directors in authorizing (December 29, 1880) the Barnums to sell out the land grant and the deed of indenture of the Barnums (January 5, 1881), actually conveying it to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company (pages 36 et seq. of Executive Document No. 31). Among these papers is a list of the stockholders as of November 28, 1881. There has never been any investigation of the regularity of these proceedings in any particular, either as to the call of the meeting, the accuracy of the list of the stockholders, or anything else; and I note in this connection that on page 57 of Executive Document No. 31 there is the sworn statement, dated June 13, 1882, of Thomas C. Bates, of Rochester, N. Y., that he was the owner of 1,000 shares of the stock, although his name does not appear at all in the list of stockholders referred to. Mr. Bates was the first president of the company and was a large creditor of it at the time of the transfer by the Barnums of whatever title it had to a land grant.

From the papers transmitted to us in relation to this meeting of stockholders, it does not appear that there was one single stockholder present; certainly no stockholder took part in it. The entire number of shares voting for directors was 42,755, all of them by B. F. Wheelock, by virtue of proxies which he is said to have held, his own name not appearing on the list of stockholders, and he being the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway. The number of shares voting for the resolution to ratify and confirm the deed of the Barnums to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company was also exactly 42,755, and may be presumed to have been thrown by the same Mr. Wheelock.

If, however, it can be shown hereafter, as it has certainly not yet been shown, that the stockholders' meeting which acted with such suspicious unanimity on the 9th of December, 1881, was regularly called, and that a majority of the stockholders were present either personally or by proxy, the utmost effect which can be claimed for the resolution which it adopted is that it operated as a transfer on that day to the New Orleans Pacific Railway of any right the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company might have in a land grant. It could have no retroactive effect to validate the deed of the Barnums on the 5th of the preceding January, and it is not until the 9th of December, 1881, that the New Orleans Pacific Railway can possibly claim to have received the transfer to itself of such right (if any) to a land grant as the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company might possess. In point of legal right it is of no consequence whether the New Orleans Pacific Railway received the transfer in January or December, 1881, but as bearing upon the equitable right, which the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company now sets up, it is of a good deal of consequence.

Notwithstanding the fact that on the 31st of July, 1880, the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company entered into a contract for the complete construction of its work with the responsible Railway Improvement Association, which did actually complete it, it is now said that the construction was undertaken only upon the faith of and as a consequence of the transfer of the land grant of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad. In that point of view it is important that the transfer, if there was anything to be transferred, was obtained not in January, 1881, but in December, 1881, eleven months afterward, and when the Railway Improvement Association is shown to have been well along in the work of construction. The New Orleans Pacific Railway Company knew perfectly well that whatever rights the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad might have, the deed of the Barnums of January, 1881, was incompetent to transfer them; and the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway, Mr. Wheelock, was active in obtaining proxies for himself for the stockholders' meeting of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad on the 9th of December, 1881, which consisted of himself alone, so far as appears, and the results of which he "took pleasure" in communicating on the next day to one of the Barnums. (See pages 36 and 40 of Executive Document 31.)

A careful perusal of the papers sent to the Senate by the Secretary of the Interior, and which make up Executive Document 31, has satisfied me that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad did not possess either in January or December, 1881, any land grant which it could convey to anybody. It never built or acquired a foot of railroad, had no property or assets of any kind, and was loaded down with debts of all sorts, including judgments and bonds. Its first president, Mr. Bates, in his sworn statement of June, 1882, already referred to, says:

I am thoroughly familiar with the financial history of the road from its organization to the present time. The said road, aside from its land grant, since 1871 has been, and now is, utterly and hopelessly insolvent. Judgments have been entered against it in New York and Louisiana to a great many thousands of dollars. The interest on its bonds has not been paid since 1871. Its current debts and obligations have not been discharged since that date. The only property the said railroad company has is its Congressional land grant.

Its land grant not being realizable until its road should be built, the five years limited for the completion of its road having expired in 1876, it having totally failed to enlist capital in its construction, and its originators, promoters, and manipulators having divided among themselves personally, in unknown proportions, whatever was obtained on the large issue of bonds with which it signalized the commencement of its existence, it was to all practical intents and purposes a defunct corporation in 1880. Furthermore, I do not yet see any room to doubt that it was then legally defunct, as a consequence of the repeal of its charter by the Legislature of Louisiana in 1877. There is nothing shown to the contrary, except (page 15 of Executive Document No. 31) a decision of the circuit court of the United States, fifth judicial circuit and district of Louisiana, rendered June 13, 1877, there being present only the district judge, Hon. E. C. Billings. No reasons for the decision are given, and the case seems to have been submitted without serious argument. The judgment was obtained by collusion, and was the judgment which both the parties equally desired. The plaintiff was a creditor of the company, seeking to uphold its legal existence as the last hope of obtaining something on the debt due him. The defendant was the company itself, also desirous of upholding its own existence as the last possible hope of obtaining something out of its land grant. The defendant filed June 11, 1877, exceptions, raising the point that the repeal of its charter was unconstitutional, and on the same day the amicable counsel for both parties agreed that the exceptions should be "submitted to the court on briefs to be furnished in twenty-four hours." Two days afterward, namely, on the 13th day of June, 1877, the court entered the judgment which the plaintiff and defendant were both seeking, that the repeal of the charter was unconstitutional. That decision does not in any event bind any but the parties to it, and we can not know until we get some explanations what reasons there may be which can justify it.

It is impossible to understand how it can be unconstitutional for the Legislature of Louisiana to repeal this charter when the general law of that State, as embodied in its code (article 447), is as follows:

A corporation legally established may be dissolved by an act of the Legislature if they deem it necessary or convenient to the public interest: Provided, That when the act of incorporation imports a contract on the faith of which individuals have advanced money or engaged their property it can not be repealed without providing for reimbursement of the advances made or making full indemnity to such individuals.

The charter of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company did not of itself import any contract on the part of the State which is the kind of contract intended on the faith of which anybody could or did advance money or property. The company itself after it was chartered entered into many contracts, such as issuing bonds, &c., and if it had any property to give value to such contracts the repeal of its charter did not take away any liens on such property. This company, however, had no property of any kind, and the repeal of its charter could not make the plight of its creditors any worse than it was already.

Briefly, the condition of things was that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad was practically defunct, and to all appearance legally defunct, as a consequence of the repeal of its charter, and that the New Orleans Pacific Railway had ascertained during the session of Congress of 1879–'80 that the policy of granting lands to railroads was out of favor in Washington, and that it was not practicable to obtain a Congressional transfer to itself of the lapsed land grant of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad. The ingenious men in both roads seem then to have devised the scheme of procuring to the New Orleans Pacific Railway a transfer of the land grant of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, which had nothing except a repealed charter and millions of outstanding debts, and which had never built a rod of road or earned either a legal or equitable title to an acre of land. The New Orleans Pacific Railway was then actually engaged in building a railroad from New Orleans to Shreveport, over a route which was ninety miles of its length on a different side of the Mississippi River from that of the chartered route of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad, and was determined to build it with or without a land grant. It has, in fact, been since built, and without any aid from any land grant, inasmuch as the scheme of converting to its own use the lapsed grant of another road chartered to build over a materially different route has not yet been finally consummated. It is said, furthermore, that the construction of the railroad has, independently of any land grant, been exceedingly profitable to the builders. A. M. Gibson, in a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, September 25, 1883 (page 85 of Executive Document No. 31), says, in respect to the disposition of this prize of a lapsed land grant, if it can be resuscitated:

The lands, if patents are issued therefor, are to be mortgaged for $4,000,000. These bonds are, I understand, already printed. They are, as part of the assets of the New Orleans Pacific Company, to go to the American Railway Improvement Company, by virtue of a contract of the latter with the former, a few persons who have already made 500 per cent. profit in building. The stockholders of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company will not be benefited by this swindle which you are asked to make possible; no one will be benefited save the few persons who hold American Railway Improvement Company stock and the old land-grant bonds of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company.

It appears from recorded deeds that on the 20th of June, 1881, the New Orleans Pacific Company conveyed its entire road equipment, rolling-stock, and rights and property of every kind to the Texas Pacific Railway, but specially excepting its rights under the (so called) transfer of the land grant of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company. Precisely how the proceeds of that grant are to be divided, if patents for it can be obtained, is not known and never will be until there is a judicial inquisition or until the dividing parties get into some quarrel among themselves and divulge the secrets.

But there are some things about it which we can understand, and among them the following: That the Texas Pacific Railway will get no part of the land grant, as that was excepted out of the deed made to it by the New Orleans Pacific Railway; that whatever share of the grant was set apart to pay for the transfer of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company will go to the Barnums (father and son) with such undisclosed partners as they may have, except such part of the spoils as the Barnums have been obliged to use as sops to quiet remonstrating and protesting stockholders and creditors of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company; that it is at least doubtful whether the New Orleans Pacific Company stockholders will get any part of the grant, as we have the positive statement of A. M. Gibson, which I have already read, that the entire interest of that company in the grant has been made over to the American Railway Improvement Company of which Jay Gould is the principal shareholder.

I do not propose to attempt to enter upon an argumentative discussion of the legal questions which are involved, leaving that to the more competent hands of the lawyers of the Senate. I only intend to state summarily the conclusions to which a careful perusal of the papers have led my own mind.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court in Schulenberg vs. Harriman (21 Wallace), which is the authority chiefly relied upon to support the present extraordinary claim of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, does undoubtedly lay down the doctrine that when lands are actually granted in præsenti, but subject to the performance by the grantee of some condition at a future time, such condition is only a condition subsequent, the non-performance of which does not of itself forfeit the grant, but only makes the grant forfeitable by some judicial proceeding, or in the case of a public grant by a repeal of the grant. I have no occasion to controvert that doctrine, but the question is open in every case whether, taking all the provisions of a granting act together, the grant is in præsenti or a grant upon a condition precedent. Delivering the opinion of the court in this very case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, Mr. Justice Field says:

> The language used imports a present grant and admits of no other meaning. The third section declares "that the said lands hereby granted to the State of Wisconsin shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature thereof;" and the fourth section provides in what manner sales shall be made, and enacts that if the road be not completed within ten years "no further sales shall be made and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States." The power of disposal and the provision for the lands reverting both imply, what the first section in terms declares, that a grant is made.
> The case of Rice vs. Railroad Company (1 Black) does not conflict with these views. The words of present grant in the first section of the act then under consideration were restrained by a provision in a subsequent section declaring that the titles should not vest in the Territory of Minnesota until the road or portions of it were built.

As will be noticed, the court do not adjudge the grant to Wisconsin to have been a grant in præsenti merely from the words declaring a grant, but from the additional circumstances that there were other clauses in the granting act giving to Wisconsin the present disposal of the land and providing that if a certain road should not be built within a certain time the land should revert to the United States. And as will also be noticed the court say that their decision in Schulenberg vs. Harriman is not inconsistent with nor intended to overrule their decision in the previous case of Rice vs. Railroad Company (1 Black), where words apparently declaring a present grant were restrained from operating in præsenti, by other clauses in the same act.

It is at any rate open to very grave doubt whether words of present grant to a road, restrained, as in this case, by a proviso that the road must be built within five years, and when the road obtains neither title by patent nor possession, except as the road is actually built, do operate as a grant in præsenti so as to convert what would otherwise be a condition precedent into a condition subsequent. There is certainly nothing in the Schulenberg vs. Harriman case which controls the present case.

N. C. McFarland, Commissioner of the General Land Office, in a letter (December 24, 1881), addressed to the Secretary of the Interior (page 46 of Executive Document 31), says of the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg road:

> This does not seem to be a grant in præsenti. * * * It is a matter of the gravest doubt whether the Department should go forward and issue patents to the company for the land without further action by Congress.

It may be unnecessary to say that it will always be a question of policy, discretion, and equity whether Congress will waive or not waive even a condition precedent. It has the power to do so in any case, and may well be induced to do so in respect to a railroad land grant not appearing to have been originally excessive, and in respect to which the grantee company has acted in good faith and with due diligence, has actually executed within the time limited a part of the work imposed upon it as a condition precedent, and has been disabled from completing the whole of it by unforeseen and insurmountable obstacles.

It is a fatal objection to the pretensions of the New Orleans Pacific Railway to a conveyance of lands under the twenty-second section of the Texas Pacific Railway, act of March 3, 1871, that it is built over a route differing materially from the route of the road to which a conditional grant of land was made by that section. If it even be conceded that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, to which the conditional grant of March 3, 1871, was made, might have effectually conveyed its right to build a road over its own chartered route and the accompanying land grant to another company, it can not transfer its land grant to another company whose chartered route is substantially different, and which actually builds over a substantially different route. This would be to transfer of its own authority the bounty of Congress not merely to another beneficiary, but to a substantially different object. The conditional grant of March 3, 1871, was to a company whose chartered line was from New Orleans to Baton Rouge on the east side of the Mississippi River, and is not transferable to a company whose line starts at a point at New Orleans on the west side of the Mississippi River and does not leave the west side in any part of its course.

The reasoning by which it is attempted to justify such a transfer is destitute of any strength, and can hardly be said to be plausible. It is said, and is probably true, that the essential object of Congress in the twenty-second section of the act of March 3, 1871, was to promote a connection between New Orleans and the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railway, and would have been in 1871 and might be now as well satisfied with a connection over the route of the New Orleans Pacific Railway as over the route of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad. The conclusion is a not improbable one, that if Congress had been applied to in 1871, or soon after, and before the policy of land grants to railroads had lost the popularity it once enjoyed in the country, the assent of Congress could have been obtained to a transfer of the land grant of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad to the New Orleans Pacific Railway.

But the question is not what Congress may with probability be supposed to have been ready to do at some former time, but what it actually did do in respect to granting lands on the 3d of March, 1871, in the matter of promoting a connection between New Orleans and the Texas Pacific Railroad, and that was to grant lands to a company whose chartered route between New Orleans and Baton Rouge was strictly fixed to the east side of the Mississippi River. Congress has not acted in the premises since 1871, and it may be added that since March, 1876, when the limit of time for the construction of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad expired, it has never been found possible to persuade Congress to donate lands to the New Orleans Pacific Railway, either by a new and original grant or by what would have been the same thing, a transfer to it of the lapsed rights of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg road.

It is also a fatal objection to the pretensions of the New Orleans Pacific Railway that it has not yet completed its line and so far as is known does not propose to complete its line to the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railway, which was fixed by the act of March 3, 1871, at a point at or near Marshall, in the State of Texas, and which was fixed by the Texas Pacific Company itself, in the exercise of the discretion left to it by the act of March 3, 1871, at Marshall. The New Orleans Pacific Railway extends from New Orleans, not to Marshall, in Texas, but to Shreveport, in Louisiana, which is distant rather more than forty miles from Marshall.

In the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States (page 53 of Executive Document 31) it is attempted to meet this point by showing that by the additional act of Congress of May 2, 1872, in respect to the Texas Pacific Railway, it is "authorized and required to construct, maintain, control, and operate a road between Marshall, Tex., and Shreveport, La., or control and operate any existing road between said points." He overlooked, or his attention was not called to, the following express proviso in the same act:

> Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as changing the terminus of said Texas and Pacific Railway from Marshall, as provided in the original act.

It may be said that a railroad from New Orleans to Shreveport makes a substantial connection with the Texas Pacific Railway, and that it would be technical to insist that the connection was by the act of March 3, 1871, required to be made at Marshall. But a granting act must be, at any rate by executive officers, construed strictly. The right of waiving conditions for sufficient equitable reasons rests with Congress alone, which has not yet waived the condition in this case that the connection must be made at Marshall. The New Orleans Pacific Railway Company is in no position to ask Congress to waive any condition, either substantial or merely legal, because the entire claim which it makes to lands rests upon the narrowest technicalities, strained and drawn out to the last possible degree of tenuity. It had already determined to construct a road from New Orleans to Shreveport, had already definitely located the line, had already made a contract with a responsible syndicate to build it, and was far along in the actual work of construction before it conceived the idea of getting the transfer of a land grant over a different route, and not for the purpose of enabling its work to be carried on, but for the purpose of swelling the already swollen profits expected from it.

The New Orleans Pacific Railway claimed in the first instance lands along their entire lines, including sixty-eight miles built by another company and which it acquired by purchase as late as February 10, 1881.

These sixty-eight miles of purchased road formed a part of the one hundred and thirty miles of road examined and approved by Thomas Hassard, a commissioner appointed for that purpose by the President. (See Hassard's report dated October 26, 1881.)

N. C. McFarland, Commissioner of the Land Office, in a letter addressed December 24, 1881, to the Secretary of the Interior, said in respect to the sixty-eight miles of purchased road that they "were constructed years ago by another company without any grant of lands," and that as to those miles of road the New Orleans Pacific Railway "clearly had no right" to claim any lands. The New Orleans Pacific Railway Company did not, however, give up that claim until ten months afterward, when on the 19th of October, 1882, and probably because it found that it was impossible to obtain an allowance for such a claim, it filed a disclaimer to any land grant in respect of the sixty-eight purchased miles.

What was the reason for refusing an allowance of land in respect to those particular miles of road? Simply this, that they had been constructed without reference to a land grant, and that it would have been a fraud upon an act of Congress granting lands for the purpose of procuring the construction of a railroad to appropriate such a grant to a line of road actually built without any expectation of such a grant and not at all upon the faith of or with the aid of such a grant. That precise objection applies, and with full and equal force, against allowing lands for any part of the mileage of the New Orleans Pacific Railway, the whole of which was put under a construction contract with a responsible company six months before there is any evidence that the scheme of a transfer of the land grant of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad had been conceived of, and seventeen months before such a transfer can be even claimed to have been made.

This attempted transfer of a land grant by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad to the New Orleans Pacific Railway is the first case, similar in kind, the legality of which has received an opinion in its favor from an Attorney-General of the United States. Such an attempted transfer from the Oregon Central Railroad to the Willamette Valley Railway Company was decided against by Attorney-General Akerman (13 Opinions, 382), and for reasons nearly all of which are applicable to the present case. Another transfer from the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company of a land grant in Kansas to the Atchison and Pike's Peak Railroad Company, which had been previously chartered by the Legislature of Kansas, was sustained by Attorney-General Stanberry, but in that case the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Company had itself no chartered right to build a road in Kansas, and was by the Pacific road act of July 1, 1862 (section 13), authorized, in respect to a certain Kansas route, to "use any railroad charter which has been or may be granted by the Legislature of Kansas."

That it has been commonly understood that transfers of this kind, in the absence of some such special power as is found in the grant of land in Kansas to the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Company, require legislative sanction, is shown by the legislation of Congress, which has been asked for and obtained in several cases. (See section 2 of the act of March 3, 1865, volume 13, Statutes, chapter 88, and section 1 of the act of March 3, 1869, volume 15, chapter 127.)

An extraordinary effort has been made to produce the impression that some special and unusual power of transferring its rights and property was given to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company, by the fact that the grants of land are made to it, "its successors and assigns." These are formal words used in all public and private grants of land, except that in the case of grants and conveyances to individuals the phraseology is changed from "successors and assigns" to "heirs and assigns." I have not found a railroad land grant by Congress in which the words "successors and assigns" are not used. They are used in the act of March 3, 1871, granting lands to the Texas Pacific Railway. In the Pacific railway act of July 1, 1862, it is provided in the fifteenth section that—

> Wherever the word "company" is used in this act it shall be construed to embrace the words "their associates, successors, and assigns" the same as if the word had been properly added thereto.

In the case already referred to (13 Opinions, 382) Attorney-General Akerman says:

> It is asked of what use is the word "successor" unless other parties may succeed to the Oregon Central Railroad Company in all the rights conferred by the act. If this word were new in conveyances the argument founded upon it would perhaps be irresistible; but for centuries the word "successors" has been in common use in grants to aggregate corporations. "The successors of a corporation correspond to the heirs of a natural person" (Burrill's Law Dictionary). Where a fee is intended to be conveyed to a corporation, sole or aggregate, the word "successors" corresponds as equivalent to heirs in regard to natural persons (Woodison's Lectures). The word is indeed unnecessary to convey a fee in a grant to an aggregate corporation, because the corporation itself, being immortal, the word "succession" is superfluous; nevertheless, it has commonly been inserted in such grants having probably been at first accidentally adopted from grants to corporations sole, where it was necessary to convey a fee, and its meaning is well settled. I find nothing in the context of this Congressional grant to show that the word is used here in a new or peculiar sense.

It may be asserted on eminent authority that the word "assigns," which is in fact almost if not absolutely always used in deeds of land, is unnecessary and confers no right which the grantee would not have if that word was omitted. The ownership of land does of itself include the right to assign it. In this case the use of an old and accustomed phraseology, "successors and assigns," did not of itself give the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad any additional rights. It can have conveyed nothing which it did not itself first own, and whatever it did own it could convey if the word assigns had been omitted in the conditional grant of land made to it by the Congress of 1871.

The opinion of Attorney-General Brewster in favor of the validity of the land-grant transfer in the present case is not only not binding upon anybody, but it is not something behind which any executive official can take refuge so as to escape responsibility for his own acts. The present Secretary of the Interior, in a letter (May 24, 1883) to West Steever (page 10 of Executive Document No. 31), says:

> My predecessor submitted the question as to the right of the company (New Orleans Pacific Railway) to receive the lands from the Government to the Attorney-General, who decided the question in favor of the company. The Interior Department was compelled to accept this as the law governing the case, and then it became the duty of the Department to carry out the law.

No law or practice compels the Secretary of the Interior to accept the opinion of the Attorney-General. The heads of Departments have the right to ask the opinions of the Attorney-General but are not bound to accept them, and in fact have no right to accept them unless satisfied of the correctness of the reasons upon which they are based. They are no more bound to accept them than clients are to accept the views of lawyers whose advice they seek and pay for. In the practice of the Government opinions are sometimes accepted by heads of Departments and sometimes not accepted.

There is nothing judicial in the function of giving opinions which the Attorney-General possesses, and nothing judicial in the manner in which the function is exercised. He generally hears only one side, and always acts upon a case made up for him to act upon. In this case the claim of the New Orleans Pacific Company was supported by elaborate briefs and arguments from astute, experienced, and highly paid railroad lawyers, Dillon, Green, Swayne, and Pierrepont, while the other side, which was that of the Government and the country, whose lands were the prize in controversy, was represented by nobody. The Attorney-General's mind might have been conducted to an opposite conclusion if he had got at the facts from versions of them given from both sides, and if he had heard counsel employed by the Government to look up and present all the precedents, cases, principles, and authorities adverse to the pretensions of the New Orleans Pacific Railway.

The Attorney-General was in the same unfortunate predicament in which committees of the Senate and House find themselves in hearing railroad and other cases, where great and wealthy corporations are interested on one side, and when the opposing interest is only that of the public. I have had some experience of that, and there are older Senators who have had a good deal more. The best legal talent, stimulated by munificent fees, and with ample time to hunt up all favoring precedents and authorities, appears on the side of the corporate interest, while the public interest is not represented at all on the legal points.

The papers sent to the Senate by the Interior Department contain many protests against the deed of the Barnums, of January 5, 1881, from stockholders and creditors of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, which where successively withdrawn as the protesting parties were arranged with and pacified. Some of these withdrawals were made with a suddenness which gives them an almost dramatic effect. Thus (page 33 of Executive Document 31) we find a letter dated November 18, 1881, from C. R. Bissell to the Interior Department, affirming the truth of the following statement:

> That the Directors authorizing said transfer [the deed of the Barnums] had no authority to authorize the same, and had not been duly elected within a year before said transfer was authorized, and that the parties claiming to act as directors and authorizing said transfer were in fact "mere dummies," as admitted by the secretary of said company, and were acting in the sole interest of the president and secretary.

On the same page there is another letter from him, dated on the next day, asking permission of the Interior Department to withdraw his letter of November 18, 1881, and another one of October 20, 1881, for the following assigned reasons:

> I desire to say I wish to recall both of these letters from your file, the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company having satisfactorily adjusted all matters with me as a stockholder, thus removing all objections I had, at the date of the letters referred to, to such transfer and issuing of patents.

There is another class of protesters whom it will not be so easy to quiet, and that is the settlers on the lands in controversy, who prefer to deal with the Government rather than with a railroad company. To partially quiet them there have been promises that the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company will on certain conditions and in certain cases allow them to have the land in their occupation at $2 per acre.

Hon. E. T. LEWIS, member of the House from the sixth Congressional district in Louisiana, in a letter (August 17, 1883) to the Secretary of the Interior says (page 83, Executive Document 31):

> Many of my constituents are keenly interested in what is called the Backbone land grant (to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad). They are interested from the fact that hundreds of them have settled and built in good faith on these lands, believing the grant justly and legally forfeited, and that ultimately they would be able to obtain patents therefor from the Government.

At a regular session, June 5, 1883, of the police jury of East Feliciana, in Louisiana, it was voted that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad was "a fraudulent concern, which by some adroit impecunious adventurers and speculators organized fifteen years or more ago as a tributary to the Texas Pacific, and never had any vitality except the unlimited cheek of its projectors," and that it was "a collapsed and mythical concern" attempting to transfer its lapsed rights to another company which "has constructed a line of railroad on the western bank of the Mississippi." The meeting appealed to Congress to "nullify this most iniquitous transaction."

This protest of East Feliciana was, on the 12th of June, 1883, read and adopted by the police jury of East Baton Rouge.

On the 4th of August, 1883, the police jury of Franklinton protested against the transfer of any lands in that parish to the New Orleans, Baton Rogue and Vicksburg Railroad, or to any other railroad.

With no disposition to reproach our predecessors in these Halls, and making all allowances for their overestimates of the real cost of railroads, and their underestimates of the rapidity with which railroads have become directly remunerative, I must express the feeling which is now universal that the grants of land in aid of the construction of railroads have been enormously, I might even say frightfully, excessive. The methods in which these grants have been administered by executive officials have also carried liberality to the verge of downright looseness and waste. Reversing the true rule that grants to private corporations should be construed strictly, and with a careful attention to the limitations and conditions, too many of them seem to have strained every point in favor of the railroads, and to have struggled to find how large an interpretation granting acts would possibly admit of It is not in that spirit that the rights of pre-emptors and persons seeking to acquire title under the homestead provisions have been dealt with, but they have been required to bring themselves within not only all the substantial conditions but all the most rigorous formalities prescribed in the laws under which they make their claims.

I do not mean to say that the Interior Department is more rigid than official duty compels it to be in its dealings with individuals and in its requirements from pre-emptors and homestead settlers and others of strict and formal proof of the most complete and technical compliance with all the conditions of the acts of Congress before patents are issued. Nevertheless it is true that individual cases are hung up for months, until anything lacking which ingenuity can hold to be a necessary link in the chain of evidence is supplied; but in the case of great railroad corporations, demanding millions and tens of millions of acres, everything seems to be presumed in their favor; no inquisition is made into the regularity of transactions in the most vital particulars, and where two constructions are possible the one giving the widest scope to grants seems to be invariably preferred. In this case the continued legal existence of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, notwithstanding the repeal of its charter years ago by the Legislature of Louisiana, was assumed on the mere ground of a judgment obtained without argument and rendered without reasons in a subordinate United States court, and which, however obtained, was and is binding to nobody but the parties to it.

So also the sufficiency of the deed of the Barnums, father and son, was assumed on no other basis than an authorizing vote of the directors of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company, and without the least inquiry either as to whether the directors themselves had the power, which they manifestly had not, to make such a wholesale transfer of everything which the company possessed, or as to whether, if they had such a power, they could legally delegate it to anybody else. So also no investigation was made of the questions whether the organization of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company had been regularly kept up or whether the ratification meeting of the stockholders in December, 1881, was duly called and contained the necessary quorum of bona fide stockholders. And from first to last no opportunity has been afforded by a reference to the Court of Claims or otherwise for a presentation of the legal points in favor of the rights of the United States or of the pre-emption and homestead rights of actual settlers as against the claiming railroad company, while the fullest hearing has been accorded to the elaborated arguments of the many eminent lawyers whom the company has the means and the sufficient inducement to employ.

It is to be regretted that more of that care and caution which has been exercised in giving patents for quarter-sections of land had not been shown in giving patents to railroads for areas exceeding those of powerful European monarchies. It may be useless to regret the past, but it is clearly time to call a halt in loose grants and equally loose constructions of grants of the public domain to corporations which are private in their ownership, control, and profit, however useful the enterprises in which they are engaged may be to the country.

Mr. President, I now ask to have the bill referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado moves that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAWLEY. A word or two perhaps ought to accompany the Senator's remarks. I received a letter not long ago from a respected constituent, who informed me that he had invested $10,000 in bonds of one of these roads in question, based as he supposed upon a bona fide land grant. He made inquiries. He had heard of the proposition to forfeit the grant and was quite alarmed, for he could not afford so well as some others to lose this money. I should therefore like to inquire of the Senator from Colorado whether a bill on the subject is now before the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HILL. A bill declaring a forfeiture of this land grant is before the Senate, and I propose to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is there such a bill already pending before the committee?

Mr. HILL. No. This will go there.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was under the impression that a bill was already referred, and therefore I was going to suggest that it was better to wait until that committee, which is quite an able and capable one, should have heard arguments on both sides, and should make some recommendation to the Senate. I would ask a suspension of judgment in behalf of my constituent and probably other people as badly off. I should like to see what the committee says about it before we hear strong arguments in favor of a forfeiture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is now before the Senate, being Senate bill 1448.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator from Maine to consent to laying aside informally the shipping bill that we may take up the Indian appropriation bill. I will say in addition to what I said this morning that I understand to-morrow is assigned for other business and that therefore it will be impossible for me to have the time of the Senate on the Indian appropriation bill to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator what is in his way to-morrow?

Mr. DAWES. Precisely the same thing for which the Senator from Maine yielded the shipping bill awhile ago. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] will have the floor to-morrow, under the courtesy of the Senate, according to a notice heretofore given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the pending order be laid aside informally and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. FRYE. My duty obliges me to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The shipping bill is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] desired to offer an amendment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Do I understand that the bill is being read by sections? I thought the Senate were engaged in reading the bill by sections yesterday.

Mr. FRYE. The agreement was that the reading by sections might be dispensed with and the sections merely called for amendment, and the Secretary had reached section 10, I think.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I thought the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] moved to strike out section 19.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Section 19 has not yet been reached.

Mr. FRYE. Section 10 was the section last called. Under the understanding the number of the section simply is called, and it is open then to amendment. The Senator from Missouri gave notice that he desired to offer an amendment. I ask him to leave his amendment until section 22, which is one of the amended sections, one of the sections introduced by amendment to the bill, is reached. Logically it comes much better there than here.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the status of the question as he is now informed. The bill was originally read through as in Committee of the Whole. Yesterday it was again read by general understanding by sections for amendment down to and including section 9. Section 10 will now be read for amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it was also agreed by the Senate last night that as the bill had been read once these sections need not be read but merely called by their numbers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Section 10, then, is now open to amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] granting the right to American citizens to purchase ships anywhere and of registering them as American vessels for the sea-going trade, which was voted down yesterday evening, but I shall still vote for the bill for the reason that although the bill in charge of the Senator from Maine does not go so far in favor of removing restrictions from the carrying trade as I would like, still it is a movement in that direction and I shall favor it. I favor it because I am in favor of removing restrictions from trade in any and every way save those restrictions justly and constitutionally imposed for the purpose of raising a revenue for the support of the Government economically administered, and I oppose any and every restriction whatever upon any lawful trade save and except for that purpose.

On the 25th of February, 1833, more than fifty years ago, the great champion of protection, Henry Clay, in his speech in this body in support of the tariff-compromise bill then pending, said: "The friends of free trade insist that duties should be laid in reference to revenue alone." As an honest man, despising word quibbling, he stated truly the position of his political adversaries. It is the position of the opponents of protection to special industries to-day. In that sense I am for free trade.

I know that that view of the question has but recently been met and the friends of the protection of special industries in a fair and square fight with the friends of those who believe in raising tariff for revenue alone were successful; that the opponents of special protection to special industries, the advocates of tariff for revenue alone, went down defeated but not dismayed. It is but a few hours since that I heard the stentorian voice, væ victis, uttered triumphantly by those who have always been the friends of the protection of special industries, and I did hear a weak, timid echo of "woe to the vanquished" faintly on the air from a shifting contingent without whose aid they never could have succeeded. But that does not dismay the friends of the people in their great effort.

Let not our hereditary adversaries lay the flattering unction to their souls. They did not defeat us, but defeat came from the household of our friends—friends!

The battle-ground is changed. We challenge combat in a fair field before the people, the source of all political power. We may be defeated again and again, but with the courage of conviction, daring the enemy in the very citadel of intrenched, ill-gotten power, we will triumph in the end. We have come demanding this great right in the name of a suffering people, and we have come to stay.

That the view I take may not be regarded as the view of an extremist, I have jotted down what was said by the ablest man that New England has ever yet produced on the very question of a protective tariff and an unrestricted shipping industry. Daniel Webster in his great speech on the 1st and 2d of April, 1824, in his unanswerable reply to Mr. Clay, uttered these words:

> In short, sir, the general sentiment sets with a strong current in favor of freedom of commercial intercourse and unrestrained individual action. Men yield up their notions of monopoly and restriction as they yield up their prejudices, slowly and reluctantly, but they can not withstand the general tide of opinion.

This grand man uttered this grand truth more than sixty years ago. It prevailed in 1846 and abided till 1860, and the country was never more prosperous.

It is again before the people. They are aroused; they are seeking light; they will get it, and the intrenched monopolists of to-day will yet learn that there is a greater power than wealth wrested from the people by unjust taxation—that power is the people, the source of all political power.

So I say that although we went down before monopolistic power yesterday, and although we went down yesterday evening in the effort to secure free ships, still, defeated as we were, we are not dismayed, and I trust to the people to unfurl the banner in favor of free ships, of trade with every restriction removed save that imposed for the just administration of the Government economically administered, and let them inscribe upon that banner the motto: "No tax but that honestly laid to support the Government honestly administered." In hoc signo vinces. The battle on free ships has been transferred from the Senate to the people, on the subject of a tariff for revenue alone from the House to the people. There we will meet their opponents squarely and fairly before the people, in whom is all inherent political power and by whose authority governments were instituted and for their benefit. To them we appeal, and I defy any man to strike out the enacting clause of this issue.

If there is one principle in Democracy above any other it is that the will of the majority fairly expressed is the will of the party. We accept the gage; we rely on the intelligence of the people, and in the end right, justice, without special privileges to any, with equal and exact justice to all, will prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any amendment to be proposed to section 10?

Mr. VEST. Upon yesterday I believe the amendment which I offered to that section was adopted.

Mr. FRYE. It was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The eleventh section is now open to amendment, according to the understanding.

Mr. VEST. In the eleventh section I move to strike out in lines 9, 10, 11, and 12 the words "a profit not exceeding 10 per cent. of the reasonable wholesale value of the same at the port at which the voyage commenced," and to insert "the actual cost of said article;" so as to read:

> Any of the contents of the slop-chest shall be sold, from time to time, to any or every seaman applying therefor, for his own use, at the actual cost of said article.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. VEST. I do not believe that any shipping master or owner ought to speculate to the extent of a cent upon any sailor that he ships in his crew. The intent of this measure is to advance the interests of our merchant marine and at the same time to protect the sailors of the country. The bill as it stands now permits a profit of 10 per cent. while the amendment I propose is that out of the slop-chest any of the articles shall be furnished to the sailors at the actual cost of the same.

Mr. FRYE. It seems to me that the Senator from Missouri forgets something there. Take the voyage from New York to Australia, one hundred and ten days, and necessary supplies of clothing, tobacco, &c., placed on board in New York for the voyage. There is the interest of the money; there is the depreciation of the goods; there are the goods left on hand, and all that sort of thing, to be provided for, or else it is made at the expense of the ship.

My recollection of the English slop-chest is that they allow a profit of 20 per cent. The bill allowed a profit of 25 per cent. as it passed the Senate before and as it passed the committee. It was stricken this year down to 10 per cent., and surely 10 per cent is not excessive for all those contingencies. I am very sure that the English allow a profit of 20 per cent., and equally sure that the bill as it passed before allowed a profit of 20 or 25 per cent.

Mr. VEST. Twenty per cent.

Mr. FRYE. It was 20 per cent. before, and we have reduced it here to 10 per cent. I do not believe it would be reasonable or just to reduce it any more than 10 per cent. I do not think that would cover the depreciation or loss.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment suggested to section 11, section 12 is open to amendment. [A pause.] If no amendment be proposed to section 12, section 13 is open to amendment. [A pause.] If no amendment be proposed to section 13, section 14 is open to amendment.

Mr. VEST. That is the section in regard to the tonnage tax. It is a very important portion of the bill and it should receive the very earnest and serious consideration of the Senate. This is a war tax. In 1830 the Government of the United States took off the tonnage tax, and from 1830 to 1862 our shipping steadily increased. The history of this legislation is contained in a pamphlet, which I have before me, very succinct, and it is to this effect: The acts passed upon this subject by Congress bear date 1815, 1830, 1832, and 1862. The act approved March 30, 1815, repealed the then existing legislation imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on "goods, wares, and merchandise" imported into the United States, in so far as it discriminates between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, the repeal to take effect when the President is satisfied that the foreign nation to which such ship belongs has abolished all discriminating or countervailing duties to the prejudice of the United States.

The act approved May 31, 1830, next in time, provided in section 1 that no duties should be levied upon ships and vessels of the United States where the officers and two-thirds of the crew were citizens of the United States; and section 2 provided that no such duties should be imposed upon ships and vessels of foreign nations, provided, however, that no discriminating or countervailing duties existed in such foreign nations to the disadvantage of the United States. The words "goods, wares, and merchandise," contained in the act of 1815, were dropped in the act of 1830. By the act of June 13, 1832, provision was made for refunding duties improperly exacted, and the President was charged with the execution of the act of 1830. Then comes the act of 1862, which is the existing statute. That was a war tax, adopted in time of war, imposing a duty of 30 cents upon each ton of shipping that came into the United States ports. There is no necessity for any such law.

Mr. BECK. I desire the Senator to give a synopsis of that law and state how far this section will relieve our own ships without relieving those of foreign nations.

Mr. VEST. I am coming to that point now.

Mr. BECK. I was afraid you would pass it.

Mr. VEST. In all the discussion we have had in committee for two years past in regard to the tonnage tax, while we agreed unanimously, without one single dissenting voice, that the tonnage tax should be removed from American shipping, yet the objection has always been made that, as we carried now in American bottoms but 15.5 per cent. of all our exports, if we removed the tonnage tax it would inure almost entirely to the benefit of foreign shipping. In answer to that I have simply to say that it is more in the nature of retaliation when put upon that ground than a basis of sound statesmanship or good policy. To-day no nation in the world asks of us to do more than to treat our shipping as it treats its shipping. England imposes what is called a light-house tax upon all ships that enter her ports, but no tonnage duty whatever.

Now, I have drawn an amendment which I think meets this case.

Mr. BECK. The English law applies to our own ships too.

Mr. VEST. Upon our own ships and all others. Every vessel that enters a port of Great Britain pays a light-house tax. Instead of making our ships and foreign ships pay a light-house tax upon entering the ports of the United States, we levy upon them this tonnage tax which was imposed in 1862.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It is imposed upon all ships alike.

Mr. VEST. Upon all ships alike; there is no distinction. Under our treaties between the United States and Great Britain and other foreign nations we have agreed to make no distinction as between our shipping and theirs. They are put upon the same basis; and that has been the objection always. The amendment I propose is to strike out section 14 and to insert in lieu thereof:

> That from and after the passage of this act no duties upon the tonnage of vessels of the United States shall be levied or collected, and all acts and parts of acts imposing duties upon the tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States shall, from and after the passage of this act, be repealed. That, from and after the passage of this act, all laws and parts of laws imposing duties upon the tonnage of vessels of foreign nations so far as the same relate simply and purely to tonnage duties shall be repealed; but if any tonnage duties are imposed on vessels of the United States as light-money or light-house tax in the ports of foreign nations the Secretary of the Treasury shall ascertain what nations levy such duties on vessels of the United States, and a duty for light-money or light-house tax of 30 cents per ton per annum shall be levied and collected from the vessels of such nations visiting or entering the ports of the United States.

In other words, where a foreign nation under any guise, whether they call it tonnage tax or light-house money, impose a duty upon vessels of the United States, then under this amendment the same duty as light-house money can be imposed upon the vessels of that nation entering our ports. It puts American vessels and foreign vessels upon the same basis, is entirely equitable, and in my judgment is the very best of all the measures that we can adopt to-day toward relieving the extraordinary impositions and taxations now put upon the ships of the United States.

The provision in the bill before the Senate changes the existing law so as to put this tax upon vessels as they enter each port of the United States. One of the great complaints made before our committee when in session in New York was that the steamship lines which make a trip once each month, for instance, or ten trips a year, only pay 30 cents annually per ton while the schooners and sailing vessels that go upon long voyages, probably entering a home port only twice in a year, pay the same tax; which is manifestly unjust and inequitable, and in so far as the pending bill makes a change in that regard I am entirely in accord with it and approve of it.

Mr. BAYARD. The tax is annual?

Mr. VEST. It is annual now.

Mr. BECK. Why do you fix 30 cents?

Mr. VEST. That is the amount which has been fixed by the law. It is changed in the bill now before the Senate. Section 14 of the bill provides:

That in lieu of the tax on tonnage of 30 cents per ton per annum heretofore imposed by law, a duty of 3 cents per ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 15 cents per ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from the West India Islands or the Bermuda Islands, or from any port or place in the Republic of Mexico or from any port or place south of Mexico down to and including Aspinwall and Panama, or from any port or place in the Dominion of Canada or Newfoundland, or from the Sandwich Islands; and a duty of 6 cents per ton is hereby imposed at each entry on all vessels which shall be entered in the United States from any other foreign port, not to exceed in the aggregate 30 cents per ton in any one year.

That is the limitation—

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal sections 2793 and 4220 of the Revised Statutes: And provided further, That the vessels herein named which shall have paid their tonnage tax for the current year, as heretofore provided, shall not be liable to the tax herein levied until the expiration of the certificate of last payment of said tax. And sections 4223 and 4224, and so much of section 4219 of the Revised Statutes as conflicts with this section, are hereby repealed.

Those are the sections in regard to the imposition of the annual tonnage tax of 30 cents. I see nothing in my amendment which conflicts with any treaty or any comity which should exist between nations or any principle of international law, and it will do more to relieve these unnecessary burdens from our ships and put them upon a footing with the vessels of other nations than any other specific or individual act of legislation which we can adopt.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I ask the Senator from Missouri——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Missouri to offer an amendment?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; I offer a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For section 14?

Mr. VEST. For section 14.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out section 14 and insert in lieu thereof:

That from and after the passage of this act no duties upon the tonnage of vessels of the United States shall be levied or collected, and all acts and parts of acts imposing duties upon the tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States shall from and after the passage of this act be repealed, and that from and after the passage of this act all laws and parts of laws imposing duties upon the tonnage of vessels of foreign nations, so far as the same relate simply and purely to tonnage duties, shall be repealed, and if any tonnage duties are imposed on vessels of the United States as light-money or light-house tax in the ports of foreign nations, the Secretary of the Treasury shall ascertain what nations levy such duties on vessels of the United States, and a duty for light-money or light-house tax of 30 cents per ton per annum shall be levied and collected from the vessels of such nation visiting ports of the United States: Provided, That all such vessels which shall have paid the tonnage tax imposed by section 4219 of the Revised Statutes for the current year shall not be liable to the tax herein named until the expiration of the certificate of last payment of said tax.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether we are permitted under our treaty regulations with foreign nations to make the invidious distinction which is made in the bill in favor of vessels trading with the West India Islands, Mexico, Canada, and the Sandwich Islands, on which the aggregate tax is 15 cents per ton, while on other vessels the aggregate is 30 cents?

Mr. VEST. I have offered the amendment as a substitute for this section of the bill. My amendment is to take the place of this section. Whether this is consistent with the treaties I am not entirely prepared to state. There may be some conflict in the clause the Senator suggests, but that provision of the bill is entirely left out of the amendment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. As I understand our treaty regulations with foreign nations with respect to "the most favored nation" clause, this bill simply abrogates in effect, so far as the legislation of Congress can do it, the provisions already existing in treaties. I would ask the Senator from Maine to examine very closely into that matter before progressing any further in this legislation.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in 1815 we made a treaty with Great Britain which touches this question. The twelfth article of the treaty is as follows:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

In 1818 the treaty was extended for the period of ten years. In 1827 this article was continued indefinitely, subject to be terminated on a year's notice by either of the powers.

It will be noticed that the reciprocity between the United States and Great Britain upon this question extends only to his majesty's territories in Europe, not elsewhere in the world. That treaty never was a fair one between the United States and Great Britain, even at the time it was ratified. It gave that government very greatly the advantage of us by giving them the right to discriminate against our citizens, if they chose to do it, in all of their Asiatic possessions. While the treaty stands and until we put an end to it there should be a proviso put in the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, I think, that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to interfere with any treaty obligation existing between us and any foreign power. I do not believe, however, that we should have the right in this case to transfer, if I may use that expression, our tonnage tax to a light-house duty on the order of the Secretary of the Treasury when he found there was any discrimination against us in the way of light-house duties in foreign countries or when he found that we were being taxed for light-house purposes in any foreign country. I think the language of the amendment ought to be modified in that particular; perhaps a general saving of the effect of treaties will be the best. I hope that it will not be a great while until this treaty with Great Britain at least is revamped, rearranged.

Mr. MILLER, of California. This clause is in almost all other treaties in the same language.

Mr. FRYE. I think there are one or two treaties that have similar language.

Mr. MORGAN. It may be similar language, but it can not be the same language, because this confines the right to the territories of Great Britain in Europe, and not in other parts of the world. The general substance of this provision is in our treaties with several of the great powers, modified, however, very materially in our treaties with France. We have a special arrangement with France, growing out, I believe, of the Louisiana imbroglio, by which we made a better arrangement with that country than with Great Britain.

I suggest to the Senator from Missouri to amend his amendment so as to provide that nothing contained in it shall be construed to interfere in any way with treaty stipulations.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not understand the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to require any alteration of that kind. I confess my inability to hear the Senator from Alabama, and I did not understand all his conclusions in the matter. I now ask the Senator if his conclusion went to the extent of saying that the bill would be an infringement upon treaty stipulation as originally reported by the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know that it would be any infringement of treaty stipulation, but it would sometimes put the Secretary of the Treasury in rather an awkward position, for here is a positive provision that where light-house duties are charged against us in any foreign countries he shall charge tonnage duties on ships of that country coming into our ports. It gives him power to discriminate, and of course imposes upon him some obligation. I think a proviso in the amendment that nothing contained in it shall be construed as authorizing or requiring any infraction of any treaty with foreign powers would be a valuable clause.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to amend the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, which provides, if I understand it aright, that a tax shall be put on foreign tonnage coming here to the same extent which may be charged against United States vessels in foreign ports. The Senator from Maine in his bill proposes a discriminating tonnage tax, which I regard as indefensible. Now, let me propose a compromise between the two by making the aggregate 15 cents a ton; and to do that I would strike out after the word "from," in line 6, down to and including the word "year," in line 14, and insert simply the words "from any foreign port;" so as to read—

That in lieu of the tax on tonnage of 30 cents per ton per annum, heretofore imposed by law, a duty of 3 cents per ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 15 cents per ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from any foreign port.

Then I would add:

Provided, The tax so imposed shall not be less than the tax imposed by foreign nations upon American ships in their ports.

That would be simply making the tax 15 cents a ton on all our foreign commerce, not going to the extent the Senator from Missouri proposes to do, of striking it off entirely, but striking a moderate middle ground between the position of the Senator from Maine and that of the Senator from Missouri, and making no discrimination whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey desire to submit that amendment?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will do so.

Mr. BECK. I desire the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] while the amendment is being prepared, as I see the Senator from Maine is about to take the floor. I desire him while he is explaining this matter to tell us how far in his judgment we can not only relieve the taxation upon American tonnage without involving relief being given to the vessels of all foreign nations, but how far we can secure pilotage for our ships without the compulsory pilotage now existing. This is the idea I have in my mind that I desire him to say a word about: If an American ship, as I understand it, in the coastwise trade has a thoroughly competent pilot, that ship is not compelled to employ a pilot at high charges. If that same pilot is on an American ship—having that right to bring in a ship coming from New Orleans—that comes from Havana, she can not have him bring her in, but is compelled to employ a pilot to bring her into the port of New York. I want to know how far we can relieve in that respect, my object being to relieve our own ships as far as we can from overcharges for tonnage or pilotage or what not. When the Senator from Maine takes the floor on the amendment, I want him to show how far we can go in that direction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey desire to propose an amendment?

Mr. VEST. I wish permission of the Senate to withdraw the amendment which I submitted and offer another in lieu of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri withdraws his amendment.

Mr. VEST. And I offer in lieu of it what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 14 and in lieu thereof to insert:

That from and after the passage of this act no duties upon the tonnage of vessels of the United States shall be levied or collected, and all acts and parts of acts imposing duties upon the tonnage of ships or vessels of the United States shall from and after the passage of this act be repealed; and whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that no tonnage dues are imposed on or exacted from vessels of the United States by any foreign nation, either directly or indirectly, as light-money or otherwise, the Secretary shall thereupon cease to collect all tonnage dues that are imposed by any existing law upon the vessels of such nation which may enter any port of the United States: Provided, That no treaty between the United States and any foreign nation shall be in any way impaired or violated by such action on the part of the Government of the United States.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, it is taking a great deal of risk to undertake at call on the floor of the Senate when a bill is under consideration to substitute a new section for section 14 of this bill. There are so many considerations, there are such serious questions as to our relations with other countries, there is so much question as to what our rights are in the premises, that I do not think the Senator from Missouri will give it as his opinion as a lawyer that we can do, for instance, what the first amendment proposed by him authorized to be done.

For several years this very subject has been under consideration, because this tax is nothing but a war tax—30 cents a ton on every vessel every year. But the first consideration which came into view was that on every sailing vessel it was a discrimination as five to one against the sailing vessel. For instance, the sailing vessel comes into port ordinarily not oftener than once a year. She makes one round voyage in a year; she pays, a two-thousand-ton ship, $600 for that year. The English ship Oregon, or any of those English ships plying between Liverpool and New York, coming here ten times a year, carrying ten times the freight of sailing ships, getting ten times the advantage in every other way, pays no more than a sailing vessel which comes in once. That is a discrimination everybody could see, and everybody was willing it should be removed.

Then, again, there was a large class of vessels trading between the United States and Canada, on the lakes and on the coast, simply sailing across a river, and it seemed to be an outrage that a tax of 30 cents a ton should be levied on a vessel if it sailed across a river into a foreign port, when not a dollar is levied there. There is no tonnage tax on a coastwise vessel if she confines herself to the coastwise trade and does not cross the river to Canada. That seemed unjust.

These questions have been carefully considered, and my judgment is that the weight of opinion with commercial men, with lawyers, is that we can not discriminate in favor of our own and against the vessels of a foreign nation under the treaty clauses which are in existence to-day with several foreign nations. I think that is the fair weight of opinion. At any rate, there is a very serious question whether or not it can be done.

The House of Representatives undertook to remove that to a certain extent. The House bill is precisely like the Senate bill in this respect until it reaches the proviso, and I should like to have Senators hear this proviso in the House bill:

Provided, That the President of the United States shall suspend the collection of so much of the duty herein imposed on vessels entered from any port in the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, the Bahama Islands, the Bermuda Islands, the West India Islands, Mexico, and Central America, down to and including Aspinwall and Panama, as may be in excess of the tonnage and light-house dues or other equivalent tax or taxes imposed on American vessels by the government of the foreign country in which such port is situated, and shall upon the passage of this act, and from time to time thereafter as often as it may become necessary by reason of changes in the laws of the foreign countries above mentioned, indicate by proclamation the ports to which such suspension shall apply, and the rate or rates of tonnage duty, if any, to be collected under such suspension.

An authority to the President of the United States to suspend the collection of any tax whenever these foreign countries indicated that they had no tax upon our tonnage. Now, the fact is that Great Britain to-day collects of every vessel that comes into her ports just twice the amount we propose to collect from vessels coming into our ports as light duties. Where we collect 6 cents at an entry she collects 12 cents at an entry. A vessel paying $60, making ten passages between here and Europe, an English vessel, would pay us under this bill only $30 a year, and our American vessel going into an English port pays her $120 for the same year.

Mr. BECK. Do their own vessels pay that?

Mr. FRYE. I do not know whether they do or not. The French vessels do not. They discriminate in favor of the French and make them pay just one-half what they charge us, and allege that it is by virtue of a treaty made years ago.

We collected $1,400,000 from this tonnage tax last year without any modification of the law, $300,000 of which came from our vessels and $1,100,000 came from foreign vessels. A repeal of the tonnage tax as a matter of course takes out of our Treasury $1,400,000. Under the first clause of this section about the tonnage tax, reducing it to 3 cents an entry, not to exceed 15 cents a year, our vessels would not pay next year over $75,000 of tonnage tax altogether, while the foreign vessels would pay their full complement of $1,100,000. It is very hard work to convince the average man who looks at the Treasury of the United States that you ought to give away $1,100,000 to a government that taxes us $2,200,000 if we have the same number of vessels entering there in order to save our vessels $75,000. There is the problem.

The action of the House seemed to be very decisive as to their opinion in this matter. So far as I see, the United States in this bill is giving to ships sailing under the American flag $100,000 consular fees, $400,000 hospital fees, nothing under the postal act, because the credit balances the debit. Now reserve your tonnage tax as this section reserves it here, and the United States giving the full benefit of every section of this bill to American ships will do it at no cost to itself whatever, but from the tonnage tax collected from foreign ships there will be a balance of at least $700,000 after you have done this for American vessels. I think that had great weight in the minds of very many members of Congress. You take a vessel to-day sailing from New York to Liverpool, an American vessel, and she pays 12 cents a ton for light dues; you take under this bill a foreign vessel sailing to New York from Liverpool, and she pays 6 cents an entry provided that all the entries shall not exceed 30 cents.

I do not myself believe that this section ought to be amended. It is the result of careful consideration, of grave deliberation by several committees of Congress. It was believed by those committees to be the best that under all the circumstances we could clearly do. This we can do without any question of treaty or anything else, and with the money collected from foreign vessels and doing them no prejudice or harm, those nations collecting more of us than we do of them, we can pay every single dollar of benefit to the American vessels provided for in this bill and still leave a balance in the Treasury of the United States, including the subsidy clause, if any Senator calls it so, and all.

Now as to the pilotage of which the Senator from Kentucky speaks. I have been making a fight for twelve years to repeal the compulsory pilotage laws. The trouble is that the United States relegated all this matter to the States almost a hundred years ago, and to-day the States have absolute control of the pilotage laws. I admit that the exactions are the greatest and grossest outrages that are to-day committed upon American vessels. But, sir, if you undertake to put a provision on that subject in this bill you will find that the bill will bristle all up and the enemies will come up quicker than the bristles in the bill and you will find one of the stoutest and hardest lobbies in the other House, and another one in this, "in season and out of season," fighting every provision of your bill, because the repeal of compulsory pilotage is in it. The New York pilots were able to fight successfully the Albany Legislature for over three months when they simply asked a reduction of pilotage fees down to what they were three years after the war was over, when everything else had gone down more than two-thirds; and yet for three months they fought that Legislature, and had power enough to do it. The Senator would find the Senators from Florida, both of them, the Senators from Texas, very likely the Senators from Delaware, the Senators from New York, the Senators from Boston coming up in defense of the present pilotage system.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me? What I want to get at is if a pilot has a license to bring a ship coming from New Orleans into the port of New York, why should not that same man be able to bring in a ship from Cuba? It applies, as I understand, only to foreign trade. I can not see in propriety how any distinction can be made against it.

Mr. FRYE. No; the pilotage applies to all the coasting trade.

Mr. BECK. Compulsory pilotage?

Mr. FRYE. Oh, yes.

Mr. BECK. I thought they were all free from it.

Mr. FRYE. No. The captain of a schooner coming from Maine going down to Pensacola who perhaps knows more about the harbor of Pensacola than any man that lives in Florida, and who can go right straight into it by night or by day, is compelled to pay on that schooner from $50 to $80 pilotage in and $50 to $80 pilotage out; then he takes a steam-tug five miles out of port and pays the steam-tug with a licensed pilot on board $50 to take him in and then hires another steam-tug and pays that steam-tug $50 with a licensed pilot to take him out.

Mr. BECK. I only displayed my ignorance on the details. I am following the committee in all these matters and propose to do whatever they say is best. I had supposed it was only as to the foreign trade that you made pilotage compulsory. I had never looked into it. It seems to me an enormous tax, and if it can be avoided in any way, I should be glad to see it done.

Mr. FRYE. The tax paid to pilots to-day is larger than the profit paid by any coasting steamer engaged in trade, and has been for years. I own a part of two or three schooners, having purchased the interests myself. I received only a week ago an account from the agent, and I find that the pilotage fees were twice as large as the profits paid by the vessel on three round voyages.

But, Mr. President, there is a bill on that subject pending to-day, a just and fair one, before the Committee on Commerce. It has been reported favorably in the House of Representatives. I do not think any friend of the pilots can object to it. That is simply this: Under the law now the master or mate of a coastwise steamer may be examined as a pilot, and if he passes he may pilot his own steam-vessel. This bill to which I refer simply provides that on sailing vessels, if the master or mate passes an examination and gets a certificate as a skilled pilot for any particular port or harbor, he may be permitted to be his own pilot. That bill is before the Committee on Commerce now, and it has been reported favorably in the House.

Mr. BECK. I had read that somewhere and thought it was the law.

Mr. FRYE. No; it is not quite. I admit that the Senator from Missouri is just as good a friend to American ships as I am; I admit he has the same earnest desire to do what can be done legally for the benefit of American ships. I would like to support his amendment to this bill, but I have serious doubts about it. I like the section in the House bill better than I do our own in the Senate bill, and I think better than I do the Senator's last proposed amendment. That to-day would relieve every vessel on the lakes, the St. Lawrence River, or our coast, trading with Canada, because to-day Canada has no charges against American vessels.

But the amendment of the Senator from Missouri proposes to relieve all our vessels from the tonnage tax, no matter where they trade, and then authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to impose a tax upon foreign tonnage. I doubt the power of the Secretary to lay that affirmative tax. I would keep the taxes on foreign vessels as they stand to-day, with authority to the President to relieve them in case they relieve us. That will give us enough to meet all the provisions contained in this section, so that it will not be any expense to the Treasury. The Senator's last amendment will do that. It will give us $600,000 from tonnage tax, because we are only relieved by one country to-day, and that is Canada. Mexico will undoubtedly relieve us before a great while. Very likely the South American States will relieve us before a great while. In any event, it will leave us $600,000. England will not relieve us. She gets too much money from us, and has not any desire to see us grow in any direction. So I say I like the Senator's second amendment better than the first. I think I shall be obliged myself to vote against any amendments, but when the House bill is under consideration I shall ask the Senate to accept the House section as it came from the House.

Mr. CALL. I would ask the Senator from Maine if he does not think that the tonnage tax is paid by our own people, and the higher we make it the more we tax ourselves? Does not a foreign vessel trading to our ports impose upon the merchandise she brings here the amount of tonnage and all other dues, and does she not charge to our country the freight charge and the amount of tonnage duties and other dues required to be paid, so that it is in effect a tax upon ourselves, and the higher we put it the more we pay? I should like to suggest to my friend if it would not strictly be in our own favor if we imposed precisely the same degree of charge, whatever it was, upon foreign vessels here that is imposed upon our vessels by the same foreign nations?

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Florida understands that the United States imposes no tax for light duties or anything of that kind upon anybody. The United States Government very generously furnishes all the lights and buoys and monuments and things of that kind without making charge against anybody for them. We are relieved from all that sort of thing, which is not true of France, or Germany, or England, or any great nation on the sea. I think they all have an imposition for those several appliances for the benefit of navigation, and we have none.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I just want to say a word in reply to the Senator from Maine about the pilot system. The difficulties of this question are so obvious that it would not be wise to have the subject regulated by act of Congress. The Senator speaks of Congress having relegated it to the States. He is greatly in error. I would say that the States always exercised the power of regulating pilotage.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Was there not an act of Congress doing that very thing which I speak of?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No; the act of Congress simply recognized the pre-existing rule and authority of the States over the subject, but Congress never did regulate it and never did relegate it to the States.

Mr. FRYE. Congress confirmed it to the States.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Before the adoption of the Constitution, under the colonial system, the pilotage was regulated by the Colonies independent of the government that existed under the confederation. After the organization of the new government in 1789, while Congress took up nearly every other subject relating to commerce, it recognized all the previous authority of the Colonies or the States over this subject, because it discovered that no uniform law could well be made that would apply to it, and from that day to this there has been no change in the system.

Now the Senator says that some of the masters of ships that go to Southern ports are as well acquainted with the harbors as the pilots themselves. That may be true, but he must remember that the coast vessels of the United States sailing under American licenses enjoy a monopoly of that trade, and that the port charges and the pilot charges attending this commerce all come out of the man who pays the freight, in the end, and not out of the ship-owner. There is no competition in this business between licensed vessels under the American flag and any other vessels. They have an absolute monopoly of the trade, and I do not wish to deprive them of it. Every charge attending this system of commerce along the coast is ultimately paid by the people, who from necessity are compelled to employ those vessels to do their business. It is necessary for the preservation of life and property, because, as I had occasion to say in a former debate, if Congress were to come in with one uniform law to regulate this subject and take away from the States the right to regulate pilotage, you would expose life and property to absolute peril along the whole Southern coast; the pilots would have to disband; and while one ship might be able to go in under the management and control of a particularly skilled master from the State of my honorable friend from Maine, another vessel that came there commanded by an ignorant or it might be by an unskilled person would have to run the perils of the harbor and go without the protection which this system secures to all. It was, I suppose, because of the inherent difficulty of this subject that Congress left the matter entirely with the States; no attempt has ever been made to take it from them until the present time, and I do not think it would be wise to do it now.

Mr. VEST. In a treatise written by David A. Wells on the subject of the commercial marine of the United States he gives an example of the difference between a foreign vessel and a vessel owned in the United States in the matter of fees and duties paid by the respective vessels in one of our ports. To any one who has not examined this question, who has not given any more attention to it than that which is excited by reading some sporadic article in a newspaper, the statement of Mr. Wells as derived, according to his authority, from the owner of an American schooner, is absolutely incredible. One vessel was being loaded in an American port in New England; the other was lying there without a cargo, although it was ready and more than willing to take any sort of freight that should be offered. In reply to the inquiry put by Mr. Wells to the captain and owner of the American ship as to why he was not loaded like the foreign rival alongside of him, he took Mr. Wells into his cabin and gave him his expenses, besides the difference in the cost of construction, which in that case was very little, and, if any, was in favor of the American ship, it being a wooden vessel. He gave him his running expenses, and among others the tonnage tax, which amounted to more than all the rest put together.

The Committee on Commerce, of which the Senator from Maine and myself are both members, made a report through the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] upon a bill for the relief of American shipping in the Forty-seventh Congress, first session, Report No. 499, and the conclusion of our committee at that time upon this subject was that "surely there is no such existing necessity in our Treasury as requires the retention of the war tax known as 'tonnage.'" I believe the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] was not then a member of the committee.

Mr. FRYE. I concurred in the conclusion.

Mr. VEST. The conclusion was that there is no necessity for the retention of this tax, a war tax upon American shipping.

Let us look at it and see what is the practical result. We have started in for the purpose of putting an American ship upon an equality with a foreign vessel, and though my amendment for "free ships" has been defeated the Senator from Maine does me no more than justice when he says I am just as much a friend to-day of American ships as any Senator can possibly be, and as much so as if my amendment, in which I honestly believed, had been placed upon the bill. That amendment having been defeated, all that we can hope to do now is to remove the burdens off the running expenses of an American ship. The testimony before our committee in New York, and declared over and over again upon this floor, is to the effect that if we were given vessels under our present ship laws we could not sail them at a profit and we could not successfully compete with the merchant marine of other nations. There is now before the Senate the principal burden in the running expenses of an American ship. I read from the report to which I have alluded, coming unanimously from our committee, and I ask Senators who feel the slightest interest in this question to listen:

As an illustration of the burdens our vessels labor under, take the schooner L. A. Boardman, built at Calais, Me., and trading with Canada. Her tonnage is 112.74 tons. She pays as follows:

Measurement and first papers:
Enrollment and bond	$1 10
Passenger permits	1 20
Admeasurement	15 00
Clearance for the provinces to load:
Register and bond	2 25
Certified list of crew	65
Clearance for	2 50
Blanks	40
Bills paid on entry back from the provinces:
Entry from	2 50
Hospital money, one month, five men	2 00
Tonnage	33 60
Surveyor's fee	20
Permit to land	20
Protections oath	20
Bill of health	10
Change papers back to coasting license:
Enrollment and bond	1 10
License for	1 20
Total	64 40

Of which $33.60 was tonnage tax. Is there any Senator who pretends to justify an imposition like that? All these are extraordinary impositions upon an American ship. An English vessel pays none of them. An English vessel pays her light-house money and that is the end of it, and here are all these insectivorous annoyances. An American vessel can not touch the soil of the country to which she belongs without paying 10 cents for the privilege. She can not change a paper without paying from 50 cents to a dollar and a half. She pays a hospital tax; but considerably more than one-half of this whole amount, that is $33.60, is the tonnage tax.

As to the provisions of this bill I have here a pamphlet coming from Boyd & Hincken, F. Alexandre & Sons, William P. Clyde & Co., and Vernon H. Brown & Co., all of them largely interested in American shipping. They say:

Even the proposed tax of 3 and 6 cents per ton on each entry would be more oppressive upon our shipping interests than upon the foreign. Foreign shipping companies with large capital, regular trade, and experienced seamen, can successfully compete with American shipping interests, which now are again struggling for supremacy, as they did in their infancy, more than half a century ago.

The opinion of these gentlemen is that the bill now pending before the Senate is more oppressive than the existing law and more oppressive upon American ships than upon foreign ships.

But one significant fact, and then I shall have nothing more to say about it. In 1830 when we took off the tonnage tax there was an increase of the commercial marine of the United States which increased onward and went upward to 1860. From the time that the tonnage tax was taken off to 1860 our tonnage in the merchant marine increased from 1,260,000 tons to nearly 6,000,000—to five million and five hundred and seventy-odd thousand tons. It is a significant fact that with the removal of this very tax the merchant marine of this country commenced its career of prosperity to 1855 and 1860.

It is admitted that this tax is wrong. There is no question about that. It is admitted that it is a war tax. It is admitted that there is no necessity for it. Our Committee on Commerce were unanimous upon it. As the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] very justly remarked, every dollar that we put upon foreign vessels in the shape of a tonnage tax (and the argument is that they must not be relieved) is collected by them from our own people. It is said now, in the spirit of retaliation, that we must not relieve American ships, because that takes the tax off foreign vessels. My idea is that we are engaged now in an attempt to build up American ships. Once more we want our flag upon the ocean. Here is the principal object, in my judgment. Yet we are told that because a foreign vessel is to be relieved, therefore we are not to take this tax off the American ships. That is equivalent to the argument made by my eloquent friend from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] yesterday, when he floated the starry banner of our common country here for three-quarters of an hour in rhetoric unsurpassed, but unsupported, unfortunately, by facts. The bunting of the United States, which he said in a very few years in spite of all laws would float upon every wave of every ocean upon the whole globe—that sacred bunting, the material composing it, is taxed by the present tariff from 77 to 132 per cent.—the flag of our common country.

The Senator made the most remarkable statement that we must not have free ships (which was the subject then before the Senate) because it would help Great Britain irrespective of its effect upon the ships of the United States, and he appealed even to the Irishmen and wanted to know if any Irishman could sustain any such policy as that which would put money into the pockets of British ship-builders. Yet under the present system we are paying to Great Britain $100,000,000 every year for carrying our products across the ocean. If any system could be invented by mortal man that would pay more money to Great Britain than the one we have to-day I should like some ingenious gentleman to point it out. To-day Great Britain does more than one-half of our carrying trade. I have some right to speak for the Irish, more than the Senator from Kansas, both by lineage and political affinity. Whatever may be said about the Irish people, they are not fools, and they know every one of them that a system which puts $100,000,000 annually as the profits of the carrying trade into the pockets of British ship-owners is the thing that Great Britain wants to continue, and Great Britain would be idiotic if she did not want our present system to exist as long as possible.

That same sort of argument is applied here now. It is said, "Do not take off the tonnage tax, because we must at the same time take it off foreign vessels." My object from the beginning to the end of this whole debate, and in this whole shipping investigation, has been to bring back the merchant marine of the United States to something like its former condition; and when we attempt to do that we are met by the miserable pretense that we must not take one step for the benefit of the merchant marine of the United States, because it may inure in some degree to the benefit of foreign ship-owners. First let us get back our merchant marine; first let us bring our flag back in some degree to the ocean; first let us take off this tax, the greatest incubus to-day upon the owning and running of ships by Americans, and then after we have done that, after we have brought ships back to the ocean with our flag upon them, we may, if we please, say to foreign nations, "We shut out your shipping and retaliate upon you for any laws which you may have."

The amendment which I propose saves all treaty rights and stipulations. There can be no objection to it upon that ground; and if it is adopted, as I said before, it will do more to remove the inequalities existing to-day between our ships and those of foreign nations than any portion of the measure before the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. Since I addressed the Senate I have taken from the desk the Senator's amendment. I misunderstood even his second amendment. I find by the second amendment that he does not remove the tonnage tax from foreign vessels; that he simply removes the tonnage tax from American vessels, leaving it on foreign vessels, to be removed in the future if they remove theirs from us.

Mr. VEST. Certainly; that is put in.

Mr. FRYE. I shall make no objection to the amendment.

Mr. VEST. It is a modification of the substitute. I understood that the Senator objected to both of them.

Mr. FRYE. I make no objection to the amendment as I now see it reads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the next section.

The SECRETARY. Section 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there amendments to section 15? If not, the Secretary will call the next section.

The SECRETARY. Section 16.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there amendments to be proposed to section 16? The Chair hears none; and the Secretary will call the next section.

The SECRETARY. Section 17.

Mr. VEST. I wish to call the attention of my friend from Maine to section 17. The language is:

When a vessel is built in the United States for foreign account, wholly or partly of foreign materials on which import duties have been paid, there shall be allowed on such vessel when exported, a drawback, &c.

That I suppose is intended to apply to vessels which are built in this country for foreigners.

Mr. FRYE. Yes; built by contract.

Mr. VEST. After the word "account," in line 2 of section 17, I move to insert the words "or for use exclusively in the foreign trade;" and in line 4 to strike out the words "when exported;" so as to read:

When a vessel is built in the United States for foreign account, or for use exclusively in the foreign trade, wholly or partly of foreign materials on which import duties have been paid, there shall be allowed on such vessel a drawback equal in amount to the duty paid on such materials, to be ascertained under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. FRYE. There are two very distinct propositions there and hardly connected in interest one with the other—one a drawback and the other a rebate. I hope the Senator will not press that amendment to this section. This is intended to cure but one existing evil, and it is a very great evil. Section 3019 of the Revised Statutes provides:

There shall be allowed on all articles wholly manufactured of materials imported, on which duties have been paid, when exported, a drawback equal in amount to the duty paid on such materials.

That law has been amended some eight or ten times by allowing certain articles to receive a drawback where they have contained some home product, like plows, mowing-machines, &c. On the Delaware they are building a great many vessels for the South American service, and they have been building them under that section. The Secretary of the Treasury construes the law so that if they put on American plank in one of those vessels they get no drawback whatever. This section simply provides "wholly or in part," so that they may use what American materials they find convenient and handy and what foreign materials they must use, and get the drawback on the foreign materials which are used. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri covers a very much larger ground. It allows a drawback of duty on everything that is purchased in a foreign market to go into a ship of any kind.

Mr. VEST. For the foreign trade.

Mr. FRYE. For the foreign trade. That excludes all the larger sized vessels and practically is the Senator's free-material amendment. I hope he will not insist on trying that on this section. The free-material amendment is not of so much consequence as some Senators are disposed to think. In 1872, as the result of a special committee's investigation, we had a section of law allowing almost everything which was necessarily purchased abroad for the building of a ship to be imported free of duty for the use of the ship. There were, for instance, brass, copper, sheathing, yellow metal, hemp, jute, steel, band, hoop, and bar iron, and a large number of things; and yet in 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, and 1883 almost the entire importations under the provisions of that free-material clause were confined to copper, yellow metal. There was of yellow-metal one year, one hundred and eighty-one thousand dollars' worth; another year, one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars' worth; another, ninety-one thousand dollars' worth; another, three hundred and thirty thousand dollars' worth; another, two hundred and twenty-six thousand dollars' worth; and yet all the rest of the importations allowed under that law did not exceed $50,000 in any one year.

The nearest you can get to a raw material, that is one thing; but when you undertake to give ship-builders, and regard it as any special benefit to them, the right to buy the perfected material ready for the ship, in my judgment you are not doing the country or the ship-builder himself any special favor. Those things must be made at home in our own yards. Take for instance the plates on a ship. There never were two ships that had the same sized plates, and there never was one ship that had two plates of the same size. It has all got to be specified, put down in writing, and all built exactly according to the specifications or else the whole affair is a failure.

Now it is utterly hopeless to expect that we are going to import these things. We must make them at home with our own labor, and if it is to our disadvantage we must stand it; and our ship-builders will. I say to the Senator from Missouri that if the bill as we have reported it to the Senate and as it has now been amended becomes a law, I shall not be afraid to guarantee that there will be twenty-five 4,000-ton iron steamers built in the United States ship-yards and on the ocean in less than five years.

I hope the Senator will not insist on this amendment to this section.

Mr. VEST. I shall not insist if the Senator opposes my amendment, because I know it will be defeated. My judgment is not changed in regard to it. As I pointed out some days ago, our foreign trade is languishing and dying. I see no reason why the same rule should not be applied to the foreign trade that is applied to the coasting trade in this respect, but I recognize that whenever the line is drawn here upon anything that approximates to free ships or free materials I am in the minority. Therefore I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. The Chair is informed that in the perfecting of the bill sections have been introduced between section 18 and section 19.

Mr. FRYE. Those sections can of course be passed. There are no amendments to be offered to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the bill will be better understood by calling the sections according to their numbers as printed, the Secretary will call section 19.

The SECRETARY. Section 19.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I offer an amendment to section 19.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator from New Jersey will wait one moment, the Senator from Missouri had two amendments, which were printed yesterday, and I suggested to the Senator this morning to withhold those until we reached a certain point in the bill, and that point I think we have reached. If the Senator intends to offer those amendments, I very much prefer that they should be offered at the end of section 18, as printed.

Mr. VEST. I understood the Senator to suggest that they should be withheld until we reached section 22.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator is right. Section 22 was the point.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then I offer my amendment to section 19, to strike out from line 6 to line 10, inclusive, and insert:

For transporting the mails of the United States from any port of the United States to any foreign port a sum not exceeding $1 per mile; and between Atlantic ports of the United States and the Pacific ports of the United States, touching at any foreign port, a sum not exceeding $1 per mile on the trip each way of actual—

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the phraseology of this section:

For transporting the mails of the United States between any port of the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the Atlantic and ports in the Pacific, touching at any foreign port, a sum not exceeding $1 per mile, on the trip each way.

My amendment proposes to restrict it to mails of the United States from any port of the United States to any foreign port, a sum not exceeding $1 per mile. Under the bill proposed by the Senator from Maine it is proposed to pay an American ship, for instance, between the port of New York and the port of Antwerp—or take the Belgian line, as we now call it, between Philadelphia and Belgium, as an illustration. The Senator from Maine proposed to pay $1 a mile for carrying the American mails to Belgium, with which I fully agree, because that is compensation for carrying the American mail; but he also proposes to pay that ship for returning from Antwerp to Philadelphia another dollar per mile—for what? Not for carrying the American mail, but for transporting the Belgian mail, for which the Belgian Government pays $100,000 a year. I find no fault and can make no criticism upon gentlemen on this side of the Chamber or the other side of the Chamber who are adverse to paying subsidies; but surely that would be a subsidy in its most aggravated form. You propose to pay a steamship engaged in the trade of which I have spoken $4,000 for returning from Belgium to the United States for which it does not render one particle of service to the United States Government. When you reach a foreign port with an American ship and begin your return from that foreign port, the mails you carry are the mails of the foreign government and not of the American Government.

Further, I do not propose, as will be seen, in my amendment to interfere in the least with ships sailing between the Atlantic ports and the Pacific ports of our own country which convey the American mail both ways. A ship may start from the port of New York and its termination may be San Francisco.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator if it is possible that mails will go 3,000 miles by sea when they can cross the continent by railway?

Mr. MCPHERSON. But they may be taken for some intermediate ports.

Mr. BAYARD. Would the Senator provide a compensation for going around Cape Horn by sail or steam as a mail route, when we have three railroads to-day running to San Francisco?

Mr. MCPHERSON. The argument of the Senator from Delaware is very well, but the principle I wish to embody in the bill is this: I will vote to give fair compensation for carrying the United States mails to the ships of the United States to any foreign ports and end it there. I will vote to give the same compensation to any ships of the United States which convey the mails of the United States on the ocean between our own ports.

Take the Pacific Mail Steamship line; I cite that only as an illustration. I know nothing about the line of steamers. They are engaged in traffic between here and the Pacific coast; they have twenty ships which are engaged in the business. The argument of the Senator from Delaware does not seemingly apply to the ships as engaged in the commercial traffic. They still continue in existence; they are doing a profitable business. I would pay the Pacific Mail line for carrying the mail back from the Pacific States just as I would pay for carrying the mails from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In other words, any sort of commercial craft owned by citizens of the United States which will do service both ways is entitled to just as much compensation for service one way as the other; but as to a vessel in the foreign trade, when it carries the mail from a foreign country, it is not the United States mail; when it is conveyed from some South American port in Peru or Brazil, or from Great Britain or from Belgium or from France, it is then the mail of the country from the port of which the steamship leaves.

As I said before I am opposed to subsidy, so called, in its every form, but I will vote for an appropriation of money to compensate the mail-carriers of this country and adequately compensate them for the service they render. I do not know but that $1 a mile is too much, I do not know but that it is too little; but I do know that when the Government of the United States, as it is now doing under existing laws, will meet the ship-owner at the dock and take him by the throat and say to him "You must carry the United States mail at such compensation as we see fit to give you, and that compensation is not just, is not equitable or fair," then I say the Government is wrong, and therefore I have offered my amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask the Senator whether the compensation now paid for carrying the mails to Europe is not adequate?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will answer the question of the honorable Senator from Delaware by citing a case. The American lines sailing from the port of Philadelphia to Antwerp, Liverpool, and London last year received 3 cents a mile for the transportation of United States mails, and only 3 cents. If the Senator from Delaware thinks that an adequate or just compensation for a great government having the power in its own hands and exercising it, declaring to the ship-owner, "You shall not untie your ship from the dock until the United States mails are placed on board," then he and I differ.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In the report of the Postmaster-General he says that the sea-postage upon the heavy mails carried from New York to transatlantic ports yields an adequate remuneration; but complaint has been made that the vessels going down to South America and Vera Cruz are greatly delayed because of the lightness of the mail. I think I can find that in his report. I put the question to the Senator because I have found statements of that kind in the report of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will answer the Senator from Delaware that the information I have upon this question is largely obtained from listening to the speech of the honorable Senator from Maine a few days since, in which he made the most marvelous (to me) statement that the American steamship line that carried the United States mail from Philadelphia to Europe during the past year had done it at a compensation of about 3 cents a mile; that the Pacific Mail line had carried the United States mail at a cost to the Government of about 7 cents per mile, and that the charge upon the Pacific Mail line for the handling of the mails in port alone amounted to almost all that the Government paid. The Government has made a million dollars and covered it into the Treasury as a result of this service.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think the Postmaster-General has information of that whereof he speaks, and I will now read what he says in his report:

> The sea-postage upon the heavy mails conveyed from New York to transatlantic ports yields to the foreign steamship lines transporting them an adequate remuneration for that service; but on account of the small amount of mail matter conveyed to South American and transpacific ports, the same measure of payment yields a less adequate compensation.
> The amount of sea-postage upon the mails dispatched during the year over the principal ocean routes was as follows:

He gives an itemized account of the amounts paid to the various transportation lines on the Atlantic to Europe. He asserts positively that they are amply compensated for the service they render. Now, in the face of that statement by the Postmaster-General, charged with the administration of the postal affairs of the country, I do not feel at liberty to vote an additional dollar to those companies. The Postmaster-General, who has charge of the postal service of the country, informs Congress in his annual report that they are fully compensated for that service. Where, then, the justice of taking from the public Treasury the money paid there by the taxes imposed upon the people to add to the ample compensation already provided?

I am fully aware that for mails going to Vera Cruz and Panama and the mails carried by the Pacific Mail Company to China and Japan the compensation may not amount to a very great deal, because the communications to those countries are not as large as they are to European countries, and therefore the compensation of sea-postage may not be so large, and if it is necessary to grant additional compensation to those lines I should be willing to do that, but I am not willing to put my hand into the Treasury of the United States by my vote or put the hands of anybody else into the Treasury of the United States and take from it the money which the people of the United States have paid there by taxation imposed upon them and give it as a mere bounty and gratuity to steamship lines which are amply compensated now for the service they render. I take it the Postmaster-General has information of that whereof he speaks.

It was because I heard the Senator from New Jersey denouncing the Government of his country for taking the masters of vessels by the throat and extorting from them a service at an inadequate compensation that I called his attention to this. When I heard that remark of the Senator from New Jersey I felt compelled to state that I could not acquiesce in the views presented by him.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey proceeds upon the assumption that we should pay for carrying the mails only one way; and he said to the Senate that he was entirely willing that the pay should be made commensurate with the service rendered by the steamship lines. The committee in fixing this limit at $1 per mile each way did it after careful consideration of the subject, and after consultation with several steam ship-owners, who agreed that some limit ought to be fixed and that a limit of $1 per mile for the round trip would not be far from right. If, however, the committee had acted upon the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey and had fixed the compensation to be paid for the trip one way, the out-trip, it would have put the limit at double the sum, or $2 per mile, because it was agreed that at least $1 per mile on the round trip would be necessary in order to make a sufficient compensation to induce steamship companies to carry the mail. Two or three years ago I reported an amendment to an appropriation bill from the Post-Office Committee, and if I remember rightly the limit fixed in that amendment was $3 a mile one way, for the outward trip, and nothing for the return trip. This proposition is equivalent to $1 less per mile than the amendment then reported from the Post-Office Committee, which was also reported after investigation.

Certainly the Senator from New Jersey must see that it makes no difference to the United States Treasury or to the Post-Office Department in fixing this compensation, for if we are to fix any at all we must fix it at such sum as will induce the starting of lines; otherwise it will be of no benefit whatever.

Mr. McPHERSON. But it is proposed in this bill to pay $1 per mile for service on the return trip, when there is not one particle of service rendered this Government.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I do not see that at all. It is only a measure of pay which we have arrived at, and the committee in their judgment fixed on the sum of $1 per mile both ways as proper. As I stated before, if we had decided to make it on the outward voyage only, the committee would just as unanimously have made it $2 a mile as they have made it one for the round trip. Therefore if the Senator desires to be consistent and carry out his own promise and make the pay commensurate, when he cuts off the return voyage he must undertake to double the limit of compensation and to make it $2 a mile, and I am prepared to say that in that event his amendment is of little or no consequence.

Mr. McPHERSON. I confess to the honorable Senator from New York and to the Senate I do not know what adequate compensation would be.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I so understood the Senator to say.

Mr. McPHERSON. But at the same time I am fortified in my belief that a dollar per mile is ample compensation from the fact that the Belgian Government has been able to hire a line of steamships established from the port of Antwerp to the port of New York, making weekly trips, for the sum of $100,000 per year to carry the Belgian mail. Under my amendment to this bill paying $1 per mile in one direction, and that the direction in which the ship is absolutely rendering mail service to the Government of the United States, the subsidy paid to the same line—if you call it subsidy; I call it compensation for carrying the mail—would be $208,000. I take it that if $100,000 per year is an inducement to put a steamship line under the Belgian flag, $208,000 a year will be ample compensation to pay that line for carrying the American mail between the same points.

Mr. SEWELL. I wish to ask my colleague a question. Has he any information that that line was established on the offer of $100,000?

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not hear my colleague.

Mr. SEWELL. The line was not established on the offer of $100,000. It was a mere incident to American capital desiring to establish a line of steamers under the Belgian flag.

Mr. McPHERSON. Why was the line established?

Mr. SEWELL. Simply because it could not be made to pay under the American flag. It was not established under the offer of $100,000 by any means.

Mr. McPHERSON. Well, suppose I admit all that the honorable Senator says. He says the line was not established by reason of the offer of $100,000. The contract to carry the Belgian mails for $100,000 a year is an accomplished fact. It makes no difference as to how the line was started or why; leave that out of consideration. It agreed when it was started to carry the Belgian mail to the United States for $100,000.

Mr. SEWELL. But it is not a fair proposition to say that that established the line of steamers. It was purely an incidental matter coming in.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will simply say that if it be the purpose to establish any line of steamers by the extraordinary compensation you propose to give for carrying the American mails, I disagree with the gentlemen who take that view of it.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The Senator admits that he has made no investigation of the subject and is not able to say what would be fair compensation. The committee, after the most careful consideration of this question and examining various parties upon it, decided that $1 per mile for the round trip should be fixed as the limit beyond which it should not go. That is, that between that and nothing it should be left open to competition and bidding. If we look at the statistics of our own coastwise mail service we find that the United States Government is paying from three to two dollars per mile for mail service in some of our coastwise steamers for the entire round trip—much more than is proposed to be paid by this section.

It is not anticipated, and was not anticipated by the committee, that under this provision there would be probably any line started to Europe, at least for a long time to come. It was believed, however, that lines would be established to Central America, to South America, and to the West India Islands, and perhaps to the Sandwich Islands and to the far East. Knowing that the service is so uncertain, that the prospect of a profit is so small, it was not believed that any capital in this country could be induced to go into the business of establishing lines to the various South American ports for anything less than $1 per mile for mail service for the round trip, and as I said before, if the committee had thought it wise to allow compensation only for the outward-bound trip, it would have fixed it at a minimum of $2 per mile.

The committee saw no incongruity in fixing the compensation for the round trip, for if the ship goes out and carries our mails to Brazil, it certainly brings back mail for ourselves, and so far there is no guarantee that the Brazilian Government will pay anything to such a steamship company, even the sea-postages; and under such a condition of circumstances it was necessary to fix the compensation at such a sum as would induce American capital to build steamers and put them upon the various lines.

If the Senate shall see fit to adopt the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, it will be equivalent to reducing by one-half the proposition made by the committee itself after its own careful consideration. I think that the consideration which the committee gave this question, the investigation which it has had on the subject, ought to pass for something, and it ought not to be set aside by any mere statement in regard to what some Belgian line may have done or may not have done. The Belgian line was started without any consideration of the mail business, as I understand. How many vessels they have in the line I do not know. Perhaps the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] can tell.

Mr. SEWELL. Ten.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. They have ten ships in the line, as I understand from the Senator from New Jersey, and the compensation for carrying the mail is $100,000 per year from the Belgian Government. In other words, it is $10,000 per ship for the year. That sum is of course something; and taking into consideration the lower wages which prevail under the Belgian flag than under the American flag, I have no doubt the line is meeting with success; but the lines which we propose to start are to sail under the American flag; they are to be manned by American sailors who are to receive American pay; and if we are to do anything now, we can not in my judgment do less than the committee has recommended; that is, allow $1 per mile both ways.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the Senator if the committee has made an estimate as to the pay to inure to vessels for carrying the mails under this provision?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. It is very easy for any Senator to make a computation as to what a line would receive running to any particular port, whatever the distance may be. It will be not to exceed $1 a mile there and back.

Mr. FRYE. There is a further limitation which exists nowhere else under the rules of the Department or the laws of Congress: you shall in no event exceed the amount received net from the service.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the Senator know what is the income realized by the Government from ocean postage over that which it pays for carrying the mails?

Mr. FRYE. About $1,300,000. I have the statement, and put it into my speech the other day, which the Postmaster-General gave me.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have here the last report of the Postmaster-General, the report for the last fiscal year, in which he says:

> The estimate for this service on the basis of sea-postages only for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, is $425,000. To enable this Department to pay the full postages to the United States steamships on the mails conveyed during that year an additional sum of $200,000 must be added to this estimate.

That is, if you appropriate all the revenue derived from sea-postage, in addition thereto there will be an appropriation of $200,000 required. I understand from this report that additional compensation in the sum of $200,000 is required.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator is right it is not much of a subsidy.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have understood the committee had made an estimate and had some information authorizing them to add a million or a million and a half of dollars to the present pay. I wanted to know how that could be, because I had drawn my information wholly from the report of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. The statement of the Senator from Maine is undoubtedly correct. The surplus revenues from the foreign mail service are in round numbers a million and a half dollars per annum. That is the amount of money which the Postmaster-General is authorized under this section of the bill to expend in making contracts with steamships for carrying our mails to foreign countries. Beyond that he can not go. It is entirely of course within his option to make these contracts, and if they are made they must be made after public bidding and let to the lowest bidder; but in no case is the compensation to exceed $1 per mile.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word or two in support of the section we are now considering. This bill, including this section, was agreed to unanimously by the Committee on Commerce. That committee was animated by but one desire, and that was to relieve so far as we could American shipping from many of the burdens under which it is now laboring, and to encourage the establishment of lines from the ports of the United States to the various foreign ports. The question of compensation for carrying the mails was one of the principal things the committee considered in connection with this subject. It is universally admitted that proper compensation for carrying the mail on the ocean is not now allowed. But it is also a well-known fact that whenever an attempt is made to correct this wrong the first thing that we are met with in the discussion is the bold, bald statement that the measure is so framed as to grant a subsidy to lines of steamships and to persons engaged in building steamships.

Mr. President, I should be among the last of the members of the Senate to encourage ship-building by granting a subsidy pure and simple, but to pay fair compensation for services rendered in carrying the mails both upon the land and upon the ocean is an entirely different proposition, and one that ought to be considered always upon its merits.

The fact is that under the law as it stands to-day an American vessel plying between the ports of this country and any foreign port receives a compensation for the mail service of about 2½ cents per mile for each mile the vessel runs and carries the mail.

Mr. BAYARD. How is it measured by the letters carried?

Mr. GORMAN. It is measured by the postage on the letters carried. They receive as compensation for the service the sea-postage on the letters carried, and that alone; and that is so insignificant that it amounts only to 2½ cents a mile for the miles run. I hold in my hand a statement which shows how the present postal laws operate against the American ship engaged in the foreign trade.

The line between New York, San Francisco, China, Japan, Australia and return, has eighteen ships; the average miles run per annum is 681,877, for which it receives for carrying the United States mails $24,420.

Brazil line, New York to St. Thomas, Para, Pernambuco, Bahia, and Rio, three ships, 140,000 miles, $1,875.

Havana line, New York to Havana, three ships, 128,960 miles, $2,444.

South Side line, New York to Santiago de Cuba, three ships, 43,472 miles, $76.

Mexican line, New York to Vera Cruz, five ships, 187,000 miles, $2,600. This is at the rate of 2½ cents a mile; whereas in the coastwise lines between Galveston and Brashear, Tex., that steamship company only made 58,500 miles, and the compensation was $50,000.

The line from Cedar Keys to Key West, Fla., made a run of 48,880 miles and received $18,000; the line from San Francisco to Portland, Oreg., 69,680 miles run, received $25,000; the line from Portland to Sitka, 16,020 miles run, received $34,800; and the line from Portland to Astoria, 54,880 miles run, received $14,960.

This shows that during that year the mileage in the foreign mail service in American vessels was 1,181,309 miles, for which the whole compensation was only $31,405, whereas the coastwise lines named ran only 247,960 miles and received $142,706. In other words, the vessels engaged in the foreign trade, making 933,349 miles of run more than those engaged in the coastwise trade, received $111,301 less compensation. I submit to my friend from Delaware that that is not just.
